ISR enhances information access

By Matthew Ellis
Opinions Editor

Over the summer the University's Information Services and Resources (ISR) made many changes to improve the network and Internet capabilities of the campus.

Four of the major changes are the addition of a new library catalog, Webmail, a new e-mail server and a new virus protection system.

"The new library catalog system is powered by the SIRSI Corporation's iLink software, which will provide the campus with access to the library's collections, allowing ISR to provide additional services via its catalog, such as a table of contents service, electronic renewal of books and quick cross references to related materials," said Isabella O'Neill, librarian and reference services program manager.

The new system differs from the previous system in that it allows students to complete more complex searches for more specific items. Some examples of the capabilities of the new system include the ability to sort search results by author, title, subject, relevance and publication date; display subjects related to your search results for easy cross reference; save or mark catalog records and e-mail or print selected catalog records.

"Migrating to new library catalog software provided by the SIRSI Corporation has allowed ISR to continue to provide to the campus a library catalog that is able to keep pace with modern technological developments," O'Neill said.

The new Webmail server provides students with a different option for checking their e-mail and gives them the ability to check mail when they are not on campus.

"Typically, Webmail servers are more user friendly and more people are familiar with how to use them," said Roberta Sims, University webmaster.

The biggest advantage to Webmail is that it allows students abroad to check their University e-mail accounts.

"We have received great response from students abroad. All they need to do is log on to any Web browser with their user name and password and they can check their e-mail from the University," Sims said.

The Webmail feature is much more popular than was expected, but students and faculty still have the opportunity to check their mail like they were previously able to. Webmail simply provides a useful alternative.

"The only disadvantage to Webmail is that you cannot have as many messages sent to your account," Sims said.

The University has also upgraded its e-mail server this year to be faster and have more storage capacity.

"We replace systems like this every three years, and it was time for this server. One cool aspect of the larger capacity is the fact that mail can be more easily left on the server. This is an important feature that was a prerequisite for the web mail server," said Eugene Spencer '76, associate vice president of ISR.

Many students may believe that ISR has blocked all MP3 servers. The internet system that the University uses prioritizes certain types of traffic in order to manage the internet connection—because MP3s are mostly for entertainment purposes, they are not given precedence over other types of traffic.

"At the very start of the school year, everyone has extra time to use recreational computing. The internet connection is fairly congested at the University to honor author Morrison

By Alyson Walker
Features Editor

Author Toni Morrison will be awarded the first Janet Weis Fellowship in Contemporary Letters by the University on Oct. 17. The evening will include dinner, followed by a public lecture by Morrison in the Weis Center for the Performing Arts.

The Janet Weis Fellow in Contemporary Letters is funded by the Degenstein Foundation to honor Janet Weis through the University. The Janet Weis Fellowship in Contemporary Letters will be a University award given annually to "honor and recognize an individual who represents the very highest level of achievement in the craft of writing within the realms of fiction, non-fiction or biography," according to the description of the endowment.

The description states that the Fellowship will be awarded to an author "whose work has been accessible to a wide audience and has resulted in a broadly-based record of public recognition and appreciation."

Morrison embodies this description. She is the first and only African-American woman to win the Nobel Prize in Literature (1993) and has received multiple other prizes in literature, including the Pulitzer Prize in 1988 for the novel Beloved.

"Who better to begin this award with than Toni Morrison? She has all the credentials—a Nobel Laureate, a Pulitzer Prize, as well as being a popular, readable and academic author. We could not have found a better inaugural recipient," said Gary Sojka, professor of biology.

Morrison is a National Humanities Medalist, awarded in 2000 by former President Bill Clinton and sponsored by the National Endowment for the Humanities. She is also the Robert F. Goheen Professor in the Council of the Humanities at Princeton University and has held this position since 1989.

Morrison's visit will be a privilege for the University as well as an incredible educational experience for the entire community.

"It is a great honor for Bucknell to begin our new Janet Weis Fellow in Contemporary Letters series with such an important and profound figure in contemporary American writing," said John Rickard, chair of the English department.

Morrison's work appeals to scholars and students of many different departments, including English, women's and gender studies, African-American studies and other groups and organizations on campus.

"Toni Morrison is one of the most important novelists in the world today. Her books explore the intersection of history, language and consciousness and her art pushes beyond the limits of language as those limits have been constructed by a racist society," said Glynis Carr, professor of English and faculty member of the women's and gender studies program. "Thematically and formally, her work is transformative, startling and gorgeous."

Morrison was selected not only because of her academic stature, but also because of her widespread appeal to people and effect upon literature.

"When they gave her the Nobel Prize, the Swedish Academy praised Toni Morrison for the 'visionary force and poetic import' and the 'epic power' of her writing," Rickard said. "Her novels are among the most read and most discussed books in our country and indeed in the world—the opportunity to hear this powerful voice in person is a special treat for the University community."

Students are also eagerly anticipating Morrison's arrival at the University.

"As a student and researcher of contemporary women's literature, I am looking forward to Toni Morrison's visit to the University," Courtney Spohn-Larkins '03 said. "One of the reasons I admire Morrison's work is that she not only writes about women and racial issues, but she then critiques and challenges the literary environment in which we read about these issues."

Spohn-Larkins also believes that Morrison will be an inspiration and a challenge to the community to explore beyond previously accepted values.

"Her presence on campus can only succeed in further challenging students to seek out the truth. In addition, I believe her visit will aid in the campus' vision for intellectual and social diversity," Spohn-Larkins said.

The lecture will be free. Tickets will be required, and more information on obtaining them will be made

Uptown to begin hosting alcoholic events

Fourth friday of each month set aside for 'pub nights'; first night to be Sept. 20

By Jennifer Jenchura
Senior Writer

In an effort to encourage safe and responsible activities, Uptown will be providing alcoholic beverages to students over 21 on select Friday nights this semester. The first night is scheduled for Friday, Sept. 20 and future semester dates include Oct. 25 and Nov. 22 between the hours of 9:30 p.m. and 2 a.m.

Upon entrance to the upcoming "pub nights," University students over 21 must present a valid ID that will be checked against the registrar's list. Students will receive wristbands with three tabs for the night. Each tab will be removed by bartenders and are good for either one beer, glass of wine or soda. On these nights only University students will be allowed into Uptown, as opposed to other nights during the week when students can bring one non-University guest.

If the pub nights are successful in the fall they will continue into the spring semester.

"We want everything in place to give this new idea its best chance," said Kari Conrad, associate dean of students.

Due to age restrictions, mostly seniors are expected this semester with more juniors in the spring.

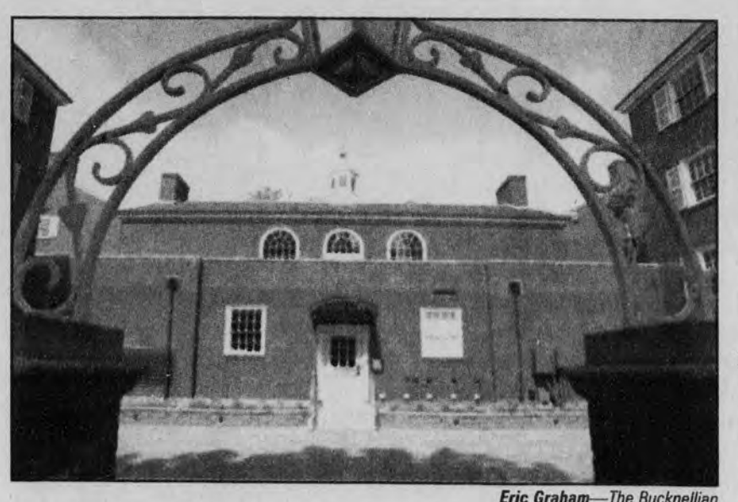
"If it works, the idea is to keep the fourth Friday of each month as Uptown 'pub night,' said Carolyn Strickland, associate director of campus activities and programs.

After nearly a year of discussion on the subject, the administration decided to commit to "giving the idea of serving alcohol at Uptown a go and see how it works," Conrad said.

Uptown has evolved the past few years largely based on student suggestions.

"Ever since Uptown opened, upperclass students have said it was a good nightclub environment, but they would also like to be able to have a beer there. None of us are opposed to consuming alcohol, just as long as it is in moderation," Conrad said.

Uptown is not permitted by law to sell alcohol and neither Uptown nor the University is currently looking into applying for a liquor license.



Eric Graham—The Bucknellian

Beginning Sept. 20, Uptown will begin hosting one alcoholic event per month. The decision comes with the approval of several deans as well as University President Steffen Rogers.

Also, Uptown is not considering moving to a BYOB policy for any events.

"We are not looking to compete with any local establishments or senior nights and I don't think we will. On a limited basis we want to be able to provide a safe, hang-out place central to campus," Conrad said.

Most likely there will also be a plain-clothes Public Safety or security official on hand as well as the regular staff.

The Bucknellian

The Bucknellian won first place in the Best of Show contest at the Associated Collegiate Press (ACP)/College Media Advisers Conference in August. Competing against 30 other weekly college newspapers, The Bucknellian won the award for general excellence.

According to ACP Executive Director Tom Rolnicki, the newspapers are judged for overall coverage, quality of writing and editing and strength of the editorial page. Quality of design, photography and graphics are also considered.

Ian Newman, current board of directors member of the ACP and current newspaper adviser at SUNY, Rockland, was a judge in the Best of Show contest. "The paper responded very well to the needs of the readership, covering campus activities well, and having a good balance of campus, local, regional and larger issues," Newman said.

Sunday, Sept. 1

TAMPERING WITH FIRE EQUIPMENT—Public Safety responded to a Swartz Hall fire alarm activation. Unknown person(s) had activated a pull station on the third floor. The incident is under investigation.

DISORDERLY CONDUCT—A student reported to a Public Safety that he overheard a group of students at Vedder Hall stating they were looking for another student to cause him harm. A full investigation was conducted on all individuals involved. University charges were issued.

MEDICAL ASSIST—Public Safety and Lewisburg Police Department responded to Vedder Hall for the report of a student who threatened to harm himself. The individual requested treatment and was transported by ambulance to Geisinger Medical Center and was later released.

ASSIST POLICE—Public Safety responded to the intersection of RoUTe. 15 and Moore Avenue to assist Lewisburg Police Department and East Buffalo Township Police Department with traffic control for a motor vehicle accident involving a student and a non-University affiliated male. The vehicles were damaged but the drivers sustained no injuries.

MEDICAL ASSIST—Public Safety and University officials responded to Swartz Hall to investigate the report of a student who was treated at Student Health Services and transported earlier to Evangelical Community Hospital emergency room for further treatment of self-inflicted wounds. This female was later admitted to Geisinger Medical Center for observation and then released.

Monday, Sept. 2

MEDICAL ASSIST—A student contacted Public Safety and requested transportation to Evangelical Community Hospital emergency room for treatment of a rash. A Student Health Services driver responded and drove the individual to the hospital. The male later returned to campus.

MEDICAL ASSIST—Public Safety responded to the Fieldhouse for the report of a student suffering an asthma attack. The female refused treatment and was transported by Public Safety to her room where she medicated herself to control the asthma. Two friends agreed to observe the student's condition throughout the night.

MEDICAL ASSIST—Public Safety responded to the Langone Center for the report of an employee with an injured foot. A Student Health Services driver transported the individual to Evangelical Community Hospital for treatment.

Tuesday, Sept. 3

MISSING PROPERTY—A student reported to Public Safety that she lost her cell phone somewhere on lower campus. A report was filed for insurance purposes.

MEDICAL TRANSPORT—Public safety responded to McDonnell Hall for the report of an unconscious student due to a medical condition. The female was transported by ambulance to Evangelical Community Hospital Emergency room for treatment and later returned to campus.

Public Safety Notice: Joggers on public roads

Bucknell's Office of Public Safety has been receiving complaints from automobile operators and pedestrians concerning joggers and athletic teams that frequently use River Road, Smoketown Road, Stein Lane and other public roads on or near campus. A problem arises when these persons or groups travel two or more abreast on a public highway using part of the road. Automobile operators who approach these travelers must slow down and stop, or drive in a wide berth around them. When joggers or athletic teams do not yield the right-of-way to an automobile, the following can occur: if the automobile slows down or stops, it risks being struck in the rear by an automobile traveling in the same direction; if the automobile attempts to travel around the jogger(s) on the road by entering into the opposite lane, it risks being struck by another automobile traveling in the opposing lane. And of course, there is always the danger of the automobile striking the persons who are in the middle of the road. All these situations are especially dangerous on hills where visibility is limited.

Public roads are built for the use of licensed motorized vehicles and these vehicles have the legal right-of-way. Others have the right to travel on these roads as long as they do not impede traffic or create a safety hazard. Police officials have advised us that for safety and liability reasons arising from past incidents, they may begin to issue traffic citations to persons who fail to yield to automobiles on public roads or who create a traffic hazard while using public roads. I offer a simple solution which should enable us to avoid problems. When a vehicle approaches, joggers should form a single line, temporarily move to the shoulder of the road, and yield the right-of-way to traffic. Likewise, automobile operators should always drive in a safe manner, with a regard for joggers and other persons on the highways. Your cooperation is greatly appreciated and will make for safe traveling for everyone.

University and community prepare for Sept. 11 anniversary

Commemoration is planned for 5 p.m. at Rooke Chapel

By Sandi-Jo Galati
News Editor

Nearly one year ago, the University community united on the Academic Quad in support of one another and the nation. As the anniversary of the tragedies of Sept. 11 approaches, the community is again preparing to unite in remembrance of those lost and to focus on the future.

"We need to remember the people who died and the trauma that was caused on a worldwide basis and never turn our backs to it, but we must also move forward," University President Steffen Rogers said.

The official University observance, titled "9/11/02: Remembrance, Reflection, Renewal," specifically focuses on assisting the community in remembering the tragedy while positively approaching the future.

"The University has adopted 'Remembrance, Reflection and Renewal' as the theme for the ceremony because we need to do more than remember and reflect, we need to renew—and along with that I believe we need to move on with a new commitment to do what is right," said Kyle Tice McGee '04, co-president of Rooke Chapel Congregation (RCC). "We should treat everyone in the world as we wish to be treated; it is a lesson we should take out of the horrible tragedy which occurred that morning.'

Rogers is particularly emphasizing renewal, challenging the community to examine its values and encouraging continual transformation in its appreciation of diversity.

"We do need to remember and look back on that day, but we do not need to do it with fear," Rogers said. "We need to do it with an eye on the future and then decide for ourselves what we can do to live our lives a little differently, to try to make a difference on a person by person basis that will hopefully spread throughout all of our cultures."

The observance will commence with the ringing of the chapel bells at 8:47 a.m., the time when the North Tower of the World Trade Center was struck. At this time the campus is encouraged to pause for a moment of silence in remembrance of last year.

"One of the main things that people should be aware of is that they will experience emotions remembering that day and other painful days from last year," Rabbi Serena Fujita said. "People should ride those feelings; they are normal and healthy."

The campus community is invited to join in a ceremony coordinated by the Office of Chaplains and Religious Life at 5 p.m. in the Rooke Chapel garden. This ceremony will include a performance by the Rooke Chapel Choir. Faculty, staff, alumni and students will read reflections and readings. Concluding remarks will be given by Professor of Biology Gary Sojka.

During the ceremony, the University's Student Emergency Response Volunteers (SERV) will give a presentation honoring the emergency workers lost in the rescue effort.

Pictures, poetry and presentations commemorating Sept. 11 adorn the Rooke Chapel Meditation Chapel, which will be open all day for the community to gather and reflect. In addition, materials will be available for visitors to add their own thoughts and reflections.

"People should find a way to express their grief in a concrete way, either writing, drawing, attending the service or something to communicate their feelings and channel them in a positive way," Fujita said.

The campus religious organizations will also be conducting individual services. There will be a Protestant candlelit vigil at 10 p.m. at the amphitheater between McDonnell and Swartz Halls.

Hillel will be holding a Ma'ariv, a regular evening service that will include speaking about the victims of the tragedy. The service will begin at 10 p.m. at the Berelson Center for Jewish Life.

Catholic Campus Ministry (CCM) will be commemorating the day with candlelit Mass at 10 p.m. in the Chapel Garden.

Attacks spark chaos in Afghanistan

KABUL, Afghanistan—In what appeared to be a day of coordinated attacks on Afghanistan's fragile government, President Hamid Karzai survived an assassination attempt Thursday by an Afghan security guard. A car bomb that exploded in the heart of the Afghan capital reportedly killed at least 22 people and wounded dozens.

Arabs unify against attack on Iraq

CAIRO, Egypt—Arab states have resolved to stand together against any U.S. attack on Iraq, while calling on Baghdad and the United Nations to resume dialogue on weapons inspectors and other issues, Arab League foreign ministers said Thursday on a second day of talks in Cairo. The public Arab solidarity came a day after President Bush began a campaign to rally the congressional support he needs to remove Saddam Hussein from power, adding that he wants that support by the end of October.

U.S. to try letting pilots carry firearms

WASHINGTON—In a major policy reversal, the Bush administration is on the verge of announcing that some U.S. airline pilots will be allowed to carry guns in the cockpit on a trial basis, NBC News has learned. Meanwhile, flight attendants on Thursday asked Congress to force airlines to provide them with better self-defense training.

World Trade Center flag is missing

HACKENSACK, N.J.—The American flag that was raised by three firefighters over the wreckage of the World Trade Center, one of the most enduring images of Sept. 11, has disappeared. After it was removed from the site, the flag was believed to have been flown on U.S. ships serving in the war in Afghanistan, then returned to New York City officials in March. But the flag that officials preserved measures 5 feet by 8 feet. The flag the firefighters raised on Sept. 11 measured 4 feet by 6 feet, according to its original owners.

Earth Summit ends in discord

JOHANNESBURG, South Africa—The much-heralded Earth Summit II ended in acrimony Wednesday, with environmentalists heckling U.S. Secretary of State Colin Powell and nations disagreeing on what was accomplished. The extremes ranged from Australia's proclamation of an "absolute success" to the "dialogue of the deaf" label given by Venezuelan President Hugo Chavez.

Man contracts HIV twice

SWITZERLAND—Swiss researchers have documented a rare case of a patient contracting a second HIV infection years later with a different strain of the virus. Doctors once assumed that patients' natural immunity would keep them from getting the virus more than once. However, researchers Thursday described the surprising case of a 38-year-old man who acquired a second strain through unprotected sex more than two years after he was first infected.

Settlement reported in church abuse suits

BOSTON—Civil lawsuits brought against the Boston Archdiocese by dozens of people who claim they were molested by a defrocked priest could avoid trial under a tentative settlement. Cardinal Bernard Law's attorney said Tuesday the Roman Catholic archdiocese and alleged sex abuse victims of John Geoghan have reached a provisional $10 million settlement.

Senate panel rejects judicial nominee

WASHINGTON—The Senate Judiciary Committee, in a strict party-line vote, rejected Texas Supreme Court Justice Priscilla Owen for a federal appeals court seat Thursday, handing President Bush a second major defeat in his efforts to put more conservatives in key judgeships.

Cuomo quits New York race

New York—Hobbled by poor poll numbers and a testy performance on the campaign trail, former Housing Secretary Andrew Cuomo quit the New York governor's race Tuesday and threw his support to the man with whom he has had a bitter rivalry, Democratic state Comptroller Carl McCall. Cuomo said that in the interests of party unity he'd decided to not broadcast negative ads that could have enabled him to beat McCall.

University alum and former Bucknellian Editor-in-Chief Bob Streeter '38 passes away

By Jim Leahy
Senior Writer

The Bucknellian lost one of its strongest supporters this summer while the presses were silent. Robert E. Streeter '38 passed away in Danville on Saturday, June 22 from complications following surgery. He was 85.

Streeter was a member of The Bucknellian advisory board that provides the newspaper with a direct link between the Editorial Board and the faculty, staff and administration of the University. He was a member of the board for many years.

"Bob was a gentleman of the 'old school,'" Professor of Biology Gary Sojka said. "He was a true intellectual with wide-ranging interests. We will certainly miss his presence on The Bucknellian advisory committee. I enjoyed listening to his keen observations based on years of experience and witnessing his genuine affection for students that showed itself in a well-seasoned tolerance stemming from a realization that college students are 'works in progress.'"

Bucknellian Adviser Jim Lee added, "Bob was the epitome of an academic—well read, well traveled and insatiably curious. Some of my fondest memories of Bob were his funny stories about his days as a Bucknellian editor. It was clear that the students he worked with at The Bucknellian appreciated his often irreverent sense of humor and they all knew that he cared deeply about them."

Streeter was born in Williamsport in 1916 and graduated summa cum laude from the University with an B.A. and honors in English as a member of the class of 1938. He did his postgraduate work at Northwestern University, receiving masters and doctoral degrees. He also held an honorary doctorate of humane letters that was awarded to him by the University in 1960.

During his undergraduate career, Streeter served as editor-in-chief of The Bucknellian and as the president of the Student-Faculty Congress.

His involvement at the University did not stop following his graduation. He served as president of the Bucknell Alumni Club of Chicago, represented the University at the inauguration of four college presidents, received the Bucknell Association Award for Outstanding Loyalty and Service to Bucknell in 1995 and served on the Board of Trustees from 1966 until his death.

Streeter was the University's commencement speaker in 1969 and he returned to teaching here in 1988 when he took the position as the Phi Beta Kappa Visiting Scholar.

In addition, Streeter was the editor of Now and Then: A Sesquicentennial Miscellany, a collection of essays for the sesquicentennial celebration that the University had in 1996.

The career of Bob Streeter took him to many places. He served as a member of the editorial staff of the Williamsport Sun-Gazette from 1942-47 and was the American adviser to the English department at the Seoul National University in South Korea. He was named a visiting professor at the University of Chicago in 1947 and became a full professor in 1958. While at the University of Chicago, Streeter was associate dean of the undergraduate college in 1953 and became dean in 1954. He was also appointed dean of the division of humanities in 1963 and again in 1968.

In an article that appeared in the Chicago Sun-Times in June, the present dean of the graduate division of humanities at the University of Chicago credits Streeter with taking "the first steps toward what today is described as globalization and diversity." He finished his 39-year career in Chicago as the Edward L. Ryerson Distinguished Service Professor of Literature.

Bob Streeter's involvement in University affairs did not stop after he graduated in 1938. In later years, he served as president of the Bucknell Alumni Club of Chicago, sat on The Bucknellian advisory board and was the University's featured speaker at the 1968 commencement ceremonies.

This semester, The Bucknellian will see many changes, including the use of the Quark design software program to layout the newspaper and a new staff.

Until now, The Bucknellian was produced using Pagemaker. In an attempt to keep up with the publishing world and improve the overall quality of The Bucknellian, the Editorial Board used Quark for the first time this week to layout the newspaper.

Rachel Laskow '03 and Jason Rubinstein '04 will continue their roles as editor-in-chief and associate editor, respectively. After spending a year abroad, former features editor Jolene Hart '03 is returning to the newspaper as managing editor, overseeing the features, arts and entertainment and business and politics sections.

Andrew Burr '04 and Sandi-Jo Galati '04 remain news editors. Cecily Cairns '04 and Aaron DeRosa '03 will continue to form the core of the sports section.

After writing consistently for the opinions section, Josh Fisher '04 will fulfill the role of opinions editor. Former Features Layout Editor Matt Ellis '05 will do layout for opinions. Former opinions columnist Gretchen Schrock '03 is joining The Bucknellian Editorial Board as business and politics editor. After a semester in China, former Managing Editor Maureen Oscadal '03 returns to the paper as business and politics layout editor.

Kristi Johnston '03 and Michelle Dombeck '05 will continue their positions as arts and entertainment editor and layout editor, respectively. Former Features Writer Alyson Walker '04 and Features Editor Josie Cetta '04 will be in charge of the features section.

Former Copy Editor Andrea Dill '03 will join The Bucknellian Editorial Board as chief copy editor. Eric Graham '05 and Suzie Lee '05 will stay on staff as photography editors.

Scott McElhone '03 is starting his second semester as business manager. After a semester in France, Amy Peloquin '03 is returning as the national advertising representative. Michael Langdon-Phillips '05 will be the local advertising representative. Brian Klotz '03 will continue as circulation manager.

Ford Parsons '03 will join The Bucknellian staff as production manager. As production manager, he will act as both online editor and systems manager.

Danielle Smith '99 to replace Eloiza Domingo as director of multicultural affairs

By Elisabeth Salemme
Writer

Eloiza Domingo, director of multicultural affairs for the 2001-2002 academic year, left the University this summer to pursue a Ph D. in higher education. She has been temporarily replaced by Danielle Smith, who served in the Office of Multicultural Affairs (OMA) last school year.

"Eloiza's leaving seemed to stem from being so young in a place like Lewisburg where everyone in the area that was her age was a student. Her family was so far away that she could just not handle that anymore," said Kellen Smith '03, president of Brothers and Sisters Empowered (BASE).

Smith has been a part of the campus community for more than six years, as she earned her Bachelor's Degree in biology at the University in 1999 and worked with the OMA for the 2000-2001 school year, filling another interim position. During that time, Smith was part of the process that hired Domingo.

"I was born and raised in Milltown, so I am very familiar with this area and a lot of issues that surround it since I am of an ethnic minority," Smith said.

When she heard of Domingo's plans to leave, Smith offered her services as an interim director this year. According to Dean of Students Richard Ferarro, a search for a permanent director for the 2003-2004 school year will take place this year.

"Danielle is great. She has been a Bucknellian so she understands what Bucknell is like and she understands the community. She is a person of very good will," Ferraro said.

> "As a Bucknellian, [Smith] realizes the importance of the Office of Multicultural Affairs and how we can help impact the experiences that we have here by doing things and having special events on campus."
> —Kellen Smith '03, Brothers and Sisters Empowered (BASE) president*

The position of director of multicultural affairs primarily involves working with students of diverse backgrounds. The director works a great deal with campus clubs and activities dealing with issues of diversity, as well as with the entire community through speeches and presentations. One presentation that Smith is working on for this year involves a house in this area that was used as part of the Underground Railroad.

Smith is also going to begin diversity training at the University.

"I am looking into training myself to be a trainer to help other students become trainers as well," Smith said.

Jaynemarie Angbah '02, who has known and worked with Smith since she was a student at the University calls Smith "a remarkable administrator ... it is apparent that she cares about the students and ujilizes all her resources to help us whenever needed," Angbah said.

According to Susan Zingale-Baird of the OMA, Smith has signed up with all of the email lists of clubs dealing with diversity. Smith also works with the campus Lesbian, Gay, Bisexual and Transgender group (LGBT), campus international student groups and campus women's studies groups.

"As a Bucknellian, [Smith] realizes the importance of the OMA and how we can help impact the experiences that we have here by doing things and having special events on campus," Kellen Smith said. "She feels that it is very important for us to have all of our organizations so that we all have a voice and that we all have as full of a Bucknell experience as possible."

High hopes for class of 2006

Most selective year in campus admissions history draws largest percentage of racially diverse students for University

With applications for admissions at a near-record high and the acceptance rate at a record low, the Class of 2006 represents one of the most competitive and diverse University classes yet. This class is not only racially and geographically diverse, but also full of potential.

A University news release reports that this year's acceptance rate was a record low of 38.6 percent, with the application pool being the second largest in University history at 7,760 applications.

"The acceptance rate has been moving downward (greater selectivity) since the fall of 1997, when it was 54 percent," said Kurt Thiede, vice president for enrollment management. "During this same time, the percentage of students offered admission who enrolled has increased from 23.7 percent to over 30 percent."

Another admissions record was set this year, with the Class of 2006 being the most racially diverse ever.

"Over 14 percent of the members of the Class of 2006 are representatives of the racial diversity found in our nation," Thiede said. "Our nation is becoming more diverse day by day and the world community is getting smaller. In order to provide the best learning environment possible to prepare our graduates for this diverse workplace, Bucknell must diversify its campus community in all areas."

Geographic diversity, similar to that of past years, is fairly high. According to a University news release, 10 percent of University students are from states in the West and Northwest and five percent are from foreign countries.

"We were concerned about the negative impact Sept. 11 might have on our geographic outreach," Dean of Admissions Mark Davies said. "We're pleased by the response we've received from these areas."

First-year student Rebecca Frimenko was drawn to the University because of its friendly atmosphere.

"When I toured the University, I loved the campus. The feeling I got from the people here was really encouraging and welcoming," Frimenko said. "I miss being at home and the familiar feeling of people I've been friends with for years, but Bucknell is starting to be home."

Thiede has high hopes for the Class of 2006.

"I hope that each and every student in the Class of 2006 realizes his or her full potential. Each student certainly has the ability. And, they are enrolled at a university that offers a myriad outstanding opportunities," Thiede said. "The combination of these two things can produce amazing results."

"We want to provide a safe environment but we don't want students to feel that someone is looking over their shoulder," said Strickland.

"A majority of the Uptown staff will be monitoring the first pub night in two weeks. The staff has all been TIPS certified," said Tasha Henderson, manager of Uptown.

The Training for Intervention Procedures (TIPS) programs teach servers, sellers and consumers of alcohol to prevent intoxication, drunk driving and underage drinking.

During these nights all University policies will be followed.

"As always, students who appear visibly drunk will be denied entry," Strickland said.

The decision to allow Uptown to serve alcohol to students of age was well thought-out by University officials. The discussion to permit alcohol at a college nightclub environment began over a year ago. Last spring the University began researching nearby colleges with facilities similar to Uptown. The most comparable school was Gettysburg.

Over the summer, University President Steffen Rogers granted approval for the alcohol served at Uptown.

"So far we seem to be receiving positive feedback and students seem to be excited. [These nights are] a chance for Bucknell students to show they can do this. It's not about getting drunk but having a good time with classmates. Students will hold each other accountable," Conrad said.

"Students will receive emails as the events get closer. There will be free food as well as the usual Uptown menu. We are anticipating a large crowd and hope it will be full and comfortable," Henderson said.

Neither the student activity fee nor the Bucknell Student Government (BSG) can fund the alcohol at Uptown since their funds cannot be used for alcohol. The source of funding is yet to be determined.

The idea for a non-alcoholic space on campus was thought of in 1995. After much research, Swartz Social Space developed into Uptown, which opened in January 2000. Since then it has grown over the past two and a half years to adapt to ideas that exist in the student body.

moment. That will even out later and traffic will flow better," Spencer said. The current internet connection costs roughly $200,000 each year and doubling the capacity would entail doubling the cost. ISR also added a new virus protection system that has been hugely successful.

The new server prevents e-mails with viruses from being sent to campus, from campus, and intercampus.

"The majority of the viruses that get sent around via e-mail just stop right there. On Aug. 26 and Aug. 27, the virus scanner stopped over 8,000 virus files. Those viruses could have done a lot of damage to the campus," said Spencer

Another change ISR has made is that it now requires that all student computers have anti-virus software installed. ISR provides Norton Anti-Virus for free and the Tech Desk can help with installation if necessary.

New IFC Fraternity Rush Policies

On April 16, 2002, the Interfraternity Council (IFC) passed a new recruitment plan emphasizing new policies that are being incorporated into the Fall '02 rush.

—IFC lengthened the overall length of rush from a week and a half to two and a half weeks to accommodate students celebrating the Jewish High Holy days.

—IFC now requires candidates to visit all 12 fraternity houses twice during round one of rush. Candidates will visit four houses each evening until all houses have been visited and then repeat this process. One evening during round one is reserved for candidates to visit the fraternities of their choice.

—After round one, candidates are required to rank their top six fraternity house choices in order to assist fraternities in determining candidate interest.

Baker departs from Greek system

Former Director of Fraternity and Sorority Affairs Roy Baker (left) departed from the University over the summer to accept a vice president position at Catawba College. Shauna Irwin, hired to jointly manage Greek affairs at the University with Baker, will assume most of the Greek responsibilities herself until another Greek director is hired.

A national search has begun to replace Roy Baker, former associate dean of students and director of Fraternity and Sorority Affairs. After nearly six years at the University, Baker left over the summer to join Catawba College as a vice president of student affairs.

Despite Baker's departure, Greek life has not been left without leadership. New Assistant Director for Greek Affairs Shauna Irwin, hired before the University was aware of Baker's future plans, has spent the summer familiarizing herself with both the University and Greek communities. Originally, Baker and Irwin were to work side-by-side this year overseeing the Greek system. The University still plans to establish a two-person administrative team to oversee Greek affairs once Baker's position is filled.

"He [Baker] was sad to leave, but it was too good of an offer to turn down," Dean of Students Richard Ferraro said. "Without him, the Greek Plan for Prominence never would have gotten off the ground. He was an asset to the University and gave his heart and soul to the Greek system."

With the Plan for Prominence firmly in place, Ferraro remains optimistic about the future of Greek life at the University. The search will continue for a new associate dean of Greek life, but in the meantime Ferraro will confidently place the Greek system in the hands of the newcomer Irwin.

"The community has been very warm and welcoming and I can see it in the people and the students," Irwin said. "If the two months I've been here are any indication of things to come, I'm sure I'll enjoy it immensely."

Like Baker, Irwin made the choice to experience Greek life during her undergraduate studies, a decision she calls one of the best in her life. She credits her Greek experience (Zeta Phi Beta) as a driving force behind why she remains involved in Greek affairs today.

As area coordinator/Fraternity and Sorority Life at North Carolina Wesleyan College, Irwin witnessed that Greek system expand from four organizations to seven and add several culturally based groups. Here at the University, she hopes to continue many of the same approaches she used at North Carolina Wesleyan while simultaneously picking up where Baker left off.

"We can always be better—this is not an extremely large Greek community, but there are challenges we do face," Irwin said. One of her main focuses this year will be to serve as a liaison between Greeks and those constituencies affected by Greeks. She cites communication as a major key to maintaining a healthy Greek community.

New smoking policy further restricts use of tobacco on campus

By Chris Styers
Senior Writer

Smoking was officially banned from all University buildings on July 1, marking the culmination of years of research and policy-making designed to promote healthfulness on campus.

"It's a welcome policy," Allison Hoffmann '05 said. "Even though I haven't really noticed smoking in buildings, this ensures buildings will not have lingering smoke odor and contact with cigarette smoke is minimized."

Many students hold similar views, especially in regards to second-hand smoke. The prohibition of smoking in University buildings is not a sudden change, however, it has been a gradual process that began several years ago.

Former Vice President of Finance and Administration Barry Maxwell created a committee aimed at examining the consequences of smoking in the campus community.

Based on the data they collected, the committee recommended a course of action that would limit the permissible locations for smoking. The new policy would be implemented in three main steps: a smoking ban in selected buildings, the removal of smoking from student residences and the prohibiting of smoking in all University buildings.

The goal of this policy would be to "promote the health and safety of all members of the campus community," as is stated in the University's Indoor Smoking Policy.

The health and safety of the campus can easily be jeopardized by unrestricted smoking. Information gathered from the American Cancer Society reveals that smoking and environmental tobacco smoke (ETS), or what is more commonly referred to as second-hand smoke, can cause cancer in the lungs, mouth and esophagus, as well as heart disease, bronchitis and emphysema. The American Cancer Society reports that that "cigarettes kill more Americans than alcohol, car accidents, suicide, AIDS, homicide and illegal drugs."

The U.S. Environmental Protection Agency classifies second-hand smoke as a Group A carcinogen—meaning second hand smoke is categorized with familiar pollutants and cancer causing agents such as asbestos and radon.

"We must protect the environment within which we study, learn, and work," said Jo-Anne Lema, vice president for finance and administration. "We must be attentive to the very real needs and concerns of our students and employees, many of whom are allergic to smoke and/or find it distasteful if not actually harmful to be in a smoke-filled environment."

Although reports since the final stage of implementation of the policy have been mostly positive and supportive, some students believe that this is only the beginning and even more action needs to be taken in regards to smoking on campus.

Adam Clark '05 strongly supports the policy, but believes even more should be done to eliminate smoking.

"Smoking receptacles are too close to the entrance of buildings and many times unwanted smoke still reaches students via open windows," Clark said.

Clark also commented on the cigarette butts that litter high traffic areas on campus. He, as well as others, welcome the new smoking policy and voice the need to continue to take steps to improve the University environment.

Alcohol at Uptown a positive step

When Uptown opened in the spring of 2000, its main purpose was to provide a substance-free venue for University students. Since its opening, the Uptown Committee, with suggestions from the University community, has been working to improve Uptown.

This month, the Uptown Committee will take one more step in attempting to increase the usage and popularity of Uptown. Uptown will have monthly "pub nights" for University students who are 21 and older.

On these nights, students will be allowed up to three complimentary beers, glasses of wine or non-alcoholic beverages. Also, students under the age of 21 will not be permitted to attend.

In the past, low attendance has been a concern at Uptown. Having alcohol is a step in the right direction because it will most likely increase attendance, especially of seniors. If students visit Uptown on alcohol nights, they will hopefully be more inclined to go to alcohol-free events at Uptown.

Uptown provides a club-like atmosphere, which is nearly impossible to find in the Lewisburg area. Students of age can go to the bar or the pub, but other than fraternity parties, which are open by invitation only, there is nowhere students can go to dance. Uptown provides this type of atmosphere almost every weekend, and it is free of charge.

Although alcohol at Uptown will most likely draw a larger audience than it has in the past, the crowd will be restricted to mostly seniors because of age. In fact, approximately three-quarters of University students will not be permitted to take part in the "pub nights."

On alcohol nights, those who are not 21 will not be able to enjoy Uptown for the purpose in which it was created, therefore having one less option to hang out. Yes, students can find other places to go, but Uptown is one of the few places on campus that provides a party-like atmosphere. Students of age can go to the bar or the pub, places that are not even an option for under-age students.

Ultimately, the "pub nights" can be a major success of major failure. The most obvious failure mode would be for of-age students to come to Uptown simply to drink the free alcoholic beverages and then go to their next venue. Not only would this not help Uptown attendance on "pub nights," but it would also not help attendance on alcohol-free nights. If this turns out to be the case, the next rational step for Uptown is to cancel or change the pub night concept.

Either way, it proves that Uptown is proactively identifying where changes need to be made. Providing alcohol at Uptown has the potential to increase Uptown's use among students and make it a more popular place.

Summer filled with outrageous events and poor reporting

By Tom Elliott
Senior Writer

There's no doubt that this summer was rich with interesting news. So before jumping into the new school year, let's briefly reflect on some of the more noteworthy events of the past few months.

Early June, the United States shocked the world when our soccer team beat Portugal in a stunning World Cup upset. This sparked what was to become a great Cinderella story. The success prompted many Americans to become abnormally excited about the sport. Numerous people sacrificed hours of sleep to watch team USA play during the wee hours of the morning. I was at a music festival when they finally lost in the quarter-finals to Germany; keeping the sudden popularity in mind, the management set up an area to view the game. Surprisingly, it was heavily populated, considering most were hippies who had awakened early to watch.

On to a person who probably wasn't cheering for a U.S. soccer victory: John Walker Lindh. Now here is someone who left the States so he could encompass himself within an Islamic state—good for him. But when Pakistan wasn't quite as fundamentalist as he felt the Quran mandated, he moved to Afghanistan. There, he was educated in an al-Qaida terrorist training camp, while enjoying his new life under the more "purist" Taliban. When American troops moved in after Sept. 11, Lindh requested to go to the front lines so that he could assist Taliban/al-Qaida forces. Upon capture, subsequent arrest and trial, he never expressed any remorse.

I don't care too much that he will be out of jail by the time he is 41 (if he makes parole), but I do care that he will be able to spend the rest of his life within the comfort of the United States Our judicial system has become so feckless that it won't even deport citizens who raise arms against our own troops.

Another episode of great disturbance this summer was the fires that ravaged much of Colorado, New Mexico, Oregon and Wyoming. Even today, California is burning. In all, more than six million acres burned to the ground —an area the size of New Hampshire. It's also twice the annual average loss of acreage. Unfortunately, last year also saw unprecedented burning (seven million acres). Naturally, the environmentalists are to blame. During the Clinton administration, the Environmental Protection Agency and the Department of Interior were corrupted by radical environmentalists who opposed fire-preventing techniques at every available opportunity. Controlled burnings and logging could have prevented such unabated burning to happen in the manner that it did. Instead, they insisted upon keeping such wilderness in its "natural" state. Perhaps they were unaware that Indians have been practicing such forest shaping techniques for thousands of years.

While on the subject of good environmental intentions gone bad, in early August, Greenpeace released two photographs that illustrated a large iceberg by Alaska. One was taken around 1900, the other, recently. It showed what seemed to be a clear melting of the iceberg. Many publications quickly printed the pictures, hoping to show the need for human intervention to combat climate change. A couple weeks later, it was revealed that the iceberg had actually melted around 1930.

Retractions were generally either non-existent or buried deep within the papers. Of course, let us not forget the tragic kidnappings that occurred. While each case was barbaric and unfortunate, the media reported the stories like kids were being snatched up like fish in a stocked pond. The reality was, of course, much different. The total number of cases for the year is at 100 right now, which is actually down from 200-300 annually during the 1980s.

While each case was barbaric and unfortunate, the media reported stories like kids were being snatched up like fish in a stocked pond.

A market for child LoJack-type bracelets boomed, even though there's still a greater risk in taking your kid to the doctor than there is of your kid being kidnapped.

Finally, the recent journalism techniques of The New York Times, warrants comment. Howell Raines is their editor-in-chief, formerly editor of their editorial page-(a page that I doubt anyone would consider anything but liberal-slanted). His promotion means he now calls the shots on what goes on the front page. This is fine, so long as he keeps the stories to the standard Who, What, Where, When, Why and How aspects of a news story. Instead, he has allowed his personal biases to affect the decision making. Most specifically, this is seen in the Times' anti war-with-Iraq crusade.

Mid-August, story they ran a front page titled, "Top Republicans break with Bush on Iraq strategy." The meat-and-potatoes for the article was Henry Kissinger, who they claimed had come out against a preemptive strike. This was, however, nothing less than a lie. The former Secretary of State had actually broken with his long-standing tradition of a no first strike policy to accept Bush's strategy. He wrote in the Washington Post: "The terrorist threat transcends the nation-state; it derives in large part from transnational groups that, if they acquire weapons of mass destruction, could inflict catastrophic, even irretrievable, damage."

Two weeks earlier, they printed another motive-sketchy front page story. This one observed that a war would negatively impact an already sluggish economy (sound the alarm!). What wasn't reported was the probable economic impact of another terrorist strike, or the economic benefit of a liberated Iraq.

Government displays patriotism in wrong area

By Josh Fisher
Opinions Editor

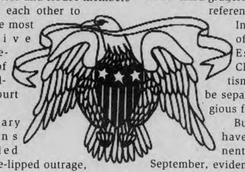
"Ridiculous," President George W. Bush sneered. "One of the most asinine things I have ever heard," House Majority Leader Dick Army grumbled. "Nuts," Senate Majority Leader Tom Daschle ridiculed.

But in 1954, godless communists dominated our nightmare, and "under God" was inserted into the Pledge of Allegiance in order to weed these extremists out; Dwight Eisenhower wrapped himself in a religious cloak and signed the phrase "In God We Trust" into law, which was to replace the national motto, E Pluribus Unum, a Latin phrase meaning Out of Many, One.

Having third-graders daily repeat 'one nation under God' is not a solution to the troubling ills that plague this nation or the world.

The decision of the court, however, was not as interesting as the nation's reaction to it.

Within moments, politicians of both stripes were falling over one another to prove just how religiously devout and patriotic they are. Senators and House members vied with each other to deliver the most derisive denouncements of the appellate court decision.



Ordinary citizens responded with white-lipped outrage, as if the very pursuit of religious life in America were under siege—an absurd notion in a nation whose Attorney General, John Ashcroft, regularly composes Christian songs for his staff to sing; a nation where politicians use the subject of faith as a main avenue to garner votes.

Senator Robert Byrd, a Democrat from West Virginia, who was the only current remaining member of Congress who voted for the addition of "under God" to the Pledge in 1954, stated "I hope the Senate will waste no time in throwing this back in the face of this stupid judge." Soon after this statement, the Senate passed a resolution 99-0 expressing symbolic support for the Pledge.

The public outcry against the court's decision reflects a definitive reversion to the primitive struggles of the past in which such disputes resulted in some of humanity's most violent episodes. These theoretical arguments, thought resolved during the European Enlightenment, heavily influenced the founding fathers and they should not be squandered in a fearful reaction to a perceived national threat, historical or present. When faith based elements replace notions of logic and rationality in the affairs of nations, cycles of religious one-upmanship, "my god is bigger than your god," seem inevitable.

Having third-graders daily repeat "one nation under God" is not a solution to the troubling ills that plague this nation or this world. Rote references to monotheism every morning will not really forge decent, compassionate human beings out of children. The highest ideals of this country—freedom, justice, and equality—really do not depend on these third-graders making these references.

In the parlance of the Establishment Clause, patriotism can certainly be separated from religious faith.

But such displays have been prominent since last September, evidenced in the deluge of attempts to prove the authenticity of their patriotism and piety. Politicians may not realize that there are more tangible ways of expressing such convictions, if so inclined, than mere symbolic demonstrations and pseudo-simplistic cures.

The U.S. government throws hundreds of billions of dollars towards a constant military buildup while giving our educational system short shrift. We abide stolen civil liberties in the name of greater national security. We endure greedy corporate criminals and their political crony counterparts who steal billions of dollars (even with "In God We Trust" emblazoned on them!). Then when the company goes under, corporate heads fire their employees. Our hands are bloodstained with a perpetual war waged against human and non-human animals alike.

Too bad Americans can't work up a head of outrage over that.

Juvenile executions believed to be cruel and unusual punishment

By Elisabeth Salemme
Writer

Prompted by the recent execution of death row inmate Thomas M. Patterson of Texas, who was 17 when he killed a cousin in 1995, three Supreme Court justices advised the court last Wednesday to reevaluate the allowance of sentencing juveniles to death. The suggestion by Justice Stephen Breyer, Justice Ruth Bader Ginsberg and Justice John Paul Stevens must be immediately considered by the Supreme Court, for the execution of juveniles is highly unjust and unconstitutional.

If a 16- or 17-year olds are not eligible to vote because of their juvenile state of mind then they should not be given the most extreme punishment possible

The decision of the Atkins v. Virginia case that went before the Supreme Court in June,banned the execution of the mentally retarded. The Supreme Court decided the mentally retarded act upon their impulses and, more-often than not, are followers rather than leaders. The same characteristics of the mentally retarded frequently apply to children. Federal law should ban the execution of the mentally retarded as well as juveniles.

According to the Death Penalty Information Center in Washington, D.C., of the 38 states that permit the death penalty, 16 set the minimum age at the time the crime was committed at 18, five set the minimum age at 17 and the other 17 states set the minimum age at 16. Whereas the Eighth Amendment of the constitution bans cruel and unusual punishment, the 1989 case, Stanford v. Kentucky, held that no consensus existed on the subject of the death penalty's constitutionality. Although the death penalty for responsible, knowing adults may not be a question of constitutionality, it is certainly a question for children, who are minors until they reach the age of 18.

American citizens under the age of 18 are not granted the right to vote because they are not considered responsible or mature enough to make such decisions. If 16- or 17-year-olds are not eligible to vote, based on their juvenile state of mind, then they should not receive the most extreme form of punishment possible when their actions are still considered those of minors.

Parental accountability, especially for 16-year-olds, should play a major role in the reconsideration of the death penalty for minors. If a child is capable of such a crime that would warrant capital punishment, it is highly unlikely that there would not be warning signs present in the child's behavior. If signs are detected, it is the parents' responsibility to seek their child immediate professional help.

Minors are still going through adolescence, which can be the most difficult period of a person's life. Teen-agers are often cruel, and make others feel isolated and alone, which often results in deep depression and anger. Whereas an 18-year-old is an adult and should be able to control his or her emotions and seek help, 16 and 17-year-olds are still vulnerable, and like the mentally retarded, may act on impulses or follow the ideals of a group that promotes violence or terror. It is, again, an adult responsibility to recognize that there is a problem.

The Supreme Court's decision to reexamine the laws that allow juveniles to be executed is a wise one. The Supreme Court must recognize the unconstitutionality of the current law and set the mandatory minimum age to be sentenced to death 18.

Appropriate Usage Policy is hypocritical

By Amanda Nogic
Writer

I have droves of friends in my hometown insanely jealous of my current situation. As a first-year college student, they are almost foaming at the mouth with jealousy at the opportunities I have through my enrollment here at the University. They envy the lax lifestyle, the general freedom in class choice and the basic fact that I basically get to do whatever I want.

My homebound friends are especially jealous of the fact that I have access to an insanely fast connection to the Internet and the network.

It sounds dorky enough, but I gloated to them that I would be able to download entire songs in one second while they would be at home for 20 minutes waiting for their lackluster 56K connection to get the last few notes of a song. I reveled in the fact that I would probably double my CD collection for a fraction of what my unfortunate younger counterparts would end up paying at the local music store. It seemed all part of the privilege of being a college student.

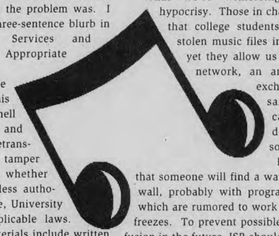
As moving day came and passed, and I finally got the chance to tinker around on my lovely new Dell, the shockwave hit me. My KaZaa would not work.

After a few frustrating restarts, I started asking my hallmates what the problem was. I quickly learned of a three-sentence blurb in the Information Services and Resources' (ISR) Appropriate Use Policy (AUP):

"Do not violate copyright laws. This includes using Bucknell computing facilities and resources to receive, retransmit, duplicate, destroy, or tamper with software or data, whether stored or transmitted, unless authorized by copyright, license, University policy and all other applicable laws. Examples of protected materials include written material, sound files, pictures, photos, animations, and software not originally created by you."

I struggled to understand this. According to ISR, I am not allowed to download songs or other materials copyrighted to people other than myself unless I have their permission. Yet I am allowed to access the network through the University, where other students possess hoards of music files that are easily copied and pasted into my own computer's music folders. But we're not allowed to download. Ha.

What we're witnessing here is pure hypocrisy. Those in charge have to know that college students carry dozens of stolen music files in their computers, yet they allow us to connect to the network, an arena full of free exchange of these very same files. Why can't we simply download these songs for ourselves?



I know for a fact that someone will find a way around this firewall, probably with programs like Blubster, which are rumored to work past downloading freezes. To prevent possible disciplinary confusion in the future. ISR should take swift action and remove the aforementioned clause from the AUP. Not doing so only promotes a gray area in dealing with disciplinary issues. Streamlining the policy would eliminate the hypocrisy from the AUP, and make University computing much more rewarding to the student body.

Transgendered face difficult issues

By Philip Martoma
Senior Writer

My women's and gender studies professor asked me in class a few days ago during discussion to consider a men's issue, as we had focused on women's issues that day. One student broached the topic of reverse discrimination, and how in some ways (especially with regard to college admissions) it seems that straight white men have it harder than anyone. It seems there is a new consensus from several of my peers that straight white men are becoming a new minority.

I do not entirely agree with this sentiment and have much to say on the topic, but I will save that for another article. This comment did catalyze my thinking about what are some issues of oppression men face, and as a gay man of color I was able to come up with something. Gloria Allred, a high profile attorney, has recently taken on the case of "Sandy," a person who, although born with male genitalia, identifies as a woman. "Sandy" applied to a beauty school and after being interviewed and accepted was later rejected after the discovery of the history of her sexual identity. Apparently it wasn't enough that she appeared female to this all-girls school or that she considered herself to be a woman. Instead, there was still concern by the administration as to where she would go to the restroom.

Interestingly enough, the administration chose this as its reason for denying her application. Though, she did try to accommodate their concerns by saying that she would go wherever they instructed her to go, or even leave the campus to "answer nature's call" she was still denied entrance to the beauty school.

First I would have to say that this beauty school has already lost the rational high ground to their arguments in that she already agreed to go wherever they told her. Had they a concern that she would disrupt the other ladies' education by sitting in her stall then they could have sent her to the men's room. The only other qualm they could have then have to be based on the fact that "Sandy" is a transgender and that would be illegal. Still, "Sandy" was willing to protect the school from such a lawsuit by doing her business elsewhere entirely, which was not acknowledged as viable. We must then conclude that the school does not consider her to identify as a female enough to make her an acceptable applicant. Thus, the presence of her male genitalia is a problem and thus she is being discriminated against as male.

Transgender issues are hard to understand often because they are mixed into such a gray area and hard to define as a gender. Although I have referred to her throughout this article as a woman as a form of respect and courtesy on my part, she has often been described as a man throughout the media.

On a brief appearance on the "O'Reilly Factor," Bill O'Reilly clearly felt a little ashamed (something I've never seen) to try and hard press her with questions. She sheepishly looked to Allred, her lawyer, throughout the interview. Which brings up another question of oppression as it relates to transgenders.

Oftentimes, transgenders find they are not taken seriously by peers without living up to some sort of hyper-effeminized version of their personality. Steven Makintosh addressed this issue when playing Kim Foyle (a post-operative transsexual) in the movie "Different For Girls." In the movie, she reported that her psychologist said that she was not serious about wanting an operation because she had shown up in blue jeans for her session. In order to be deemed as truly having an identity crisis she then started taking on a more effeminate lifestyle, acting more "appropriately."

Many other transsexuals have reported similar instances. Not only is this is a form of sexism, but it is also a men's issue as men are being asked to live up to a certain standard of feminine behavior to cast off their masculine identity. In the case of "Sandy," she will not be accepted by either O'Reilly or the media until she lives up to their hyper-effeminate expectations. That is the battle Allred is fighting for. Meanwhile, all "Sandy" wants to do is go school.

Sexual assault should be judged differently

By Katie Parker
Senior Writer

Sexual assault is a particularly problematic crime because in many cases it does not meet the courtroom standards of corroborative evidence. Although sexual assault victims may be bruised, have witnesses to their assault or have evidence that they were drugged against their will, in some cases (and especially on college campuses), it may happen independent of any of these factors. Then it becomes a case based purely on the testimony of the accuser reporting that he or she did not consent to sexual relations with the accused. Many college campuses have recently begun to see this "he said/she said" justice as a "credibility contest," and have begun to implement programs (such as the recent program adopted unanimously by Harvard University) to prevent these types of uncorroborated accusations. These programs require students to present preliminary evidence of sexual assault before the case is brought before a full judiciary board.

This type of system is set up in order to prevent false accusations of rape from filtering through a process meant only for truthful complaints. Preliminary charges will allow the judicial board to decide whether or not the accusations are grounded in any real evidence before a student is actually indicted in the crime. Presumably, this is to prevent students from being slandered by fabricated rape charges. This assumption rests primarily on the grounds that rape charges are sometimes false, and therefore must meet a burden of proof before they care worthy of consideration.

Statistics show that approximately 17.7 million women and 2.78 million men in the United States have been the victims of attempted or completed sexual assault.

I agree that this issue is extremely problematic and complex given that it deals with the individual rights and freedoms of students in both positions: accuser and accused. I do not challenge the notion that any individual has the right to a fair trial, and that the burden of proof should be met by the individual bringing the charges against that person. As I stated before, sexual assault can be a particularly difficult crime to prove, especially considering that in some cases, it is virtually impossible to determine by the physical evidence if the act is consensual or not. In those specific cases where corroborating evidence is impossible to provide, the individual who has been sexually assaulted is left without the possibility of confronting his or her attacker, and certainly he or she is deprived of the opportunity to bring that person to justice. Given that so much is at stake for both sides of this equation, it is important to examine the consequences of such a policy for the institutions that choose to implement it.

First of all, statistically it has been shown that false reports of rape are extremely rare. The FBI has reported that false reports of rape are not higher than false reports of any other crimes. According to this study, 3-8 percent of rapes reported in the United States are false accusations. This means that 92-97 percent of the time, the individual reporting the rape is telling the truth. Other statistics show that approximately 17.7 million women and 2.78 million men in the United States have been the victims of attempted or completed sexual assault. Statistics also show that only 42 percent of victims actually report or seek help for their sexual assault. Is it possible that the reason that many sexual assaults go unreported is because of the inherent difficulty in legally proving that you were sexually assaulted?

Although in many ways I understand and support the reasoning behind Harvard's policy shift, I wonder what negative consequences may result from the institution's decision. They have not only made it more difficult to report a sexual assault, but they have set a standard that it is possible to commit assault freely without needing to worry about being punished. Is the trade-off worth it? Will the institution benefit from less false accusations, but suffer from a lack of providing justice and support for students who have been sexually assaulted yet cannot meet the burden of proof? Indeed, it is important to examine whether or not these standards will confuse the presently coherent and clear policies on sexual assault—that sex without consent, regardless of whether or not it is malicious, violent or under the influence of drugs, is wrong and a punishable offense.

Letter to the editor

To the Editor:

Though I am not often in the habit of writing letters to the editor in any publications, I did feel the need as an active alumnus of the University, and a member of the Alumni Board, to share a couple of observations with University students who are approaching the "work world" in earnest.

Bucknell's Career Development (CDC) office has initiated a new "tool" to facilitate the job search process for its students, which are area sponsored job fairs at strategic places and times of the year. Last spring, I participated in the initial offering for the Chicago area, which was held over the 2001 Christmas break. Attendance was limited, but it was a start, and I commend the CDC for undertaking the event.

My intent, through this letter, is to urge the seniors and juniors at the University to make use of these opportunities. I serve as the vice president of human resources for a large multi-national corporation responsibility for building up our ranks of new "academic graduates" who show potential to grow into our middle management positions. My experience over the last seven years as we have pursued these outstanding performers at the University, and its various sister institutions, has confirmed for me the power of networking and personal contact in this process. Of course, you as an applicant are judged first and foremost on your academic and leadership record, but trust me, do not ever downplay the power of personal contact in the process. Multi-national companies, such as ours, give considerable weight to how we believe you can fit into a multi-cultural environment. That judgment alone can never be made on the basis of paper—particularly if that paper is marginal at best. Thus, the role of personal contact is of paramount importance to your process. You will also never obtain that advantage through the recruitment Websites that are marketed to you as the "answer" to your job search worries.

I can't urge you enough to seize any of the network, opportunities that are offered to you by your CDC. Also, get an early start, its still going to be one tough job market for new graduates over the next few years.

Sincerely,
J.K. MacKendree Day

Logging wins over controlled burns; Bush outlines his latest environmental policies

By Charles Mitchell
Senior Writer

With this summer's legacy of forest fires and a controversial U.N. summit on sustainable development, the environment is a sensitive and popular issue at the moment.

President George W. Bush gestures while surrounded by burned trees as he tours the site of the Squires forest fire near Ruch, Ore., on Aug. 22, 2002.

At the end of August, President George W. Bush made waves by calling for more logging in order to prevent another year of six-plus million acres of charred woodlands.

Standing in front of the smoldering Squires Peaks fire in southern Oregon, Bush declared that, "We need to thin, to make [forests] healthy by using common sense . . . it makes sense to clear brush."

He blamed current restrictions on clearing brush for providing fuel for wildfires. As he put it, "We need to understand, if you let kindling build up and there's a lightning strike, you're going to get yourself a big fire."

The president added that there is too much "red tape" and bureaucracy surrounding forestry policy and announced his intent to limit "endless litigation," alluding to lawsuits filed by environmental groups. Observers noted that Bush seemed to know that environmental groups would not approve of his "Healthy Forests" initiative, and they were correct.

The Wilderness Society, the Sierra Club and other groups quickly released a counterproposal calling for planned burns instead of logging, and many accused Bush of providing a "giveaway" for the logging industry. The president does not frame the issue in those terms, but he has been quick to note that increased logging would mean more jobs--as many as 100,000, according to the BBC--in these uncertain economic times.

Many state governors were on hand for Bush's speech, even Bush's chief foe in the 2000 Republican primary, Senator John McCain (R-Ariz.), who supported the "Healthy Forests" initiative. The president's supporters pointed out in particular that Senate Majority Leader Tom Daschle (D-S.D.) recently snuck a logging regulation exemption for his home state into a bill; an exemption which has effects very similar to what the president proposed.

Shortly after Bush's speech, the U.N. World Conference on Sustainable Development opened in Johannesburg, South Africa. The president actually refused to attend the conference, sending in his stead Secretary of State Colin Powell.

After rejecting ratification of the Kyoto Protocol earlier in his presidency, Bush has not been seen as very receptive to the United Nations' environmental agenda.

Republicans are not the only ones who are upset with the Johannesburg summit. Many progressive activists have complained about the extravagance of the conference, according to the Associated Press.

The summit's 45 000 delegates, who reportedly ignored the recycling bins placed in meeting rooms, will generate 400 000 tons of trash. Flying the delegates around the world will also generate approximately 300 000 tons of carbon dioxide, a greenhouse gas. They will also consume an estimated five million sheets of paper.

The delegates are also eating the finest food and drink in a building surrounded by the poor--a phenomenon which many poverty activists find quite problematic, and not at all indicative of a sustainable level of environmental activity.

U.S. desire for oil hidden behind Iraqi military threat

By Michael Dudzinski
Writer

Now that the war in Afghanistan has come to an end and a United States-friendly puppet regime is in place, President George W. Bush seeks to accomplish what his father failed to do during the Gulf War. Ousting Saddam will undoubtedly be a difficult task, yet Bush is determined to complete it at all costs.

The campaign will not be any easier this time around. Adding hardship to the Bush administration's campaign is the mounting skepticism of the general public, our allies and even the president's cabinet. The high-risk operation would drag a peaceful nation into war to justify the hidden agenda to conquer Iraqi oil fields. Most Americans oppose the movement to allow a sitting president to remove the government of a country that does not pose a threat to the United States.

B&P Commentary

According to CNN, Secretary of State Colin Powell and Iraqi President Saddam Hussein have suggested that the U.N. inspectors return to Iraq. During the 1990s, when U.N. officials were still inspecting Iraqi facilities, no one reported any activity that posed a threat to the United States. With U.N. inspectors reinstated in Iraq, it could be made certain that the country would not become a threat.

So why must the White House seek to perpetuate another war with Iraq, this time also replacing Saddam with a puppet regime? The only logical explanation is to conquer the rich Iraqi oil reserves. It is no wonder why big oil mongers like Bush, Vice President Dick Cheney and National Security Advisor Condoleeza Rice support a regime change in Iraq.

'The war on terror' encompasses a subliminal agenda among the Bush clan to amass great fortune by installing puppet regimes in the oil-rich Mideast that are complacent to U.S . oil interests.

If one backtracks to the Afghanistan scenario, the removal of the Taliban regime was ultimately justified by national defense. It should not be forgotten that the Taliban refused to allow U.S. oil executives to run a multi-billion dollar pipeline through Afghanistan. It was approved after the Taliban was removed.

What all this means is that this "war on terror" involves more than just the obvious. It encompasses a subliminal agenda among the Bush clan to amass great fortune by installing puppet regimes in the oil-rich Mideast that are complacent to U.S. oil interests.

It is quite evident why our allies and even some members of the Bush team are hesitant to oust Saddam. The risk is high and those in power do not want to sacrifice their accountability as well as national and global security for the potential benefit of the elite.

Pushing the Bush propaganda machine aside, war will only perpetuate anti-U.S. sentiment as well as terrorism. When our government stops oppressing and interfering with other countries is when the terrorists will go home. Terror cannot be fought by creating more terror.

Crisis of confidence plagues American economy

By Michael Neibauer
Senior Writer

Since last spring, the volatile economic and political environment has yet to recover from the weakness of uncertainty. The outcomes from the Enron and WorldCom outrages have yet to be resolved by congressional investigations and subsequent much-needed legislation. The New York Times reported of one WorldCom executive getting what amounts to $11 million dollars in legal kickbacks of hot stock information on 21 different occasions from investment bankers. This report has cooled investor confidence to say the least. The idea that there are two sets of rules for investors ("the privileged" and "the average") has infected the market strategies of many participants.

Uncertainty is the enemy of financial markets and we have plenty to spare.

This type of news and the previous scarcity of any arrests or meaningful property seizures have contributed to the general meltdown of confidence and the financial markets. Unemployment has begun to creep up again because job creation has failed to materialize since capital spending is slack. This is due to slowly recovering profits. Most recently the 15,000 jobs eliminated by the failure of Consolidated Freightways and the 4,000 layoffs at IBM added to the downturn. This abusive atmosphere has forced many smaller investors out of the fluctuating stock market and into savings accounts and the bond market.

On the political front, imported oil prices have gone up as the debate over the proposal of a preemptive attack by the United States on Iraq. The saber rattling by Vice President Dick Cheney and some "hawkish" administration members directly contribute to these market conditions. The war talk not only increases tensions in the Middle East, but also places a three to five dollar premium on the price of imported oil per barrel above the actual normal value in the commodity markets. As this dialogue continues, the increased price for heating oil and oil at the local pump will certainly show up. This will further confuse and confound productivity and the economic outlook.

B&P Commentary

Uncertainty is the enemy of financial markets and we have plenty to spare. September and October (traditionally risky for markets) are going to be tough months as we draw close to the November congressional elections. Perhaps President George W. Bush can clear away some of this gloom and uncertainty on Sept. 12 when he speaks to the United Nations. The president has painted himself into a corner on the Iraqi question with his own rhetoric since last September. He must now not just be morally clear on a preemptive strike, but must prove his case by providing specific evidence for a preemptive strike. With little support from our traditional allies, Bush's U.N. speech can be a strong determinant for the economy and his political career for the next two years.

U.N. Summit tries to balance environmental, economic progress

By Dana Binnendijk
Writer

The world today needs to balance a strong economy with environmental stability. Nations and their people must pursue economic goals carefully if environmental stress is to be kept within the earth's threshold of tolerance.

The means of achieving this goal was discussed at the U.N. World Summit on Sustainable Development, which culminated in Johannesburg, South Africa this week.

More than 100 world leaders attended the meeting.

Countries with power and wealth, such as the United States, hope to maintain their high standard of living and strong economic growth while poorer nations work to boost their economies.

The Summit's goal is to improve living conditions around the world while increasing protection of the environment. Specifically, governments are agreeing to increase the number of people who have access to clean water, proper sanitation and modern energy services, such as electricity, while at the same time promoting a healthy environment and protecting the world's biodiversity and ecosystems.

Many environmental groups expressed disappointment with the results of the meeting, saying that we have moved a step backward and are worse off than we were nine days ago.

Mark Malloch Brown, administrator for the U.N. Development Program, disagrees.

"If you judge this summit for its new architecture for the world's environment and development, then yes, it certainly failed to provide that. But if you look at this summit as a bricklayers' summit where the world came to some agreements on how to build the structure, then there were some accomplishments that are worth noting," Malloch Brown said in a Washington Post article.

Howard crumbles in mammoth routing

Bucknell made Howard look foolish in a 7-3 romping in their season opener, but fell 1-0 to St. Francis the next day

Eric Graham—The Bucknellian

Though the Bison outshot St. Francis 23-7, they failed to make the shots that counted and fell 1-0 after a 7-3 victory over Howard the day before.

By Dave Cohen
Senior Writer

The Bucknell women's soccer team kick-started the season with a victory against Howard in a tremendous fashion on Aug. 31. Led by Megan Farrell '05, who netted two goals in the first half of play, the Bison coasted to a 7-3 home victory. Farrell wasted no time as she scored the first goal 5:34 into the first half, which set the tone for the Bison for the game and perhaps the season.

In a first half that was predominantly controlled by Bucknell, Michelle Santonacita '05 received a pass from Lauren Schwartz '03 and sent the ball through the goal to provide the Bison with a 2-0 padding at 21:44. Farrell's second goal from just inside the box came with 20:36 remaining in the half, which opened up a 3-0 BU advantage.

Although Howard's Raneika Bean attempted to keep her squad competitive by scoring once midway through the half and again with 2:29 remaining, the Orange and Blue proved to have too much firepower. After tallying two additional goals, Bucknell stormed into the half with a commanding 5-2 lead thanks to Margaret Emmitt '06, who was assisted by Ashley Dinscher '05, and Tara Utchel '03.

Utchel felt that it was imperative to win the first game by a significant margin because the squad's success from its previous season made the team reputable and has placed it under a scope this year.

"I think it was extremely important that we came out and made a statement because everyone is watching us really closely because we are defending our title. Anything that we do is going to impact the way teams look at us," Utchel said.

Less than eight minutes into the second half, the Bison continued to pour it on as Schwartz got involved again, this time with a goal. Rachel Prowler '06 got herself into the action as well, as she assisted Emily Keber '03 for the team's seventh and final goal. Keber was relieved to get the first game out of the way and look ahead to another potential league championship season.

"[The win] feels good," Keber said. "Obviously, we have something to prove this year and it's good that we have the first one under our belts. I am really excited for the remainder of the year. We are all really close friends and I am looking forward to success. We have three great captains and we look to them for leadership."

One captain, Schwartz, feels obligated to set the tone for the team regardless of the activity. Although she got the team going with an early assist in the first half and scored a goal early in the second half, she stressed that being a leader off the field is as important as it is on the field.

"Our goal in the second half was to not let them score on us," Schwartz said. "I wanted to let the team know that we still had another 45 minutes to play. I think as a senior and as a captain it is important to set an example for the underclassmen. Whether it's at practice or fooling around I want to set an example of doing things 100 percent. If they see me working hard it will push them to work hard as well."

Utchel also spoke briefly about maturing into a leader.

"I feel like last year I just followed the seniors' lead even though I was a captain, too," she said. "Now I am more experienced and I know the team looks up to me."

The Bison defense, which was formidable last year, continued its excellence in this first match-up of the season as it allowed starting goalie Laurie Purse '03 to face only three shot attempts in the first half. Kelly Kannen '05, who replaced Purse in the second half, saved two shots.

Bucknell (1-0, 0-0) returned to action Tuesday as it hosted Saint Francis of Pennsylvania.

Football squad enters season with high hopes

By Cory Nadler
Senior Writer

A Patriot League title is all that is on the minds of Bucknell's football team, after they were chosen to come in fourth in the league standings. After finishing with a 6-4 record last year, the Bison open their 2002 season against the Duquesne Dukes on Saturday, Sept. 7, in Pittsburgh.

The Bison have a strong core of seniors returning this season, especially on the defensive line. Defensive tackle Adam Lord '03 was picked as the Patriot League's pre-season defensive player of the year. Lord had an outstanding season in 2001, recording 42 tackles, five of them sacks. The Bison will be counting on their defensive line to set the tone for a team that has endless potential.

"I am very confident in the defense," kicker Chris Lundberg '03 said.

"The defensive coaches are really intense, and are doing a great job with the guys," Ken Lockard '03 said.

On the offensive side of the ball, the Bison have their veteran quarterback, Todd Wenrich '03, returning for his second season as a starter.

"Wenrich is a mastermind with the offense," tight end Lockard said.

With a new offensive coordinator, Kurt Beathard, Wenrich will be running a more complex offense, a task he has proved he can handle.

Wenrich will be working with many of the same scoring weapons that he became accustomed to last season. Wide outs Albert Marquardt '04 and Jim Horan '04 both return, and should prove to be trouble for opposing secondaries. The Bison have two veteran fullbacks returning in Todd Warmington '03 and Matt Kawczenski '03, and both have the talent to be big contributors for the offense this season. They will be blocking for Jess Brinson '04, who saw a good amount of action last season, and Raphael Darrington '05, who has emerged as a player with a lot of promise in the backfield.

The Bison kick off the season with new players, new uniforms and a new look offense led by Coach Kurt Beathard.

The Bison graduated all but one starter from the dominating offensive line from last season.

"If we are up against a defensive line that is real experienced then we will have to grow up real quick," lineman Joe Bering '04 said. "Gaining confidence early will be key."

The success of the offense will rest heavily on the shoulders of the young offensive line.

"As long as we get it done up front, we should be as good as ever," lineman Jon Scharf '04 said. "We had a good camp, and I think we will surprise a lot of people."

The Bison have gone through a lot of changes on the coaching staff. Dave Kotulski has stepped in for Head Coach Tom Gadd, who is recovering from health problems. Gadd has been at the helm for the Bison for the past seven seasons, and the players have had to work together to help their coach through hard times.

"It is tough on the team, but coach Gadd is tough-willed, and everybody is pulling together," Lundberg said.

The coaching staff has also gotten younger in the off season with the addition of some new assistant coaches.

"The new young coaches are very enthusiastic, and the guys relate well to them. They are doing a great job," Lundberg said.

The Bucknell squad will look to rally together in order to prove its critics wrong this season.

"Once we get into league play we will have to take it one game at a time, everything will be close," Scharf said.

"Right now, we are the underdogs of the league, but I think we are going to surprise some people," Lundberg said.

Men's crew keeps head above water

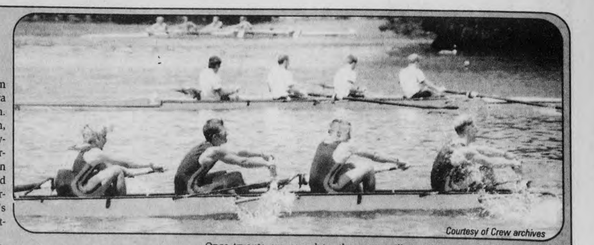
By Ben Pfeiffer
Writer

One year ago, the men of the University's varsity crew team was unsure its program would still exist this fall. In order to satisfy the NCAA's mandate for gender equity, the men's crew program was forced to endure a restrictive roster cap that could have meant the end for a team that thrives on annual growth and expansion. With the hard work and determination of team alumni and current rowers, a solution was developed in the form of a completely new athletic classification, club-varsity.

Working closely with University administration, members of the crew community developed the new classification in an effort to give growing club programs the opportunity to expand and compete without the handicap of limited roster sizes. Under the club-varsity classification, the men's crew program will also have new fundraising opportunities to complement perennial favorites like Rent-A-Rower, as well as access to many of the same benefits enjoyed by varsity athletes at the University.

With all of these new elements in place, the team is poised to begin a new era of growth and national level competition. Under the direction of a new head coach, Derek Updegraff '93, the team began tryouts this past Monday, following an interest meeting last Sunday evening. With an initial turnout of almost 50 men and women interested in rowing or coxing during the coming season, the team's prospects look excellent for a very competitive fall.

"I'm very confident that with the performances we've seen so far from the guys that have tried out, we will have a very large, very competitive novice squad by the end of the week," Team Captain Brian Albert '03 said.



Courtesy of Crew archives

Once tryouts are complete, the team will spend most of September and October training intensively on the Susquehanna River in preparation for their first race in Philadelphia on Oct. 26.

Men take 3-2 OT win over Robert Morris

Senior Brian Johnson will help to lead the men's soccer team past a disappointing season last year.

By Dave Cohen

The men's soccer team opened the 2002 season with a thrilling 3-2 overtime win against Robert Morris College on Saturday, Aug. 31. Eric Brunton '06 started his collegiate career off on the right foot, scoring a goal and assisting another.

"We played well, which is something we have struggled with on opening day in the past," Head Coach Brendan Nash said. "The first half we had control of the game. We came out very strong which was our game plan. It was Robert Morris' home opener and we had a four-hour bus ride so we could not afford to start flat."

The Bison got on the board midway through the first half. Chris Beekman '04 laid a pass off to Brunton, who then found Ori Adrabi '05 in front of the net for a 1-0 lead. The Orange and the Blue dominated the first 45 minutes of play and earned another goal from Brunton just four minutes later. John Hemmert '05 chipped the ball to Brunton, who sprung from the Colonial's defense and shot the ball between the goalie's legs and into the back of the net.

"It's my job as a forward to score goals," Brunton said. "I was just doing my job."

"Our two center midfielders, Nick Taylor '03 and Ori Adrabi, dictated the flow of the whole game," Nash said. "They both played great offensively and defensively. We went up 2-0 on two nice goals from Adrabi and Eric Brunton."

Bucknell's shutout in the first half was stripped away from them with a Colonial goal at the 7:12 minute marker. The Bison, in hopes of a third goal, got caught in their offensive third of the field resulting in a 2-1 score before the half.

The second half of the game remained scoreless until a penalty kick was called against the Bison with 9:29 remaining in the match. The Colonials were able to put the ball past the Bison's goalie, Adam Edwards '06 to tie the game at two. Both teams remained to scoreless for the rest of the game and headed into overtime.

"The whole overtime we high-pressured Robert Morris and kept the play in their half. With about 1:30 to go the Colonials had a counter attack breakaway and Adam Edwards made the save of the game. From the save we countered," Nash said. "Ori put freshman Scott Visnic in on a breakaway. The goalkeeper came out, got the ball and upended Visnic. Jon Hemmert saved the ball from going out and served a ball far post to Nick Taylor. Nick did a great job of keeping the ball in play heading it back to the penalty spot. At this time Visnic had gotten off the ground and made a run to the penalty spot and flicked the winner into the net."

The Bison finished the game with a 3-2 win and commenced the season with a record of 1-0. The players are pleased with their play and hope to continue to play well throughout the season.

"We got off to a good start," Alex Far '05 said. "We came out with urgency and stepped it up in overtime. That builds character on the team and it showed how hard we work day in and day out."

The Orange and Blue expect to make good things happen this year. The team's depth has increased with the new addition of the freshman class and the leadership is stronger than it has been in the past.

"We have big expectations this year. Last year we had great skill but lacked chemistry and intensity," Nash said. "The team is different because everyone now understands we can only win on skill and hard work not one or the other. Last season left a bad taste in our mouths, because everyone knew we were better than our record. This year we want to prove not only was last year a fluke, but we have improved dramatically. The Patriot League is up for grabs once again and I believe we have just as good of chance as anyone to win the trophy."

There are five new first-year students added to the 2002 roster. The coaching staff believes that all five will have a strong impact on the men's program for the next four years. The coaches are also depending on the three captains to help lead the young squad to become a fortified force.

"King is the leader of the defense. He is a smart player and quietly leads in the little ways. Taylor is our center midfielder," Nash said. "He is the engine of the team. He leads the play every day (offensively and defensively) in practice and games and shows others what we need. Ryan is the emotional leader of the group. In practice and games he is always giving 100 percent and asking/demanding the same of his teammates.

"Between the three of them we cover all of the different personalities on the team. It is also important that the rest of the program is willing to be led. We have put our egos aside for the better of the team this year. We have great leaders, but it is a group of student-athletes who want to be led to a championship, which makes the captains job easier and more rewarding."

The Bison continue their season play with away games against Binghamton on Wednesday, Sept. 4 and the Bulls Fall Classic tournament in Buffalo, N.Y., Sept. 7-8.

Volleyball starts 1-2

The Bison volleyball team launched its season this past weekend at the University of Buffalo's Hampton Inn-vitational, emerging from the tournament with a 1-2 record. The Bison contested their first match of the year on Friday against Canisus, and continued play on Saturday as they faced Buffalo and Coastal Carolina.

Although they dropped the first game to Canisus, the Bison battled back with two victories of their own to establish a 2-1 lead. The Golden Griffins proved difficult to dispose of, as they rallied to tie the game at 2-2. The Orange and Blue closed the deal in the fifth game, as they dominated Canisus with a 15-7, errorless effort in the final game. Leading the Bison charge were Brandi Trapasso '04 with 23 digs and 16 kills and Melanie Ghiz '03 with 24 kills. Jennifer Wrigley '03 also had a hand in the victory, tallying 15 kills and 18 digs.

Saturday's matches did not yield the same success as Friday's contest, as the Bison fell to both teams they faced. In the first match, the Orange and Blue took on the host, Buffalo, and fell by a score of three games to two. Breean Trapasso '04 and Ghiz kept the Bison alive with 43 assists and 17 kills, respectively. Brandi Trapasso contributed 22 digs.

In the second match of the day, the Bison were stymied by the Coastal Carolina Chanticleers, who swept the Orange and Blue by a score of 3-0. The Chanticleers went on to be crowned tournament champions. Wrigley had 11 kills and 16 digs in the match, while Brandi Trapasso had 17 digs. Breean Trapasso had 35 assists.

Although the Bison dropped the last two matches, the tournament showcased some of the potential on the squad this year. Ghiz and Brandi Trapasso were both named to the Hampton Inn-vitational All Tournament Team.

The team looks to regain a winning record this weekend in the Stony Brook tournament with Providence and Saint Francis on Sept. 6 and 7.

Cross-country ready to defend PL title

By Aaron DeRosa

The Bison cross country programs are poised to continue their tradition of excellence into another season, as they prepare to launch the 2002 campaign in the Spiked Shoe Invitational at Penn State this Saturday. The women's team will take its first step in defending its four-year reign as Patriot League Champions, while the men's squad looks to regain top status in the league after finishing second to Army for the past two years.

Leading the charge for the Lady Bison is Theresa Dennis '03, who capped off an impressive season last year with a 73rd place finish in the NCAA Championship race. Her effort resulted in the highest finish ever achieved by a female Bucknell runner at the National competition. Dennis looks to continue her success this year and lead the Orange and Blue to another season of League domination. Helping her guide the Bison into battle will be Nikki Piper '03, who placed 30th in the Patriot League meet last season.

Although the team lost four of its top five finishers from last year's championship team to graduation, there are many young runners eager to step up and take the reins. Fifteen letter winners are returning from last year, including a strong sophomore class that has matured over the past year. In addition to the veterans, a massive first-year class will be vying for a chance to help the varsity squad in its quest for a fifth championship.

The men's team is hoping to return to league champion status after two years of finishing as the runner-up to a powerful Army team. Much of the Bison's hope rests on the shoulders of co-captain Greg Costello '03, who snatched an individual bid to Nationals last year after an impressive seventh-place effort in the regional meet. Bryan Johnston '03 looks to repeat his performance from last year's league championship meet, where he led the Bison with his fifth-place finish. The men will benefit from the experience of 23 returning letter winners, as well as from the addition of nine new first-year students to the roster.

Head Coach Kevin Donner will be at the helm of both championship drives, as he enters his second year as head coach of the cross country and track and field programs.

Both teams travel to Penn State this Saturday to compete in the Spiked Shoe Invitational, their first race of the year.

Poor start doesn't dim hope

The field hockey squad hopes to bounce back from a disappointing 2001 campaign when they finished 7-10.

By Meghann Chipko
Senior Writer

After losing an important senior class and coming from a losing (7-10) season, the 2002 Bucknell women's field hockey team has room to be skeptical about the upcoming season. The players and coaching staff refuse to back down from this year's challenge.

The Bison have a busy schedule to kick off the 2002 season—they have already played teams from both Central Michigan and Monmouth. Though they began the season with an 0-2 start, many feel that the "adjusting" time is over and the team is ready to take on Drexel, its next opponent.

"Coming off two losses, our next game against Drexel will serve as an indicator for how the season should progress," Lindsay Knoll '05 said. "In our first two games we looked well-organized, but I feel like we need a little more spark to get going this season, and I hope we can find that in our next few games."

Meiko Boynton '05 is especially eager to see what will come.

"We got off to a rough start, but I feel that with our talent pool this year, there is only room for progress," she said. "I'm really excited to see what we can do in our next couple games."

Boynton is not the only one revved up and ready to go; only five players who saw significant playtime last year remain, and a lot of the sophomores and first-year students are ready to step up and take control of the season.

Kelly O'Brien '06 is showing a lot of potential so far. Her knack for scoring and agility on the field are assets that Head Coach Heather Lewis is looking for in the starting lineup.

The sophomore class also has a lot of potential to step up and lead the team this year. Boynton had time in 17 games last year, always "creating" on the field with her talented stick-handling; she has scored 3 goals thus far, including the Bison's first goal of the 2002 season. Knoll, known for her quickness on the field, is ready to make a difference with her improved shooting.

The Bison should also get a considerable boost from returning seniors Amy Marvel and Sonja Wettergreen. Marvel, senior captain and a four-year starter, will be an important leader for the team playing out of the center midfield, and All-Patriot League goalkeeper Wettergreen should also be a key in Bucknell's success.

The next game is in Philadelphia on Wednesday at 1 p.m. against Drexel University.

There are little eyes upon you,
And they're watching night and day;
There are little ears that quickly
Take in every word you say;
There are little hands all eager
To do anything you do;
And a little girl who's dreaming
Of the day she'll be like you.
You're the wisest of the wise,
In her mind about you,
No suspicions ever rise;
She believes in you devoutly,
Holds that all you say and do
She will say and do, in your way
When she's grown-up like you.
There's a wide-eyed little girl,
Who believes you're always right,
And her ears are always open,
And she watches day and night;
You are setting an example
Every day in all you do,
For the little girl who's waiting
To grow up to be like you!!!

Cecily Cairns Classic Corner

Cecily Cairns

Nothing says summer like a minor-league baseball promotional stunt. Whether it's the baby-races between the third and fourth innings, a live appearance by the highly-revered entity known as Spongebob Squarepants or an all-out aberration of good taste like Jim Traficant night, the farm-team spectacles continue to hold up a tradition that would make Bill Veeck proud.

On rare occasion, such events may transcend the simplicity of mindless entertainment, captivating the media and fans alike with their complex storylines and unequivocal historical significance. One such event could only be looked upon as an "instant classic," destined to be retold and relived in all its vibrant glory for years to come.

Well, perhaps not years ... but the third annual installment of Man vs. Beast: Red Wings Derby did keep the fans buzzing for several innings. Maybe even a couple of days.

The event, which was inaugurated at Frontier Field in 2000, traditionally pits a Rochester Red Wings (AAA International League) player against a once-in-a-lifetime opponent in a grueling test of foot-speed and instant acceleration. The players have changed through the three installments, but the challenger has become a familiar face to the Rochester faithful—a very long familiar face. This daunting piece of athletic machinery is known to most as Zippy Chippy, and he's acquired a faithful following of sports enthusiasts from around the country.

He may be the best story in horse racing, and his trainer, Felix Monserrate, is making sure that he snags a few headlines on the professional baseball front as well. Why is Zippy, a scrawny-looking gelding with the grace of a dump truck, so famous? Because he knows how to lose. Very well. You won't hear any whiny excuses or cries of injustice (a la pampered media-darling War Emblem) from Zippy's camp. No, there are no excuses for Zippy Chippy. He just stinks.

While his losing ways have paved the path to fame for the 11-year-old plodder—Zippy Chippy is winless in an astounding 94 career races—Man vs. Beast III would ask him to do something he wasn't very well accustomed to: win.

Instead of Thoroughbreds, he was slated to face outfielder Darnell McDonald in a 45-yard dash. You may recall from Man vs. Beast II that Zippy actually had the upper hand in this matchup, after he shamed the young ballplayer with a come-from-behind defeat in 2001. McDonald was eager for revenge, but fate would see to it that he didn't get any chances to even the score, as a slight hamstring pull caused him to step aside.

Formidable base-stealer Brian Roberts accepted the challenge in his place, but the dominating presence of Zippy Chippy alone prompted Roberts to scratch himself moments before the duel with "flu-like symptoms." And so the dignity of the Red Wings was left in the hands of outfielder Larry Bigbie.

The two squared off a few minutes before game-time on Aug. 22, before a zealous crowd of 8,356 spectators. Bigbie, perhaps overwhelmed by the profundity of the contest, jumped the countdown and then faltered during his first few steps, allowing the bay whirlwind to streak by him and stride away to a four-length trumping that can only be described as Secretariat-esque.

Bigbie, his spirit humbled, pointed some of the blame at the mucky condition of the track. "The wet field had me a little scared," claimed the befuddled outfielder. Sure Larry, it was the wet field.

It will be another year until the two get a chance to duke it out over the sod in Rochester again, but in the meantime both will continue with business as usual. Zippy Chippy dropped his #1 Red Wings saddle cloth for a slot against his fellow equines in the first race at Northampton Fairground on Aug. 31, where he went right back to doing what he does best—finishing last, 20-some lengths behind the winner.

And what will become of poor Larry Bigbie? With the Red Wings abysmal season ending on Sept. 2, he'll have to settle for something perhaps more humiliating than losing to the world's worst race horse: playing for the Baltimore Orioles, who have cruised through a pretty impressive losing streak of their own over the past two weeks. Sure, he'll enjoy his stint in "the Show," as he plugs away as a pinch-hitter or part-time player during the waning weeks of the major league season, but will he ever forget that rainy day in August?

Perhaps when the late innings drag on and he grows weary of watching majestic home runs arch their way into the stands behind him, his mind will drift off to dreams of a brighter future, of what might have been had that field not turned up muddy on Aug. 22, had he not bobbled at the start. Alas, it will remain a mystery, and will surely stand as one of the greatest "what ifs" of our time.

But one thing is for sure. He'd make a hell of an exacta with War Emblem in the World Thoroughbred Championships' Breeder's Cup Classic.

The Commissioner Strikes Back

When I think "unholy succubous of integrity where life is devolved into the oblivion of this windmill samsara we call 'competitive athletics,'" I think of two things: Danny Bonaduce boxing Barry Williams and major league baseball, but at least celebrity boxing didn't vote to contract Paula Jones' meaty left thigh, which is, coincidentally, WAY over the cap.

Major league baseball, as we've been hearing for months now, is at a crossroad. Down one road, we have a system of capitalist anarchy where everyone is free to make and spend as much as they want, or "operation bouillabaisse" as it's called in some circles. This is the athletic equivalent of putting players into one of those giant spheres that blows money around and making them grab as much as they can in 60 seconds. This route is endorsed by the Player's Union and Yankees owner George Steinbrenner. It is also endorsed by convicts, airport vendors, the Ozbournes and various sundry ne'er-do-wells.

The second path is backed by the owners and institutes a luxury tax that will act as a veritable salary cap, curbing high spending by top payroll teams like the Yankees, Braves and Dodgers, or "operation cheapbastard." This is so that teams like the Florida Marlins can spend the absolute minimal amount of money on their teams, so that when John and Jane Baseball-Fan go to games and hand out the mortgage papers to their parent's home to buy two Buds without caps and a box of Cracker Jacks, those profits can go directly into lining the owner's Versace slacks. This plan is also endorsed by Bill Gates, Arthur Anderson, the Riddler, Penguin and Dr. Nefarious.

At the forefront of baseball's impunity is Commissioner Bud Selig, who must have weekly meetings with Satan and Ex-Enron President Jeffrey McMahon on how to be a corrupt despot who feeds off the blood of the weak ... of course, I don't know how much Selig charges them. Keyser Soce looks at Selig and says, "I would not touch that crazy SOB with a 10-foot mafia-pole."

Bud Selig, who holds a remarkable resemblance to Skeletor, is working day and night to hammer out a deal with the federal courts in the hopes that he can procure the secret key to Castle Grayskull before Prince Adam discovers him.

Once he finds the key, he'll be free to contract whatever team he likes, including his favorite "aberration," the Minnesota Twins, who just so happen to be the largest fiscal competitor for the Selig-owned Milwaukee Brewers. Can someone say "conflict of interest?" No, of course not, we're too busy choking on the fact that the players actually want to make MORE money.

Alex Rodriguez, the highest paid player in baseball, who came out last weekend and said he would give a percentage of his earnings back if it would help save baseball, recanted his comments a few days later saying it would be "unrealistic" to give the money back.

You know what's unrealistic, A-Rod? Your faux attempts at being Keanu Reeves a la The Matrix; "the one" who can mystically reunite baseball and propel it into a golden age. Do me a favor A-wipe, shut your smug, pretty-boy, pre-packaged, bobble-head mouth, pick up your paycheck and we'll see you at the Oscars. You want to know why there's no competitive balance in baseball? Check the number of digits on your next paycheck. Now if that number is greater than the number of people in the entire coal-mining industry, then perhaps you need to rethink your stance.

As for the rhetoric from players and owners and commissioners about "doing what's best for baseball," you can stick that in a sack. If you keep saying that you'd do anything for the sport you cherish, then how is it I have to fork over my first-born to get some stadium Skittles: taste the rainbow of bitterness.

I think we need to prioritize here people. We're not talking about bridging the gap between players and owners anymore, how about bridging the gap between fans and the sport. Why are people watching Little League? Those kids SUCK! I haven't seen gloves so stiff since the OJ trial. But people watch because it's supposed to be innocent. There's no money in the system to taint the game. Little Billy isn't throwing a hissy-fit on the mound because he wants another million added to his signing bonus, he just lost his retainer. Errors aren't made on the field because an agent called with a low offer, the poor kid is just despondent because Lisa was sharing a Yoo-Hoo with his best friend Tommy at lunch.

I'm not asking for innocence, because Lord knows that doesn't exist, and I'm not asking for money to be taken out of the game of baseball, because then I'd have to call my bookie, and now is not the right time ... let's just say I thought the Devil Rays would make a go at it. What I AM asking for is a little sanity to set things straight.

Players, stop whining about your contracts. Your average salary has risen from $1.2 million to $2.4 million since 1994. Meanwhile, the wage necessary to live increased from $17,000 to $21,000 in that same time period. I never want to hear you speak about money again.

Owners, stop using "competitive balance" as a shield to mask your own desire to line your pockets. Lower your ticket and vendor prices and we'll pour into your stadiums, no matter how dilapidated they are. Don't use your fans as political leverage to get what you want; it's more telling about your character than a Britney Spears' tube top on an Arctic tour.

However, none of this can take place so long as Darth Selig is still Imperator Supreme. Julius Caesar would faint at the power Bud wields and it's high time someone stepped in and told people to shut their wordholes and do what's right. No more bellyaching and ballyhoo.

Because we have to remember the important things; the fact that there is no crying in baseball. Unless you're a New York Mets fan ... then weep, gentle giant.

NFL back in action

Scott Kloss
Senior Writer

Are you ready for some football?! I'm glad you are, so sit back and get ready for a Cliff Notes version of the NFL 2002-2003 season to come. With every new season, each team is a Super Bowl favorite. In a league where parity is now accepted and dynasties are detested, every team has an honest shot at the Vince Lombardi Trophy. But games are still played and that injury bug can find anyone. There have been quite a number of adjustments to the game and personnel movements over the past off-season, so lets not waste another moment!

Where to begin? Realignment! In an attempt to ease flight travels and create tighter divisional races, upper management has rearranged the divisional structure. Ten teams had to make a jump or move to a new division. Both the AFC and NFC have a North, South, East and West division.

This certainly makes the Arizona Cardinals happy, who move from the NFC East to the NFC West, eliminating their constant 3,000 mile trips across the country for divisional games. And the animated ESPN analyst Chris Berman can now smile knowing he got his wish for a NFC "Norris" Division!

The biggest winner in this transformation is the Tampa Bay Buccaneers, who moved from the NFC Central to the NFC South. Leaving a division with The Packer "Cheeseheads" and "Purple People Eaters" [Vikings] and vaunted Bears' defense will make first-year Head Coach Jon Gruden's task that much easier. The fact that the Bucs have the easiest NFC schedule, facing only six teams with winning records in 2001, doesn't hurt either.

Following suit are the local favorite Pittsburgh Steelers. They take their smash-mouth style of football to the AFC North and in the process avoid divisional play against the always-dangerous Tennessee Titans. With a division consisting of the Bengals, Ravens and Browns, Pittsburgh should start out 6-0.

As far as personnel changes go, the Indianapolis Colts hope that Edgerrin James, Peyton Manning and Marvin Harrison can get on the same page and once again provide an explosive offense. While scoring points won't be a problem for Indianapolis, the defense will have new leadership in Defensive Specialist Coach Tony Dungy who echoes team president Bill Polians' views.

"A team with a dominant defense has the best chance, that's the lesson of free agency," Indianapolis Colts President Bill Polian said. "Now that's not to say that you can't win with a good offense and a mediocre defense—it's just a lot harder."

Taking a similar path, the Dallas Cowboys have done wonders this off-season to shorten the field for quarterback Quincy Carter—Jerry Jones' hand-picked successor to Troy Aikman. Sack specialist La'Roi Glover, who had a total of 25 sacks over the past two seasons, will bolster the front four. The linebackers, who have been the strength of the Cowboys since the Ken Norton days, added Kevin Hardy, a former fifth-round draft pick, to compliment Pro-Bowler Dexter Coakley and Day Nygen and provide what is arguably the fastest set of linebackers in the league. The Cowboys' last line of defense just got meaner, with the addition of first-round selection Roy Williams at free safety. He has stepped into the starting role immediately and brings with him a linebacker's mentality crossed with a cornerback's cover skills, completing a facelift of a defense that ranked a solid fourth last season.

Next is first-year head coach for the Washington Redskins, Steve Spurrier and his "Fun and Gun" offense, which was a big hit in the preseason. Averaging a thrilling 33 points per game, they leave fans wondering if the 'Skins found Spurrier from the Arena Football League! The verdict is still out on this Florida native, but his entire career has been marked with success. It's same to say that the trend will probably continue, even if he has only faced defensive alignments orchestrated in the Pop Warner days so far in the exhibition games.

The newcomer Houston Texans enter a radically changed system, on the field and off.

Now for the big question: Who will win the Super Bowl? It's still hard to believe that the Rams lost last year's Super Bowl. One thing shining through though is that the Patriots were a true team in every respect and that makes a sports fan smile.

Last season's Super Bowl reminds me of a question a friend once asked me. He asked this question before the best college football team, say Florida State, and the worst high school football team with professional players Marshall Faulk, Randy Moss, LaVar Harrington, Rich Gannon, Larry Allen, Michael Strahan and Darren Woodsen all coached by Tony Dungy.

This puzzled me for a while, but what he was getting at carries significant weight. An impulsive response is to take the Pro Lead Team, but, as we found out last season, sometimes a "team" does outshine stars at prominent positions. The Patriots' decision to be introduced as a team during player introductions at the Super Bowl was a classy move and was an instant indicator that we were in for something special. But lightning doesn't strike twice in the same spot, right? So I think the Patriots will place near the bottom of the AFC East.

With the scrappy New York Jets, Curtis Martin and Company will continue their upward trend and again place highly in the AFC East, probably falling a little short of Rickey Williams' Miami Dolphins for the division lead. So when all is said and done, I'm taking a quantum leap and picking the Rams to win the Super Bowl! Not only is Marshall Faulk the most dominant player in the league, but Mike Martz has learned from his "Super Debacle" and is more focused than ever to have a defensive presence to get the job done this year.

Welcome to the 2002 season!

NFL Predictions

Justin McCarthy
Senior Editor

New York Jets at Buffalo

The Bills are expected to make a drastic recovery from their 3-13 season a year ago because of the acquisition of all-star quarterback Drew Bledsoe. I truly believe that the Patriots may regret dealing Bledsoe to a division rival. Don't be surprised if they flop, especially if the Bills' suspect offensive line can't protect Bledsoe adequately. The Jets didn't do much to fill the holes in their shaky defense, but they still have Curtis Martin, who remains one of the premier backs in the league. In this old divisional clash, the Jets will win.

Dallas at Houston

Finally, Texas has another football team besides the Cowboys. You know how much those crazy Texans love their football—remember "Varsity Blues?" The Texans will struggle, mainly because of their lack of talent at the skilled offensive positions, although they have a pretty good offensive line. The Cowboys may have had one of the most successful drafts this off-season and managed to plug a few gaps on both sides of the ball. However, they failed to address their quarterback concern. Sorry, but Quincy Carter just cannot get it done. In the end, experience will be the factor that allows Dallas to win this battle for Texas football supremacy.

St. Louis at Denver

The Broncos have one of the top receiving corps in the league, and although Terrel Davis retired, they will still have a great running attack with Gary and Anderson. Denver's only question on offense is whether or not Griese can play a full season. Unfortunately for Denver, the Rams have no questions on offense. Yet the Rams failed to make any moves to better themselves in the off-season, though that may not matter until playoff time. The Rams will win this offensive battle.

Minnesota at Chicago

Most people in Minnesota are glad that Denny Green is finally gone, and upset that Cris Carter decided to retire. However, they still have Culpepper and Moss, two of the most talented players in the league. Alexander will need to prove that he can take some heat off of Moss, and the Vikings as a whole need to prove they can run the ballor play defense. The Bears are the defending division champs, and their passing game has a lot of potential. With a defense led by Urlacher and one of the best linebacking corps, the Bears will be a serious threat. Look for the Bears to prove they were not just a one-year fluke.

Pittsburgh at New England

This is a rematch of last year's AFC Championship game where the Steelers handed the game over to the lowly Patriots. The Steelers were the team to beat in the AFC last season. This year, they return with essentially the same team that had last year's best AFC record. The one question for Pittsburgh remains how Stewart will handle the season. A maturing receiving corps starring Plaxico Burress may finally answer that question. As for the underrated Patriots, this season will test Brady's legitimacy, and more importantly, the team to see if they are more than just one-year-wonders like the 1999 Atlanta Falcons. The Steelers will begin their road to the Super Bowl with a week one manhandling of the defending champion Patriots.

TRIVIA

1. What is the MLB record for most consecutive victories?
2. Who are the only two MLB pitchers to record over 4,000 strikeouts?
3. Who holds the NL record for most innings pitched without surrendering a walk?

1. 26 consecutive wins by the 1916 N.Y. Giants (The Oakland A's are chasing and recently tied the A.L. record of 19 on 9/2/02). 2. Nolan Ryan and Steve Carlton. 3. Greg Maddux, with 72 1/3 innings pitched without a walk.

This issue marks the kickoff of The Bucknellian's first "Calendar section." Events here were compiled from Reservations, Information and Conference Services (RICS), Activities and Campus Events (ACE) and the Office of Public Relations. In the future, please feel free to submit event information (event name, day and time, location) to bucknellian@bucknell.edu, using "Bucknellian Calendar" as the subject.

The sporting event calendar continues to run in the Sports section, this week on page B2.

Send calendar submissions to bucknellian@bucknell.edu using "Bucknellian Calendar" as the subject.

An Abroad Perspective: Semester at Sea

This summer I traveled in Europe with the Semester At Sea program as my study abroad. In a span of 10 weeks, I sailed on the MTS World Renaissance around the coast of Europe, porting in nine different countries: Greece, Spain, Ireland, Norway, Russia, Poland, Belgium, Italy, and Croatia. We spent four to five days in port, traveling and experiencing the countries, and two to six days on the ship sailing between the countries. I took classes while on the ship. Here's just one of the many adventures I experienced.

July 27, 2002 10 a.m.
Sitting on a Belgian train

This morning I decided to go to Brugge. It is only a two-hour train ride from Antwerp and the tickets were cheap, so here I am speeding past the Belgian countryside. This is what I love about Semester at Sea and about studying abroad: the freedom and the ability to constantly be moving. I don't think I've ever stayed in one place in Europe for more than two days since I arrived in Athens seven weeks ago. There is always some new building to see or street to wander down or water to sail on. When you're visiting nine countries in two months, you've got to move.

Trains seem almost magical to me, despite the old orange leather seats sticking to my legs and the large dingy windows in the car. You step inside of a train and then with a roll of the wheels and the lurch of your seat, you are off and away, arriving in another part of the country, or even a different country, if the wheels roll for long enough. It's thrilling to be able to pass by people's homes and heartlands like this. I'm extra excited/nervous/free on this trip, because I am doing it alone. Just me and my train ticket across the country of Belgium. At first I was rather intimidated by traveling alone, but now I crave it. Traveling alone is a completely different experience than traveling with a group. There is no American comfort zone. There are no distractions. Without a traveling buddy to confine yourself to, you can really observe the scene you are in and strike up a conversation with people around you. The old couple across from me was eager to use their English when telling me about a music festival at Ghent that they were going to. A grandmother was playing cards with her young grandson behind me, instructing him in what sounded like Flemish, a version of Dutch. I love hearing the different languages of Europe. It's like an audio garden; each sound has its own color, its own shape and form, distinct and not familiar. When you are traveling alone, all you can do is listen, and the garden is all the more richer.

We are rolling into the Brugge station now.

Sitting at a café in Brugge's main square

What a beautiful town! Brugge is a perfectly preserved medieval town, which means that all the streets are narrow and cobblestone and that large stone buildings are all the rage. There are towers and turrets everywhere!

The first thing I did was go on a canal ride, for Brugge is littered with calm canals and quaint bridges. Unlike the usual steel skyscrapers that form the skyline in American cities, Brugge's skyline is dominated by two extraordinary structures, the Church of Our Lady's and the belfry. I went to the Church, because Michelangelo's Madonna was on display.

The Church itself was incredible. It has huge ceilings and a decorative altar. The voices of singing monks floated through the air, lulling the atmosphere into one of serene feelings. On the right-hand side of the church, the Madonna statue stands on its own alter with the Last Supper painted behind it. She looked serene and quiet, as if she too can hear the monks. The experience was not as awe-inspiring as when I saw his David in Florence, but beautiful in its own way. I climbed to the top of the belfry after lunch.

The square I am sitting in is Brugge's main square, and by far one of the largest I have seen in Europe. It is probably bigger than three football fields. The side of the square is lined with cafés advertising fresh mussels and fish. To the right is a street of lace stores (Belgian lace is world famous) and souvenir shops. Directly across from the cafés is the imposing gray stone belfry. To the left is a majestic and very large white stone castle now used for the town offices and courthouse.

And the people! Oh, they are everywhere in this square. Many are waiting in line for carriage rides, while others are sitting and talking in the cafés. Couples holding hands and families in loud groups are simply walking around the square, while children stop to gawk at the juggler and the mimes. There is such a flurry of tourist activities that even the pigeons look startled.

For lunch, I had piping hot Flemish stew and cold Belgian white beer. Eating in all these great open-air cafés throughout the summer made it hard to go back to the caf.

July 27, 2002 6:30 p.m.
Back on the train

I was frazzled walking back to the train station on time because I became lost in thought about my great European adventure. Suddenly, I realized that I was literally lost as well! Fortunately, my keen sense of direction and amazing map-reading skills, just discovered this summer, got me quickly to the station, and I only had to wait an extra 15 minutes for the late train. I'm not complaining because it was the nicest train ever! Its carpeted floors, large cushioned seats, cool air and elevator music calmed me down.

July 27, 2002 6:37 p.m.
Back on the SECOND CLASS train

Oops. I knew it was too good to last. Seven minutes of first class. I honestly didn't even realize that I had gotten on the wrong car. The mean ticket guy was going to make me pay more money, but I only had a single Euro coin left! I think my heart was beating faster than the train was moving. Fortunately, he lightened up and allowed me to slink back to second-class, leaving the transportation paradise behind. Second class isn't that bad, but it's not as serene. Traveling lesson No. 546: Don't spend all your Euros on ice cream. You just might need them to get home. Traveling lesson No. 547: If it's too good to be true, it's probably first-class.

The rest of my time in Brugge was lovely. After lunch, I walked up the dizzying 366 steps to reach the top of the belfry. 366! And these ain't no carpeted stairs either. The staircase was extremely narrow and circular with smooth stone steps. People could only go up or go down one at a time; traffic could not safely go both ways on those steps. I had to climb a bit, and then wait on a ledge for other people to pass, then climb again, then wait again.

Finally, I made it to the gear room, just below the top where the bells are. It was 4 p.m. when I got there, and I could see the great gears spinning and clicking in a mechanical effort to ring the bells. In that room, I could barely hear the bells, but as I ascended the last remaining stairs and stepped into the top of the tower, their mighty ringing thundered through my body. Oh the view! I could see all of Brugge plus the country around it from that height. The canals, the orange-tiled roofs, the church steeples, the roads cutting through great clusters of buildings.

I love surveying the world like this. I'd be a great bird. The world seemed so big, yet looked so small. The land stretched for kilometers, making the town buildings tinier in perspective. I tried to imagine the thrill of a person in medieval times, having never been on a plane or having never seen SkyCam news, must have felt being that high up. Eventually, I descended the stairs, which again involved a lot of waiting and shuffling past people, trying not to lose my step.

Kleissas standing in front of the Powerhouse Gardens in County Wicklow, Ireland.

Once I was back on the ground, I wandered around the streets for a while, looking in shops and eating ice cream. I think ice cream is a separate and necessary food group for Europeans. I, of course, ran into Semester At Sea students that I knew. No matter how hard you try, you just can't get away from them. Ah well.

That day was fabulous. There is a certain sense of pure and exhilarating freedom when you travel across a country and make it back to where you started. The town of Brugge is unlike any place I have ever seen. Now it is a fantastic memory like no other I hold.

The rows of green trees and fields give way to brick houses and dead-end streets as I approached the Antwerp station. The train slackened its pace, seeming to heave a sigh of relief at the thought of its home destination. Passengers packed up their books and drinks and headed for the door.

There was a final click of the wheels and then the train stopped. People filtered out of the train, chattering and laughing about the ride and their trips. The train car was empty, but resonating with the life that had just filled it. Resonating with life that moves.

When I go back to the University, I know people are going to ask, "How was your summer?" I will think of moments like that, sitting there on an empty train, bubbling over with enlightened emotions, wide-eyed from the new sights and itching to stay on the move. I will smile slightly and say, "Oh, I was simply traveling," as if there was anything simple about it.

McDayter and Nyquist rewarded for teaching excellence

BY JOLENE HART
Managing Editor

For Ghislaine McDayter, professor of English and assistant dean at the University, love of literature, talent for teaching, the passion to continue learning and a measure of flexibility have each contributed to her perpetual success in and out of the classroom.

Ghislaine McDayter

At the University's graduation ceremony in May 2002, McDayter was honored as one of two recipients of the Presidential Award for Teaching Excellence, highlighting her outstanding achievements in teaching. During the award presentation, University President Steffen Rogers' citation recognized McDayter "for bringing good humor, sharp intelligence and a genuine passion for learning to her teaching."

McDayter's contributions greatly impressed the selection committee, and the citation acknowledged that, "She focuses on her teaching goals and constantly refines her teaching methods, pushing herself and her students to new levels of excellence."

It is clear that after just five years of teaching at the University, McDayter has already made a lasting impression on staff and students. Julianna Pietak '04 has enrolled in two of McDayter's English courses.

"Professor McDayter's enthusiasm and animated teaching style takes what may originally seem to be an outrageous interpretation and makes it real. She makes you think creatively and critically about aspects of the text you never considered and is able to teach in an excited yet approachable way," Pietak said.

John Rickard, English department chairperson, also spoke highly of McDayter. "In five years she has become one of the most effective and sought-after teachers and advisers at the University. Students are aware of her deep knowledge of subject and her ability to convey excitement and enthusiasm that comes from her love of the material. To me, that is what defines the best professors in a field," Rickard said.

Apart from her duties as a professor of English, McDayter works as assistant dean of the College of Arts and Sciences. Elaine Garrett, Associate Dean, commented on McDayter's contributions as a Dean.

"We were excited for her presence in this office," Garrett said. "She works well with students, understands the University's policies and is always a good team player."

McDayter is Canadian-born and spent her undergraduate years at the University of Toronto, later enrolling in Duke University as a graduate student. While working toward her Ph.D., McDayter chose to concentrate her studies on the Gothic writers of the Romantic period, particularly Lord Byron and Percy Bysshe Shelley.

It was also during her time as a graduate student that McDayter resolved that she would teach. "My father was a teacher of English and I spent time in his classroom when I was younger," McDayter said. "But in graduate school I knew."

Her specialties as an English professor are broad, encompassing the genres of 18th and 19th century English and romantic literature, as well as literary theory and gender studies. Some of the courses she regularly teaches at the University include The Early English Novel, Victorian Literature and English Romanticism.

McDayter's favored authors in the classroom, Bram Stoker, Shelley, Virginia Woolf and Mary Wollstonecraft, are reflections of her affinity for both the romantic and the innovative aspects of English literature.

McDayter encourages students to become familiar with different literary periods through historical studies that add context to particular works of literature. She also hopes that students see reading as an enjoyable activity, regardless of the text.

"Students should become accustomed to the pleasure of reading. If it is necessary to read a particular text for a course, carry it with you and indulge in it rather than see it as a chore," McDayter said.

Though McDayter enjoys teaching all genres of English, she has never strayed far from her passion. "Byron tends to be where I always return," she affirms.

She has found that her teaching career allows her to maintain her studies on Byron, among others, and continually progress academically. McDayter has already published several collections and articles and recently edited a Bucknell Review on psychoanalysis and romanticism.

The current product of McDayter's research and study is a book that explores Lord Byron and the acclaim he experienced during his career. She hopes to publish the book, entitled Convulsions in Rhyme, in the near future. Regarding her experiences in the classroom, McDayter is quick to point out that flexibility is an invaluable tool.

"Every class, every group of students is different. It is important to adjust modes of teaching to reflect the unique chemistry," McDayter said.

It seems that this methodology has only helped McDayter to flourish in her profession, earning her a distinguished place in the eyes of the University community.

Sally Nyquist, Associate Professor of Biology, received one of two Presidential Awards for Teaching Excellence awarded by President Rogers at Commencement on May 19, 2002.

Eric Graham—The Bucknellian

Sally Nyquist

Created in 1998, the award recognizes the outstanding achievement of faculty members with superior teaching techniques. Nyquist also was awarded the Burma-Bucknell Award for Promoting Intercultural and International Understanding, along with Sofia Abraham '02.

"Professor Nyquist was very approachable in and outside of class," said student Trisha Elseroad '04. "She cared about all of her students and never hesitated to go out of her way to help a student."

Nyquist has taught at the University for 30 years. Prior to that, Nyquist spent a year in India on a Fulbright Senior Lectureship. Following her undergraduate degree, Nyquist spent two years in the Philippines through the Peace Corps, where she worked with the Bureau of Public Schools in a General Science Curriculum Development program for ninth grade students.

Nyquist believes that her experiences in Third World countries helps her to better understand the changes that international students at the University go through. She is always willing to lend them a helping hand.

"Working with international students is as much for yourself as it is for them," Nyquist said.

Nyquist's experiences in the Philippines also inspired her to teach. Nyquist offers a foundation seminar called Supermarket Biology, which focuses on first-year student development in areas such as critical thinking skills, writing, speaking, collaborative group work and use of the computer and Internet. The class looks at issues that can arise from a supermarket, such as the content on nutritional labels, food additives and looking at vegetarian and non-vegetarian diets.

"In her very popular foundation seminar on Supermarket Biology, Nyquist helps students hone informed critical thinking skills which they can appreciate the rest of their lives," the citation at Commencement said.

Nyquist also teaches cell biology, where students are responsible for maintaining a cell culture line.

Students feed the cells and transfer them to new flasks, tasks which require students to return to the lab regularly.

"I want University students to become passionate about biology, to get hooked on the discipline and begin to think like biologists," Nyquist said.

Nyquist also teaches Micro-Anatomy. According to Nyquist, upon completion of this course, students should be able to recognize and understand tissue sections obtained from any part of the body.

"Students taking this class learn to think three-dimensionally at a two-dimensional piece of tissue," Nyquist said.

Nyquist plans to retire in two years to a life of traveling, gardening and possibly volunteer teaching.

"The rewards of teaching lay in the interactions with students—to be able to watch students with time, see where they go and what they do," Nyquist said.

Reflections: Orientation 2002

First-Year Student

BY KATIE MULRINE
Contributing Writer

Like many other first-year students, many thoughts raced through my mind as I arrived on campus on Friday, Aug. 23. Will I have fun? Will I like it here? Will I miss home? My nervousness and excitement increased.

Dan Fellon—The Bucknellian

Starting at check-in, lasting right up until I fell asleep, eager for classes to start on Wednesday, orientation left no room for doubt that my time here would be amazing.

There was no time for homesickness or boredom. I was too busy arranging my room and meeting my hall mates.

I was having too much fun at Playfair, watching comedy skits, listening to talented, entertaining musicians and trying out my artistic talent at the Craft Center.

Guided from lectures to lunch and from meals to matriculation by my wonderfully cheerful and helpful OA's, I became acquainted with and took in the sights of this beautiful campus.

I experienced the beauty of the sun setting over Rooke Chapel, and was charmed by the lovely reception by the cute, cozy town of Lewisburg.

Though a little overwhelming at times, Orientation provided a wonderful welcome to the University. It gave me the opportunity to turn complete strangers into friends. It made a huge unknown campus feel like home.

There were smiles waiting for me everywhere. They could be found in a brightly colored t-shirt, on the faces of the faculty and staff or the others, like me, trying to find their place in this community.

Each place, opportunity and person I have encountered so far has become a tiny picture in my developing mosaic of experiences here at the University.

Orientation 2002 was not only an introduction to the University; it was an introduction to a whole new world with an ever-expanding palette of opportunities and experiences for all of us to embrace.

Orientation Assistant

BY JUNAID HASHIM
Contributing Writer

Friday, Aug. 23, 2002 — The University's Class of 2006 arrived at the place widely regarded as one that will change their lives forever ... college! In the early morning, first year students come, having left behind everything and everyone they held dear for the last 18 years. They're immediately flung into the deep end of the pool, and it was my job as an orientation assistant (OA) to ease them back into the shallow end.

Dan Fellon—The Bucknellian

An OA's success is dependent on the guidance he gets from the higher powers of the orientation hierarchy, which this year consisted of Assistant Dean of Students Amy Badal, Orientation Coordinator Jonathan Lang and Assistant Orientation Coordinator Patricia Elseroad.

In our first orientation meeting, I was awestruck at the rigorous training and orientation schedule presented. If anything, it manifested in all of us that Orientation was being taken seriously this year. We were expected to be dedicated to the care-taking of the first-year students and also have some serious fun at the same time.

If we could be dedicated, we would create a high-energy atmosphere that would keep the first-year students enthused throughout orientation.

We succeeded in creating an energetic atmosphere in events such as Playfair and the ever-popular Color Games. Of course, our efforts would've amounted to nothing without the cooperation of the first-year students themselves, and this year, they reached out for our hands and helped us to move them into the shallow end.

It was definitely harder for the first-year students to find energy than it was for the OAs. I can't know for certain where the first-year students got it from, but I'm thankful to all of them for showing up bursting with energy.

For us, the energy came as Badal, Lang and Elseroad addressed us in the Inspirational Meeting early Friday morning, visibly tired from a summer's worth of dedicated work. We felt that we owed it to them to go above and beyond the call of duty and make this the most successful Orientation program to date.

This was never better illustrated than when people parted like the Red Sea on the stairwells in Smith Hall as Joey "Moses" Alfano solely carried a refrigerator half his size up two flights of stairs into the room of a first-year student. It's experiences like this which show the true spirit of Orientation 2002. It was a great time!

Music piracy blamed for music slump

BY LINDSAY BETZENDAHL
Senior Writer

As the age of the Internet hits full throttle, there begins a spawn of Websites capable of allowing users to download MP3's, the computer format for music files. Possibly, shifting the age of the store-bought CD aside. Many have heard the complaints record labels and musicians have made about "stealing" free music off the Internet and the subsequent decline in CD sales.

Is the music industry's slump due solely to the new rave of high-speed music downloads or are there other variables, such as the recessing economy, that might also be attributing to the drastic fall in music sales?

Most Americans who have access to the Internet have most certainly heard about Web-based music downloading sites such as Napster, Scour, Audiogalaxy, Kazaa, or Imesh along with many others. The San Francisco Chronicle reported that according to a survey by the research firm Odyssey, an average of 31 percent of U.S. Internet users over the age of 16, accounting for about 40 million people, have downloaded music during the last six months. The same group has downloaded an average of 11 songs per week.

As many music-savvy people know, it is convenient to download free songs in a matter of seconds and then burn a blank CD with a few mouse clicks.

With the access of free music, people would be more inclined to record their own CD's, rather than spend the money and time to go out and buy one. There has been debate that the accessibility to music on the Internet has brought many previously unknown artists into the limelight, initiating people to buy the entire album.

There has been much debate about whether or not this popular trend of "stealing" music off the Web actually increases or decreases the sale of CD's. According to an article in the Houston Chronicle, the record labels' true threat is the recessing economy. A report showed that downloadable music could possibly provide more than $2 billion in new revenue over the next two years for music labels.

The United States accounts for 40 percent of the music market and has been down five percent in recent years, and worldwide there was an overall five percent decline in the first half of 2001, according to BBC News. Even though music sales have fallen recently, BBC News reported that over the past five years, music sales have gone down 1.5 percent each year, which is not a sudden slump in sales.

Keith Jopling, director of market research at the International Federation for the Phonographic Industry (IFPI), blamed the economic slowdown on the growing popularity of CD burning, which allows music fans to copy song tracks onto recordable CDs, for the decline in sales, according to BBC News.

It may be safe to assume that the heightened use of downloadable music is not the only factor causing the music industry's constant concern about the state of CD sales, but rather the down-turning economy as a viable reason for this slump. In a recession, many people are not going to be jumping at the chance to spend the usual $17 for a CD when there are a free versions on the Internet waiting to be downloaded.

The industry is "caught in a perfect storm, buffeted by the combined effects of mass copying and piracy, and the economic downturn," said Chairman of IFPI Jay Berman, according to the San Francisco Chronicle.

Reality Barbie goes public

BY RACHEL GOLD
Senior Writer

Every day, women are confronted with images of how we are "supposed to" look, act and dress. The University's Women's Resource center, Craft Center and students worked together to create a "life size" Barbie. Unlike the doll young girls play with, model after and worship, the life-size model would not be able to stand on her own two feet.

The University's "Barbie" made her first appearance on live television this past summer. WVIA-TV's "Woman to Woman" was dedicated to examining issues on body image and the show included a segment featuring Gretchen Heuges from the Craft Center, Director of Service Learning at the University Janice Butler and Women's Resource Center Intern Phillip Jones '02.

"Billions of dollars are being spent by the cosmetic, diet and fashion industries that send the message to women that we are not acceptable as we are, but need to be 'fixed'—enhanced, shaped, dyed, decorated and more. Many women can ignore this pressure, but others, especially young women, struggle to achieve some unattainable look and feel bad about themselves when they don't measure up to impossible standards of beauty and behavior," Butler said.

"Billions of dollars are being spent by the cosmetic, diet and fashion industries that send the message to women that we are not acceptable as we are, but need to be 'fixed'..."
—Janice Butler, director of Service Learning

Heuges voiced a different perspective about the pressure placed on women. She pointed out that the original Mattel Barbie doll was a woman's idea. "The doll is bought each year by millions of women all over the world for their daughters. Before you do the same, take a moment to ask yourself 'why?' Heuges said.

She feels that women are under self-imposed pressure to look, act, and dress in a certain way.

"Images of women as sexual objects are attractive to women as well as men. It is at this point that a women should consciously decide how real these images and expectations are. Women have the responsibility of analyzing these 'ideals' and not just accepting them without thought. Would looking this way, acting this way, dressing this way, make me the kind of person that I admire?" Heuges said.

Both Heuges and Butler agreed upon the main purpose the life-size Barbie served.

"The project was an attempt to demonstrate that our nation's standards of female beauty and desirability are distorted. The doll was created to appeal to girls as a symbol of grown-up glamour and has for over four decades become an international fashion idol. Our aim was to show how unrealistic Barbie's proportions are for adult women and to generate dialogue on campus about body image," said Butler.

"The Barbie project brings to light one of the issues that face women on a daily basis: 'How do I look?' Unfortunately many women make beauty their main purpose. We judge ourselves harshly and others unfairly if we consider only the surface and not the character that lies beneath. If we strive for an unattainable ideal we will be disappointed or unsatisfied with ourselves as well as others," said Heuges.

The life-size Barbie, with her completely unlivable proportions, gave University students a new perspective on beauty and image.

Gallery shows true beauty

The Samek Art Gallery begins its year-long quest to showcase wonderful art

Eric Graham—The Bucknellian

Öyvind Fahlström's prints are currently on display in the the Samek Art Gallery. The Gallery has an exciting line-up planned for the year, including creations by Lewis deSoto, Agnes Denes and Elizabeth Newman.

By Melinda Kummer
Senior Writer

Art galleries may seem like libraries to some people—boring. Galleries, like libraries, are rich in content. Ideas swirl in the rooms and incredible minds whisper their innermost thoughts. The University's Samek Art Gallery publicly displays ideas shrouded in the beauty of art.

"My favorite exhibits are the ones up on the walls at the moment — or the ones that will be up. I'm thrilled about all of them," Director of the Samek Art Gallery Daniel Mills said. "The Art Gallery's philosophy is to put on wonderful shows."

Currently, political activist, poet, journalist and artist Öyvind Fahlström's intriguing prints are on display. The University has the honor of being the last stop on a national tour of Fahlström's works. Mills describes the show as "humorous, critical, stylized, historical and whimsical."

> "The Art Gallery's philosophy is to put on wonderful shows."
> –Daniel Mills, Gallery director

Fahlström's work focuses on pop culture and politics in the 1960s and '70s. The colorful graphics in his prints also reveal subjects relevant to issues of today.

"Art was only his vehicle," Mills said as he closely investigated the sayings and narratives among the prints.

Most of Fahlström's pieces are meant for mass reproduction. He literally created the precursor to refrigerator art. The exhibit includes an interactive reproduction for visitors to manipulate.

Quotations by Fahlström are also included in the exhibit. One in particular, taken from Fahlström's manifesto, "Take Care of the World," summarizes the encounter of his works.

"Consider art as a way of experiencing a fusion of 'pleasure' and 'insight.' Reach this by impurity, or multiplicity of levels, rather than by education," Fahlström said.

Mills will be presenting a multidisciplinary lecture on Fahlström in the Gallery Theatre on Sunday, Sept. 8 at 4 p.m.

The Samek Art Gallery has an exciting line up of exhibits for the remainder of the school year. From Oct. 27 - Dec. 8, a 26-foot-long Buddha created by Lewis deSoto will rest in the main gallery. An inflated cloth version, the Buddha boasts deSoto's own facial features, an interesting commentary on death and supreme consciousness.

The main gallery will host the work of environmental artistic pioneer, Agnes Denes from Jan. 26 - Mar. 2. The retrospective exhibition will feature many of Denes' artistic endeavors, including her commentaries on philosophy, linguistics, art history and music.

The last exhibit in the main gallery will run from March 17 - April 13. A collection of 20th-century photographs, which may include works by Paul Caponigro, Elliot Erwitt, Helmut Newton and Garry Winogrand, will be on display.

In addition, a series of installations will occupy the project room throughout the year. The first will open on Sept. 13 and will boast the works of Randy Williams. Williams' work involves many social issues, especially those dealing with diversity and culture.

He will be lecturing on his own work on Friday, Sept. 13 at 7 p.m. in the Gallery Theatre.

The second installation will feature the works of Elizabeth Newman.

The final exhibit of the series will run from Feb. 2 - March 2. In a study of books, Buzz Spector will create an installation involving literature as a sculptural form.

The installation series presents an opportunity for students to be involved in the creation of art. Five to six students will be selected to work with each artist to create an installation.

Not limited to only students in the art department, Mills encourages all students to consider incorporating art into their University experience.

As always, the Kress collection is a permanent exhibit in the gallery. Out of only 23 institutions that house pieces from the Kress collection, the University has the most. Three of the works were recently restored and are worth visiting again to see the transformation.

The exhibitions are sponsored in part by the Pennsylvania Council on the Arts and by the Association for the Arts of Bucknell University. Gallery hours are 11 a.m. - 5 p.m. Monday - Friday and 1 p.m. - 4 p.m. Saturday and Sunday. All exhibit information, including color images of the works, is located at www.departments.bucknell.edu/samek_art gallery.

You don't have to be Greek to enjoy "My Big Fat Greek Wedding." This surprise hit of the summer has so much heartfelt comic appeal that, though it may look and sound like a chick flick, you don't have to be missing the Y chromosome to enjoy it.

The movie incorporates humor that can be universally applied to anyone who has a large family, or even knows someone who knows someone who has a large family. Toula (Nia Vardalos,who also wrote the screenplay for the film) is a 30-year-old Greek woman who has yet to fulfill her duty to find a nice Greek husband and having lots of Greek babies, much to the disappointment of her family. Then she meets the perfect guy (John Corbett). The only problem is, his name is Ian Miller, and he is definitely not Greek. However, he is willing to do whatever it takes to get her family to accept him, and for once love really does conquer all as Toula comes to terms with her family and heritage.

It's simple, it's smart, and most importantly, it has more genuine laughs than all three of the Austin Powers movies combined. I have yet to meet a person who has not enjoyed "My Big Fat Greek Wedding." It truly is a must-see movie.

"American Idol" proves to be the smash hit of the summer

By Kristi Johnston
Arts and Entertainment Editor

This summer, the entertainment world was defined by yet another addition to the already overcrowded realm of reality television. This time, instead of the usual attention-getting antics and absurd contests, FOX's "American Idol" was a true showcase of talent and poise. In a modern day "Star Search" format, "American Idol" drew record viewers and immense media coverage, a trend that has only intensified in its final weeks.

"American Idol" takes a basic idea, thousands of would-be song artists competing for a record deal, and adds a new twist—instead of leaving it to the professionals, the viewers themselves determine who moves on to the next week, and who goes home reveling in their 15 minutes of fame.

That is not to say that America didn't have help deciding whose talent was worthy of idolatrous glory. Three judges, Randy Jackson, Paula Abdul and the now infamous Simon Cowell, were given the opportunity to give their two cents on each hopeful's talent, song choice and general appeal after each performance. At times, the judges' differences of opinion became the highlight of the show, bumping the singers to secondary status.

When the talent pool had been depleted to a mere eight contestants, "American Idol" changed formats - each week, the finalists performed a song of their choice on Tuesday night. Viewers were then given two hours following the show to vote via telephone for who they liked best. Then, on Wednesday nights, the contestants, judges and viewers found out who was eliminated from the contest by receiving the fewest votes.

"American Idol" saw its fair share of controversy throughout the summer. Cowell's callous commentaries often led to conflicts among the judges, including near fisticuffs between Cowell and Jackson. Then, in the midst of the final rounds, apparent front-runner Justin Guarini received the second-fewest votes, nearly eliminating him from the contest. Perhaps the most shocking event was the elimination of Tamyra Gray, who was expected to be among the final two contestants and was a clear favorite of all three judges. Gray's elimination bought another chance for Nikki McKibben, whose reprieve was short-lived. McKibben was voted off the next week, leaving only Guarini and expected winner Kelly Clarkson to battle for the title on the show's finale, which aired Sept. 4.

Justin Guarini and Kelly Clarkson are the finalists for FOX's "American Idol."

" 'American Idol' has become the hit of the summer — such a hit that it's fulfilling an irony of the television business: In an industry where name recognition is everything, the highest form of a success is when people stop using the name of your show," according to cnn.com.

Cnn.com continues, "The water-cooler buzz after the Wednesday night episodes, in which contestants are voted off the show, has been reaching aircraft-engine levels. The comments don't even need a reference: 'Did you watch it?' 'What did you think?' 'It was outrageous what they did to her!'"

Naturally, plans are already underway for "American Idol 2." The success of the original has also prompted CBS to announce the return of "Star Search." One thing is for certain—"American Idol" has swept the nation and has undoubtedly paved the way for a number of new talents trying to make it in the entertainment industry.

Seven international students unable to enroll at University

By Michelle Dombeck
Arts & Entertainment Editor

Due to delays with obtaining student visas, seven University students were unable to enroll this semester. Six were first-year students, while one was a returning student. All were male and from Islamic countries.

NAFSA, the association of international educators, reports that the events of Sept. 11 have caused visa applications to be subject to a greater degree of scrutiny than in the past.

"While our consular officers strive to offer visa applicants as expeditious service as possible, their primary responsibility is to carry out U.S. law and to ensure that applicants to whom they issue visas will not pose a threat to the safety and security of the United States and its inhabitants," the official statement on NAFSA's Web site says.

Now, the government is requiring security checks of some applicants, which can take months. This delay can be detrimental to international students, who need to obtain a visa before arriving in the United States.

> "Due to the time it takes to conduct a security check, which has never been imposed by our government in the past, it took too long for [first-year students] to be able to matriculate"
> —Susan Zingale-Baird, University international student adviser

"No one has actually been denied a visa. Due to the time it takes to conduct a security check, which has never been imposed by our government in the past, it took too long for [the first-year students] to be able to matriculate," International Student Adviser Susan Zingale-Baird said.

International students are assigned an F-1 visa. This visa type has a direct connection to Sept. 11.

"Two of the hijackers were in Florida with F-1 visas, attending pilot training schools," Zingale-Baird said. "The students who were unable to enroll were forced to make other plans."

Five of the first-year students are from Saudi Arabia. They will enroll in Heriot-Watt, a school in the United Kingdom.

The other first-year student is an engineer from Malaysia. He is currently taking classes in Malaysia and has to work with the dean of engineering in order to gain permission to enroll in the spring.

"The only conclusion I can come to is if it's an Islamic country and a male student, they had to do the security check," Zingale-Baird said. "Two female students from the class of 2006 came from Indonesia, an Islamic country, but they received their visas on time."

The returning student, Ahmad Hassan '04, could not re-enter the United States because his visa had expired.

"The visa is to gain entrance to the United States. Once a student is in, it can expire and there isn't a problem," Zingale-Baird said. "If students choose to go home and their visas expire, then they have to get a new visa. Because of the security check, however, Ahmad couldn't get a new visa in time."

Hassan, who is an engineer like the Malaysian student, will also have to work with the dean of engineering in order to gain permission to enroll in the spring.

Other international students are upset about Hassan's situation.

"Although I do understand that the process may seem necessary and indispensable to the authorities, I think it is a shame that college students like Ahmad fall victims to the system," Satiya Abouzaid '04 said.

University hosts events and services to honor victims of last year's terrorist attacks

Classes went on at the University Wednesday, as the campus community commemorated the one-year anniversary of the Sept. 11 attacks. A campus-wide moment of silence was observed at 8:47 a.m. and events continued throughout the day for students and faculty to remember those lost.

The University joined the nation Wednesday to observe of the one-year anniversary of the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks on America.

All campus activity was paused at 8:47 a.m., the time the north tower of the World Trade Center (WTC) was struck by American Airlines Flight No. 11, for the tolling of the Chapel carillon and for students, staff and faculty to observe a moment of silence.

"It gave me goose bumps," Matthew Beyel '06 said of the moment of silence. "It was moving and it made me remember all those lost."

A student support space was available all day Wednesday in the Langone Center Walls Lounge with food, phones and media, as well as on-call counseling next door in room 211. Counseling was also provided at the Lowry house.

At 10 p.m., special religious services were held including a Roman Catholic Mass behind Rooke Chapel, a Jewish Ma'ariv Service at the Berelson Center for Jewish Life and a Protestant candlelight vigil at the amphitheater.

An all-campus gathering was held behind Rooke Chapel at 5 p.m. for a Remembrance, Reflection and Renewal ceremony. Speakers included Rabbi Serena Fujita, Vice President of Development/University Relations Robert Kallin, Associate Director of Chaplains and Religious Life Father Martin Moran, Chaplain Ian Oliver, Vice President for Student Affairs Charles Pollock '70 and Professor of Biology Gary Sojka, along with other students, faculty and staff. University President Steffen Rogers could not be present for the ceremony, as he was in California.

"We all experienced fear that day. And anger. And doubt. And grief. And so much confusion. But Bucknell's essence prevailed and it kept prevailing in the days and weeks that followed. We rallied in support of one another. And who can forget the blue ribbons of solidarity, the private moments of consolation, the public moments of memorial," Pollock said at the ceremony.

The ceremony included an all-campus choir directed by Professor of Music William Payn as well as reflections, poetry and presentations by students, faculty and staff, which were coordinated by the Office of Chaplains and Religious Life.

Also included in the ceremony was a presentation by Student Emergency Response Volunteers (SERV), honoring emergency workers who risked their lives for those of attack victims. They presented a demonstration of the 5555 alarm that was heard by New York Service Personnel on the day of the attacks.

Kallin read the names and spoke of those who died in the attacks who were a part of the University community or who were immediate relatives of University students.

In his absence, Rogers prepared words for Pollock to read to the campus.

Pollock said for Rogers, "The phrase 'United We Stand' appeared across the country and took on an intensity unknown since Pearl Harbor. Here on campus, although our pain was still intense and had been excruciatingly personal due to the loss of family and Bucknellians, we returned to classes and responded

Diversity Report yields encouraging results

Religious and ethnic diversity continuing to increase at University

By Meghan Fox
Writer

Last April, the Committee for Campus Diversity (CCD) published the Annual Diversity Report for the 2000-01 and 2001-02 academic years. The report summarizes the University's findings on its current state of diversity.

In 1999, former University President Bro Adams created the CCD to implement his Plan for Diversity. His plan also required an annual assessment of campus diversity in the form of the report.

According to the Annual Diversity Report, "The results (of the study) indicated that Bucknell has much to do to eliminate derogatory remarks and other forms of harassment directed at women and men, racial and ethnic minorities, religious groups and other identified groups, including especially LGBT persons."

"It's difficult to be very diverse or openly out at Bucknell," said Frances McDaniel, head of the office of Lesbian, Gay, Bisexual and Transsexual (LGBT) awareness. "To be an independent, ethnically diverse, out at Bucknell is hard."

However, the diversity report indicates improvement in the past few years. According to the report, the percentage of students of color had increased to about 12.5 percent of each class, an increase from the 9.5 percent of each class in 1997.

"At that time, the whole country was realizing that diversity was important. We needed to make sure that our students were ready to work in the very diverse world outside of Bucknell. We also realized that the educational experience of our students would be greatly enriched if the student body and staff were more diverse," Associate Dean of Arts and Sciences Elaine Garrett said.

In the spring of 2001, the University participated in a nationwide study of diversity-related campus climate.

"I think there has been some gratifying progress in each of the main areas of concern," said Charles Pollock '70, vice president of student affairs. "In student life, a breakthrough of the plan was to promote diversity of activities and social opportunities for students and we've made great strides there."

Pollock listed Uptown as such an example. The Choosing Healthy Options in a Community Environment (CHOICE) program was also created to "provide growth in alcohol-free and non-Greek social programming," as stated by the report.

"Bucknell has, in the last semester, made a strong effort to increase diversity awareness and address the issues of being a minority (both in the United States and internationally) at the University," said Jakita Price, multicultural chair for the President's Council and a member of Bucknell Student Government. "With the help of the Admissions and Multicultural offices, there has been an increase in enrollment and retention rates, and a lot more programs designed to help diverse students handle being a part of the University system throughout their collegiate careers."

Upon creation, the CCD consisted solely of administration. It was not until a year ago that University Chaplain Ian Oliver was added to the committee.

"We see religious diversity as a diversity issue as well," Oliver said.

With the enrollment of the Class of 2005, the number of Jewish students increased from 33 in the previous year, to 57 students.

Both Oliver and the Report attributed this increase to the recent construction of the Berelson Center for Jewish Life and the hiring of a Jewish chaplain.

"We continue to generate new ideas and are looking for ways to include more students and faculty directly," Oliver said.

Oliver mentioned last year's diversity week, open forums and guest speakers as ways in which the University has sought to educate students about diversity.

Pollock also indicated that there may soon be a change in the composition of the CCD to directly include student and faculty members.

"Overall, the University still needs to improve its relations with the multicultural population both within the administration and student government. Improving the multicultural environment should occur every day; not when something tragic happens," Price said.

Kitchen fire damages mod

Editor-in-Chief

A small fire damaged the kitchen area in mod five, located in Bucknell West.

According to Deputy Fire Chief for the Lewisburg Fire Department Bill Hoden, the fire was caused by a stove burner that was accidentally left on.

Most of the damage was in the kitchen area, but there was smoke damage throughout the mod. There was also no power to the mod.

According to Hoden, the five residents of the mod were not present at the time of the fire. They were allowed back in to clean, but the damage was bad enough that the residents will not be able to return to the mod for some time.

Students were given the option to live in vacant rooms across campus.

According to Dean of Students Richard Ferraro, the students are not in any of trouble, nor will they be sanctioned.

"Accidents happen. We are glad everyone is fine," Ferraro said.

Gallery shows true beauty

The Samek Art Gallery begins its year-long quest to showcase wonderful art

Øyvind Fahlström's prints are currently on display in the the Samek Art Gallery. The Gallery has an exciting line-up planned for the year, including creations by Lewis deSoto, Agnes Denes and Elizabeth Newman.

Art galleries may seem like libraries to some people—boring. Galleries, like libraries, are rich in content. Ideas swirl in the rooms and incredible minds whisper their innermost thoughts. The University's Samek Art Gallery publicly displays ideas shrouded in the beauty of art.

"My favorite exhibits are the ones up on the walls at the moment — or the ones that will be up. I'm thrilled about all of them," Director of the Samek Art Gallery Daniel Mills said. "The Art Gallery's philosophy is to put on wonderful shows."

Currently, political activist, poet, journalist and artist Øyvind Fahlström's intriguing prints are on display. The University has the honor of being the last stop on a national tour of Fahlström's works. Mills describes the show as "humorous, critical, stylized, historical and whimsical."

Fahlström's work focuses on pop culture and politics in the 1960s and '70s. The colorful graphics in his prints also reveal subjects relevant to issues of today.

"Art was only his vehicle," Mills said as he closely investigated the sayings and narratives among the prints.

> "The Art Gallery's philosophy is to put on wonderful shows."
> –Daniel Mills, Gallery director

Most of Fahlström's pieces are meant for mass reproduction. He literally created the precursor to refrigerator art. The exhibit includes an interactive reproduction for visitors to manipulate.

Quotations by Fahlström are also included in the exhibit. One in particular, taken from Fahlström's manifesto, "Take Care of the World," summarizes the encounter of his works.

"Consider art as a way of experiencing a fusion of 'pleasure' and 'insight.' Reach this by impurity, or multiplicity of levels, rather than by education," Fahlström said.

Mills will be presenting a multi-disciplinary lecture on Fahlström in the Gallery Theatre on Sunday, Sept. 8 at 4 p.m.

The Samek Art Gallery has an exciting line up of exhibits for the remainder of the school year. From Oct. 27 - Dec. 8, a 26-foot-long Buddha created by Lewis deSoto will rest in the main gallery. An inflated cloth version, the Buddha boasts deSoto's own facial features, an interesting commentary on death and supreme consciousness.

The main gallery will host the work of environmental artistic pioneer, Agnes Denes from Jan. 26 - Mar. 2. The retrospective exhibition will feature many of Denes' artistic endeavors, including her commentaries on philosophy, linguistics, art history and music.

The last exhibit in the main gallery will run from March 17 - April 13. A collection of 20th-century photographs, which may include works by Paul Caponigro, Elliot Erwitt, Helmut Newton and Garry Winogrand, will be on display.

In addition, a series of installations will occupy the project room throughout the year. The first will open on Sept. 13 and will boast the works of Randy Williams. Williams' work involves many social issues, especially those dealing with diversity and culture.

He will be lecturing on his own work on Friday, Sept. 13 at 7 p.m. in the Gallery Theatre.

The second installation will feature the works of Elizabeth Newman.

The final exhibit of the series will run from Feb. 2 - March 2. In a study of books, Buzz Spector will create an installation involving literature as a sculptural form.

The installation series presents an opportunity for students to be involved in the creation of art. Five to six students will be selected to work with each artist to create an installation.

Not limited to only students in the art department, Mills encourages all students to consider incorporating art into their University experience.

As always, the Kress collection is a permanent exhibit in the gallery. Out of only 23 institutions that house pieces from the Kress collection, the University has the most. Three of the works were recently restored and are worth visiting again to see the transformation.

The exhibitions are sponsored in part by the Pennsylvania Council on the Arts and by the Association for the Arts of Bucknell University. Gallery hours are 11 a.m. - 5 p.m. Monday - Friday and 1 p.m. - 4 p.m. Saturday and Sunday. All exhibit information, including color images of the works, is located at www.departments.bucknell.edu/samek_art gallery.

Last April, the Committee for Campus Diversity (CCD) published the Annual Diversity Report for the 2000-01 and 2001-02 academic years. The report summarizes the University's findings on its current state of diversity.

In 1999, former University President Bro Adams created the CCD to implement his Plan for Diversity. His plan also required an annual assessment of campus diversity in the form of the report.

According to the Annual Diversity Report, "The results (of the study) indicated that Bucknell has much to do to eliminate derogatory remarks and other forms of harassment directed at women and men, racial and ethnic minorities, religious groups and other identified groups, including especially LGBT persons."

"It's difficult to be very diverse or openly out at Bucknell," said Frances McDaniel, head of the office of Lesbian, Gay, Bisexual and Transsexual (LGBT) awareness. "To be an independent, ethnically diverse, out at Bucknell is hard."

However, the diversity report indicates improvement in the past few years. According to the report, the percentage of students of color had increased to about 12.5 percent of each class, an increase from the 9.5 percent of each class in 1997.

"At that time, the whole country was realizing that diversity was important. We needed to make sure that our students were ready to work in the very diverse world outside of Bucknell. We also realized that the educational experience of our students would be greatly enriched if the student body and staff were more diverse," Associate Dean of Arts and Sciences Elaine Garrett said.

In the spring of 2001, the University participated in a nationwide study of diversity-related campus climate.

"I think there has been some gratifying progress in each of the main areas of concern," said Charles Pollock '70, vice president of student affairs. "In student life, a breakthrough of the plan was to promote diversity of activities and social opportunities for students and we've made great strides there."

Pollock listed Uptown as such an example. The Choosing Healthy Options in a Community Environment (CHOICE) program was also created to "provide growth in alcohol-free and non-Greek social programming," as stated by the report.

"Bucknell has, in the last semester, made a strong effort to increase diversity awareness and address the issues of being a minority (both in the United States and internationally) at the University," said Jakita Price, multicultural chair for the President's Council and a member of Bucknell Student Government. "With the help of the Admissions and Multicultural offices, there has been an increase in enrollment and retention rates, and a lot more programs designed to help diverse students handle being a part of the University system throughout their collegiate careers."

Upon creation, the CCD consisted solely of administration. It was not until a year ago that University Chaplain Ian Oliver was added to the committee.

"We see religious diversity as a diversity issue as well," Oliver said.

With the enrollment of the Class of 2005, the number of Jewish students increased from 33 in the previous year, to 57 students.

Both Oliver and the Report attributed this increase to the recent construction of the Bereison Center for Jewish Life and the hiring of a Jewish chaplain.

"We continue to generate new ideas and are looking for ways to include more students and faculty directly," Oliver said.

Oliver mentioned last year's diversity week, open forums and guest speakers as ways in which the University has sought to educate students about diversity.

Pollock also indicated that there may soon be a change in the composition of the CCD to directly include student and faculty members.

"Overall, the University still needs to improve its relations with the multicultural population both within the administration and student government. Improving the multicultural environment should occur every day; not when something tragic happens," Price said.

Kitchen fire damages mod

A resident looks at the damage in his mod after a fire burned much of the kitchen.

By Rachel Laskow
Editor-in-Chief

A small fire damaged the kitchen area in mod five, located in Bucknell West.

According to Deputy Fire Chief for the Lewisburg Fire Department Bill Hoden, the fire was caused by a stove burner that was accidentally left on.

Most of the damage was in the kitchen area, but there was smoke damage throughout the mod. There was also no power to the mod.

According to Hoden, the five residents of the mod were not present at the time of the fire. They were allowed back in to clean, but the damage was bad enough that the residents will not be able to return to the mod for some time.

Students were given the option to live in vacant rooms across campus.

According to Dean of Students Richard Ferraro, the students are not in any of trouble, nor will they be sanctioned.

"Accidents happen. We are glad everyone is fine," Ferraro said.

INFORMATION/DISTURBANCE—Public Safety responded to Lambda Chi Alpha Fraternity for the report of a group of students attempting to enter the building without authorization. Lewisburg Police Department and East Buffalo Township Police Department responded and assisted to identify the students as residents of Phi Gamma Delta Fraternity. The 11 males stated that they were searching for a stuffed bird that they believe the Lambda brothers had taken. All parties agreed to resolve the issue by mediation and no charges were filed.

UNDERAGE DRINKING—An RA reported to Public Safety that a student had urinated in his pants and on the floor in his Vedder Hall room. The student who was under the age of 21 admitted to consuming alcohol. Citations were issued for underage drinking and disorderly conduct.

Monday, Sept. 9

MEDICAL ASSIST—Public Safety responded to Sigma Alpha Epsilon Fraternity for the report of an ill student. The male had participated in a boxing tournament and had been struck in the head. Since the event, he had experienced blurred, vision and nausea. The individual was transported to Evangelical Community Hospital Emergency Room for treatment and later returned to campus.

Tuesday, Sept. 10

MEDICAL TRANSPORT—Public Safety responded to Vedder Hall for the report of a student who was having an allergic reaction to a bee sting. Public Safety transported the individual to Evangelical Community Hospital Emergency Room for treatment and she later returned to campus.

CRIMINAL MISCHIEF/VANDALISM—A student reported to Public Safety that unknown person(s) poured food items and animal feces on his car while it was parked in the Lambda Chi Alpha Fraternity parking lot. The incident is under investigation.

INFORMATION/UNAUTHORIZED WEAPONS—Public Safety responded to Dining Service for the report of an employee with an unauthorized knife in her possession. The employee was not perceived as a threat and cooperated in turning the knife over to Public Safety to store until she was ready to leave campus.

INFORMATION/FIRE—Public Safety responded to a Bucknell West Mod for a fire alarm activation caused by a kitchen range fire. The residents had left cardboard items on a hot burner. William Cameron Engine Company responded and extinguished the fire. Residents of the Mod were offered alternate University housing while the building is being cleaned.

Snyder becomes head of WRC

Former director Butler heads Service Learning Department

By Jaclyn Carr
Writer

Mary Snyder, a former undergraduate and graduate student at the University, has recently become the head of the Women's Resource Center (WRC). She began the position in late July.

Snyder was previously a program assistant for the WRC where she worked with the Lewisburg community in projects such as the Yellow-Dress Project, a play put on in the Lewisburg Community Center to teach about dating violence.

Snyder's place with the WRC began as a student, when she wrote a report that initiated the Race and Gender Center on campus.

Snyder is the adviser for V-Day and The Stand, a magazine put out by the WRC that informs students of issues such as body image, stereotypes, sexual assault and violence or gender equality.

Snyder also runs programs such as the Sexual Assault Awareness Program, which works with Public Safety and the Peer Education Program, focusing on the social atmosphere of the campus.

She described her new position as "challenging yet going really well" and explained that the WRC serves to create a climate of equality and understanding between students.

"It empowers and supports women in becoming leaders by giving advice about careers, sexual thought or leadership roles on campus," Snyder said.

This year, the WRC aims to place more emphasis on women's art and cultural events and to work with the University's Greek system instead of against it.

Snyder also intends for the WRC to take a look at third wave feminism to ask where women and feminism stand today. She says a taboo still exists surrounding the "F-word," but realizes how far women have come even though they still face problems.

Female students have told her how they feel frustrated with campus issues such as sexual harassment or attitudes concerning gender.

Snyder will have speakers come throughout the year to speak about the issues facing the future of gender. Stephanie Shields, a professor of psychology and women's studies at Penn State University, will be coming to the University at 7:30 p.m. on October third in the Gallery Theatre to address gender issues she writes about in her book, "Speaking from the Heart: Gender and the Social Meaning of Emotion."

Janice Butler, former head of the WRC, is now head of the Service Learning Department on campus.

"I am excited about the potential of the new job and ready for the challenge of starting a new program that will benefit students, faculty and the community," Butler said.

Service Learning does not replace pre-existing volunteer organizations or community services in the area, but is a "new initiative that involves faculty and students," Butler said.

Butler explained that there are two parts to Service Learning.

In one area, students use their academic knowledge and skills to assist communities, such as the Bucknell Brigade, an organization formed to rebuild Nicaraguan communities hit by Hurricane Mitch in 1998.

The other part of Service Learning consists of the Matchmaker program, where students and faculty bring the classroom into the community. An engineering class did traffic calming studies to help local agencies fix traffic congestion problems.

A geology class analyzed water samples in areas that might have been affected by acid mine damage.

"These types of programs give students a chance to do something responsible while also getting practical experience," Butler said.

Butler has also noticed that it is very rewarding for teachers involved with the programs. Service Learning Programs are growing and are already working in Bloomsburg, Lockhaven and Williamsport.

This year, Butler aims to develop new spring break programs where students would travel either west, to aid impoverished Native Americans, or to cities to care for inner-city AIDS victims. If you are interested in any of these programs or want to find out more, Service Learning is holding an open house Sept. 24 from 3-6 p.m. in 121 Taylor Hall.

Parking changes affect University

By Aly Rentrop
Senior Writer

The University underwent many important parking changes over the summer.

Donald Krech, chair of the University Parking Committee and manager of purchasing, said these changes focused on four different constituents: students, faculty and staff, admissions and event parking.

"The new lots in the corn field have certainly made my life a lot easier, as I can now be assured a parking spot within sprinting distance of my office, and I rather like the new pastoral feel of the central quad in front of Carnegie," Ghislaine McDayter, assistant professor of English said.

Krech said one of the main goals of the parking improvements is to make the University more pedestrian-friendly. The changes are also intended to move parking to the perimeter of campus.

The multi-tiered student parking lot on 7th Street is one such addition that has been made. In addition, 15-minute load and unload zones have been added to every residence hall, and flashers are required in these parking spaces.

The University intends to make other changes in the near future, including making lots either solely for students or for faculty and staff. Faculty-and-staff-only lots will become event lots after hours.

More parking spots will also be made available for visitors near Marts Hall, allowing visitors access to parking.

Krech said there also will be an emphasis on improving parking on the lower campus.

As a result of the many changes that have been made, Public Safety issued warnings instead of tickets from Aug. 20 until Sept. 3. This temporary system allowed students to learn the new parking rules.

Due to requests from the Bucknell Student Government (BSG), Public Safety will also be dismissing the first ticket that individuals receive this semester, except for tickets received for parking in handicapped spaces or for blocking fire lanes.

First tickets should be sent in to Public Safety with a note for remission.

Krech feels that the majority of the campus has been grateful and understanding of the many parking changes on campus.

"The majority of campus has been highly supportive of the parking committee. We've received thank-yous for adding stop signs, clarifying lot designation, adding 15-minute load/unload zones and widening parking spaces. And we certainly appreciate the patience from the campus community as we continue with the construction project," Krech said.

Students and staff voiced varying opinions on the University parking situation.

"Parking on campus has gotten better if you want to drive to class, but it has not improved at all near residences. If someone drove back to their room late at night, the probability of finding a parking spot is small and then the only option is to walk home in the dark," Lisa Sechrist '03 said.

"It can be frustrating if you come in at a busy time like 8:30 a.m., but it's worth it to have a green campus," Reference Services Specialist Martha Holland said.

as best we could to President George W. Bush's request that we return to normal. Today, we look back, remember and mourn yet again. We know that our world will never be the same ... We know we must remain vigilant but we need not fear. Our people have shown the ability to never forget, while at the same time moving forward with their lives."

Fujita said at the ceremony, "May our actions speak louder than our words and may this coming year be a time when we our both proud of ourselves and proud of our great nation."

Matt Vanaskie—The Bucknellian

VP for Student Affairs Charlie Pollock '70 speaks at one of the events to commemorate Sept. 11.

One Islamic student read a verse from the Quran at the ceremony, which conveyed the message that to take a human life is to kill all mankind and to save a life is to save all mankind. Another Islamic student read a prayer expressing a Muslim-American viewpoint of sorrow over Sept. 11.

At the ceremony, Oliver quoted former U.S. President Abraham Lincoln at the conclusion of his second inaugural address.

"With malice towards none, with charity for all, with firmness in the right that God gives us to see the right, let us strive on to finish the work we are in, to bind up the nation's wounds, to care for the one who shall have borne the battle and for his widow and his orphan. To do all which may achieve, adjust and lasting peace among ourselves and among all nations," Oliver said.

Sojka provided the closing remarks at the ceremony. He compared the attacks last year to the attack on Pearl Harbor in 1941.

"We can't help being afraid. We can't help being angry. We can't help our sorrow," Sojka said. "But, we can do something about what we do with our anger. We can be sure that we don't let it descent into hatred. That our anger which is a good and natural response can be focused to make sure that we do what we can to protect ourselves ... We can deal with our fear. Not by letting it panic us into some sort of catatonic state, but allowing it to develop into some sort of sense of wearying so that we become a bit more careful and a bit less vulnerable."

Pollock said for Rogers at the ceremony, "Today you have a chance to commit to make a difference by the way you live your life. If such commitments pervaded our various cultures, imagine the world that could be. We will never forget. United we stand. God bless America."

Arafat's ministers submit resignations

RAMALLAH, West Bank—Amid the biggest challenge to Palestinian leader Yasser Arafat's authority in years, his 21-member Cabinet resigned Wednesday, allowing him to avoid being ousted by parliament in a no-confidence vote. Arafat's earlier announcement of a date for elections failed to calm parliament, which has been mired in an acrimonious debate over reforms to root out corruption.

Nora Abdullah '03, another international student, is angry about what is happening.

"This is outright racial discrimination, and it is not being questioned by as many people as it should be," Abdullah said. "Singling out Muslims is ridiculous, as that represents about 1.3 billion people in the world who by no means deserve to be stereotyped and alienated as a group."

Zingale-Baird hopes that these security procedures will not prevent other international students from studying at the University in the future.

"These students are valuable and important to Bucknell," Zingale-Baird said. "They bring a different perspective to the classroom, and if the government has to restrict that, I think it's a great loss."

University to host free outdoor festival and concert Sept. 21

By Sandi-Jo Galati

Courtesy of www.HowieDay.com

Fall Fest will bring live music, including singer/songwriter Howie Day (above), to the University next weekend. Most of the planning behind the festival came from the Bucknell Student Government (BSG) with limited assistance from the administration.

After months of planning, Fall Fest 2002—a campus-wide outdoor concert—will take place on Sept. 21.

Fall Fest 2002 will be a free event featuring "The And Band" and Pete Francis from "Dispatch" opening for Howie Day. After the Howie Day performance, Gary Thaniel, the University concert committee representative, will deejay the event.

The event will run from 1-5 p.m.

Dining Services plans to provide free food throughout the afternoon. Vending carts will be serving snow cones, popcorn and cotton candy.

Bucknell Student Government (BSG) members, spearheaded by Class of 2004 President Cisco Sanchez with the assistance of Associate Dean of Students Kari Conrad, have been planning the Fall Fest event since last spring in response to student requests for more outdoor activities.

"Students have been asking for more outdoor events for a long time," Conrad said. "Taking advantage of beautiful fall days on the lawn outside on an annual basis will be something that students can remember."

The stage will be set facing the hill of the uphill Langone Center lawn so that students will be able to sit on the hill to watch the concerts.

"It makes sense to have it outside," Thaniel said. "We have such a beautiful campus."

Funding for the event was collaborative, provided by individual class budgets, the University Concert Committee, Activities and Campus Events (ACE) and BSG, although Conrad attributes most of the planning efforts to BSG.

"The idea was their baby," Conrad said. "They have been working on it really hard and talking with a lot of different departments to coordinate the event."

Thaniel said that he and Sanchez spent much of the summer e-mailing each other in planning Fall Fest, trying to create a memorable atmosphere for students.

"I think students will really enjoy Fall Fest," Thaniel said. "It will just be a good time for students to come together and relax outside."

Fall Fest was also planned with the first nighttime football game in mind. During the event, the captains of the football team will be introduced to the student body to encourage attendance as the Bison take on Cornell at 7 p.m. that evening.

"They'd really like to encourage participation at the first night football game, so Fall Fest will lead right into that," Conrad said.

That morning will also be the first of the fall admission days, when the University hosts prospective students for the Class of 2007. Coupling the admissions activities with Fall Fest and the football game, Conrad dubbed Sept. 21 as "an all-around Bucknell day."

Students are already enthusiastic about participating in an event like no other hosted by the University.

"I will definitely be in attendance," Stephanie Keller '04 said. "Fall Fest sounds like a high-quality campus event."

The organizing committee is confident that the student response to the event will match current excitement and expects that Fall Fest will become a University tradition.

"We definitely hope we can keep Fall Fest going well into the future," Thaniel said.

Meanwhile, both the planning committee and students hoping to attend are crossing their fingers in hopes of amiable weather.

"I think it's going to be awesome if it doesn't rain," Matthew Baker '05 said. "The University needs to do things that are untraditional more often, and anything that's outside is fun."

Helt to coach both varsity tennis teams

By Andrew Burr
News Editor

Eric Graham—The Bucknellian

Rebecca Helt will coach both women's and men's tennis this season, with the help of former Susquehanna University men's tennis Head Coach Sean Monaghan. Helt has been the women's tennis head coach for five years.

In addition to her current duties, women's tennis Head Coach Rebecca Helt has assumed the men's tennis head coaching position this season. Sean Monaghan, former Susquehanna University men's tennis head coach, has been hired to be the assistant coach for both tennis teams.

The move was dictated by University athletics administrators, but Helt says she is "no doubt" looking forward to the challenge.

"These are two great groups of kids—I inherited a fantastic, talented group of men to go along with a hardworking group of ladies. This last month has been challenging, but it will continue to be a priority of mine not to do what's easiest, but to do what's best for both teams."

Helt's leadership of both teams marks the first time in the University tennis program's history such a consolidation has occurred.

"Bucknell's varsity tennis programs have been very successful throughout their histories, and as the athletics department looked at ways to maximize coaching resources and further enhance the Bison student-athlete experience, it was a natural evolution to name one head coach with an assistant to work with both programs," Athletic Director John Hardt said.

Recognizing the huge increase in Helt's responsibilities, Monaghan was hired to help ensure coaching resources are not worn thin as a result of the consolidation. Monaghan is a resident of Sunbury, Pa., and is a member of the United States Tennis Association and the United States Professional Tennis Association as well as a United States Professional Tennis Registry Certified Tennis Instructor.

"Growing up in the area, I'm familiar with Bucknell and have respect for the way it runs things," Monaghan said. "This is a great opportunity to combine programs and give the players two sets of eyes now instead of just one. I'm very happy with how things are going so far."

Hardt also believes the coaching consolidation will mean only good things for the tennis program and players. Like the two coaches, Hardt equates the new coaching situation to better opportunities for players to receive the instruction they are entitled to.

"Combining the two teams under Head Coach Rebecca Helt's established leadership and providing the added benefit of a capable assistant coach are positive steps toward moving our tennis programs in the right direction. The players will have the benefit of two experiences coaches focusing on practices and matches instead of one," he said.

Budget problems necessitate University spending cuts

By Jim Leahy
Senior Writer

This summer, finances for corporations underwent intense scrutiny as companies like Enron and WorldCom disclosed major problems. In June, as the University began to close out its books for the 2001-02 fiscal year, the budget revealed some holes and gaps where there should not have been any. As a result, the University now has to fix spending irregularities and reduce some spending to stay on track with the Board of Trustees' mandated budget.

In an Aug. 28 memo from Vice President for Finance and Administration Jo-Anne Lema to faculty and administrative staff, the University details the budget inconsistencies. In addition, Lema outlines some necessary steps the University must undertake to correct the problem, affecting all areas of the University.

The problem lies in how the University can spend money that the endowment income provides. The University has two available forms of endowment income—unrestricted and donor-restricted. Donor-restricted income can only be spent on a program or programs approved by the source of the funds. The unrestricted funds are general monies that the University is free to spend on whatever programs it sees fit. The distinction has been around for a long time but is not one that has ever, until now, caused the University problems.

As with any financial budgeting process, those preparing the budget make assumptions to allow for variances in income due to market conditions. In the few years leading up to the NASDAQ market peak in 1999, the University's assumptions in how its income was spent worked very well. Endowment income has since slowed and the spending irregularity has now been uncovered.

Over the past few years, restricted income has been rising faster than unrestricted income, while the market bubble that has recently burst hid the problem. Another reason it remained hidden is that the University's budget, under the Strategic Financial Plan adopted in 1995-96, is approximately 4,000 lines long.

According to the University, "the fiscal 2002-03 budget had been projected to end the year with a $0 balance. However, the unrestricted funds would have ended the year with a $1.6 million deficit, and there would have been a surplus of $1.6 million in the restricted funds. The deficit in the unrestricted line is not acceptable." As a result, the University undertook a change of its budgeting practices and has since closed the gap.

The University has decided to make some major changes to its budgeting processes. They include changing the models and assumptions so they fit into real life, moving expenses on unrestricted budgets to restricted sources where possible and possibly spending more from restricted financial aid sources. The University has also conducted a review of restricted funds to determine if they can be classified as unrestricted, changing the financial aid process to streamline fiscal year planning and maximizing gifts for budget relief purposes.

To make matters worse for the current budget, the Board of Trustees mandated in April that the University reduce the budget's size by $500,000, taking the total deficit to $2.1 million. In order to fix all the problems, the University has had to take some steps for the current fiscal year. They include "a reduction in the contingency budget, a reallocation of the debt service reserve, reductions in personnel and operating budgets for the Recreation and Athletics Center and significant operating reductions within each division—with the exception of the academic departments."

The University is convinced the problems have been fixed and that something like this will never happen again. It also insists that vital services have not had reductions made to them. It has also asked all faculty and staff for their help in reining in costs and making sure that overspending never happens again.

Ceremony appropriate way to commemorate tragedies

One year ago this past week, America experienced its greatest tragedy when terrorists crashed planes into the World Trade Center and the Pentagon. America also saw a courageous act that day when the passengers of Flight 93 stormed the cockpit and prevented the plane from crashing into its unknown target. Although the events took place many miles away, the consequences of these acts of terrorism were still felt at the University.

Now, one year later, people around the country are commemorating the events of Sept. 11 by holding ceremonies, wearing patriotic ribbons and even just spending time with family and friends. Here at the University, administrators and the community decided that the most effective and appropriate way to observe the anniversary of Sept. 11 would be to have a moment of silence at 8:47 a.m., the time when the plane hit the north tower, provide support for University community members, hold religious services and hold an all-campus ceremony called Remembrance, Reflection and Renewal.

The University events and ceremonies that took place on Sept. 11, 2002, proved to be an effective way to commemorate the anniversary. The events provided students with the opportunity to reflect on the past year, as well as be a part of the University community that came together and continued to be strong when the tragic events occurred.

Although some students questioned the University's decision not to cancel classes on Sept. 11, both this year and last year, that decision was made in the best interest of the students in mind. President George W. Bush requested that Americans try their best to move on with their lives, and the University aided in Bush's optimism for the future of America by maintaining scheduled classes.

Wednesday's ceremony continued Bush's request and further conveyed a sense of hope.

During the Remembrance, Reflection and Renewal ceremony, students gathered behind Rooke Chapel, as University faculty and students reflected on the past year by sharing speeches, poems and other words of hope and pride. Vice President of Student Affairs Charles Pollock '70 reminded the community of how it prevailed last year and rallied in support of one another.

On Wednesday, there was a table in the LC giving out red, white and blue ribbons, and international students held baskets of 9/11 commemorative pins for distribution following the ceremony. Although the events happened a year ago, the University community's support and pride was still evident throughout the day.

While most of the ceremony illustrated a positive, sentimental and hopeful attitude, one speech expressed a negative perception of people. Rabbi Serena Fujita's speech presented the idea that although people showed pride and a caring nature around the time of Sept. 11, those attitudes have disappeared and people have stopped expressing the kindness that swept the nation last year. She suggested selfishness has taken over in the place of the international selflessness expressed immediately following last year's terrorist attacks.

However, the amount of people throughout the world, nation and University that participated in Wednesday's commemoration proves that that kindness has not disappeared and that people's support for one another has remained prevalent. For example, from a human American flag in Australia, to a wreath placed at an American embassy abroad, to bagpipers marching through New York City streets, the world has come together once again, as did Bucknellians in the solitary grove behind Rooke Chapel.

Liberty and justice for some

By Katie Parker
Senior Writer

President George W. Bush's front of harmless ignorance and hilarious grammatical mishaps had somewhat lulled me into a false sense of security—admittedly, I felt less than threatened by a man whose political rhetoric rivals that of a 10-year-old's.

Fortunately, the illusion has passed, and I wake up to a nightmarish state of affairs, where the implementation of a detrimental conservative agenda seems just steps away, and where I am beginning to find my role in this society, formerly my choice, to be prescribed to me. And here I thought George was just choking on pretzels, not forcing standards down my throat.

Here's a little how-to manual on surviving the rest of the Bush administration:

First off, don't be an independent, unmarried, sexually active woman if you can help it—one shudders to even think of it!. The key here is being sexually active, as your contraception may not be covered by insurance by the time ol' George leaves office.

In his 2002 budget, Bush cut out funding for contraceptive coverage in the Federal Employee Health Benefits Plan (FEHBP). Lucky for us single-and-lovin'-it women, the U.S. House of Representatives restored the funding for this year, and Bush did not try and exclude it from the budget for fiscal year 2003. In my opinion, the old "family values" mantra should be replaced by the slogan "Get Impregnated!," considering Viagra is still covered and is in no danger of being cut from the FEHBP's budget.

Oh, and girls, watch out if you do happen to get unexpectedly pregnant. Not only has the Bush administration taken several steps to try and undermine abortion rights, but his 2002 proposed budget also sought to cut maternal and child health block grants providing health care to women before, during and after their pregnancies.

Second of all, don't be a homosexual. Bush is a big supporter of Texas's sodomy law, which makes same-sex sexual activity illegal, defending this measure as a "symbolic gesture of traditional values."

In 1999, as governor, he opposed a hate crimes bill specifically because it included sexual orientation in the definition of a hate crime; in the same year, he supported a measure banning gay couples from becoming foster parents or adopting foster children. He also supports the "Don't Ask, Don't Tell" policy, a measure allowing the military to expel personnel for being openly homosexual.

Third of all, be Christian. Bush's "Faith-Based Advisory Committee," which heads the House-Senate Republican Faith-Based Leadership summit, is made up of president-appointed representatives, some of whom have demonstrated highly prejudicial attitudes towards people of different faith and sexual orientation.

Americans United for Separation of Church and State (AU) reports that presidential appointee Bishop J. Delano Ellis II, a minister who was dismissed as Cleveland police chaplain in 1995, has called Jewish people "carnal, selfish ... dirty and lowdown and wicked," while maintaining that "God allowed Hitler to rise up and make [them] all suffer." A fellow appointee, the Rev. Louis P. Sheldon, has declared a "homosexual invasion" in the United States that could result in the "stealing of our children." This "honorable" advisory board member has also previously suggested that we quarantine AIDS patients in "cities of refuge."

All this is not to say that there is something novel or subversive about the Oval Office's promotion of certain types of lifestyles. By all means, choose to be married before you have children, choose to be heterosexual, choose to be Christian. What is alarming about the stuttering man behind the desk is not the advancement of conservative ideologies, but the extent of his agenda and the steps he has taken to implement these measures so that our "choice" as Americans is in danger of becoming more and more limited.

Our country should not be about the eradication of individual freedoms and choices, but rather a celebration of them, which is why it is necessary to expose the prejudices rampant in the current administration and the standards implied by these dramatic policy shifts.

Still, maybe I've simply misunderstood many of these policies, despite the fact that they are spelled out for me in clear English. It's certainly quite possible that I misinterpreted the oratorical genius of our president's recent announcement: "We hold dear what our Declaration of Independence says, that all have got unalienable rights, endowed by a Creator." Hmmm. Unalienable rights, huh? Thank goodness for that.

Investors' trust and money misplaced

By Michael Niebauer
Senior Writer

In the financial papers of the nineties, CEO names were as well known as celebrities or perhaps movie and sports stars. Now, in the third year of a bear market, the financial pages from The New York Times to Britain's Financial Times show that trillions of dollars of equity have been lost.

Through Securities and Exchange Commision (SEC) investigations and a now-outraged public demanding them, many pay and compensation packages are becoming public. The arrogance of the times allowed for many hard-to-justify or illegal extravagances.

It makes you feel that shareholders should demand better disclosure of corporate board actions if they are to be asked to withstand the losses in this one-sided relationship.

From the New York Daily News article, Tyco's former CEO Dennis Koslowski, still holds his New York corporate-paid apartment even after being investigated for tax evasion charges.

Sandy Weill, CEO of Citigroup, admitted to "inappropriate behavior" by stock traders giving preferential treatment to larger clients on stock options at their Solomon-Smith Barney unit, according to the Financial Times.

Citigroup is also under investigation for predatory lending practices by the Congressional Banking Committee and the SEC.

On the syndicated Louis Rukeyser's "Wall Street," Weill stated that incidents like these have contributed to the current crisis of confidence in financial markets. This was weeks before the July stock market meltdown. Citigroup has lost over one-third of its worth during this calendar year so far.

Mutual fund managers also became stars in the '90s, but they have become strangely silent now.

One grand exception is Jack Bogel, chairman and founder of the Vanguard Fund.

On Rukeyser's show, he stated that the major funds sold more than they advised in the '90s and initiated and issued too many new funds in general, even advertising the "best performers," which he labeled inappropriate.

Bogel said that the current silence of most major fund managers about financial shenanigans is shameful in light of the massive losses this summer. Bogel feels that Wall Street will lose the credibility battle if the herd mentality doesn't end.

Also a new era of credible workman-like representation and consultation must replace the wide-open ill-use and abuse of small stockholders and shareholders. More rights and disclosure to shareholders is necessary.

Another gut check for corporate investors was illustrated in The New York Times article during a divorce proceeding between former General Electric CEO Jack Welch and his second wife, when company-sponsored perks were disclosed.

General Electric's stock has been depressed because of transparency problems. Welch's total yearly compensation in 2000 was $16.7 million before his retirement last September.

The following costs were never released to stockholders and are still somewhat incomplete. However, these perks will continue throughout his retirement.

His wife's divorce documentation continues, "A yearly retainer of $86,000.00, the use of company aircraft, the use of a company apartment owned by GE, floor-level seats to the New York Knicks, tickets to the U.S. Open, satellite television to all four homes and all costs associated to the New York apartment, from wine, food, laundry, to toiletries and newspapers."

Welch, a wildly profitable corporate CEO and best-selling author, is worth $900 million. He was married for 12 years, and is protected by a pre-nuptial agreement.

The soon-to-be former Mrs. Welch provided an expert assessment—the use of the company's Boeing 737 aircraft alone is worth $291,869 a month or 3.5 million yearly. These benefits are irrevocable and will go uncontested in court by shareholders since the GE board awarded these perks by a legal vote. Shareholder advocates show disgust at this, but all of it is legal.

In a splashy headline in the New York Daily News entitled "GREED!," Jack Welch proudly stated that he was worth every penny and perk.

Protections from general corporate transparency to full disclosure of all transactions under federal law must happen, or Jack Bogel unfortunately will be correct. Bogel's prediction that Wall Street will lose its battle for credibility with small and large investors and government too will be sadly true.

The investing public simply deserves to know what exactly it is they pay for, or this isn't investing—it is gambling, plain and simple, with rules made up during the game.

Letters to the editor

9/11 remembered

To the Editor:

We at Bucknellians for Peace would like to extend our deepest sympathies to those who lost loved ones in the tragedy that occurred one year ago. The events of last year have affected us all in some way, and we empathize with those that have been having difficulty. We all have felt a loss, and the community of support is there for those that need it. We encourage everyone to reflect upon how they are able not only to help themselves, but help others as well.

With deepest condolences,
Bucknellians for Peace

Calendar questioned

To the Editor:

We recently downloaded the academic calendar for University. Alas, we were appalled to see some flagrant omissions! During the fall semester it is very well noted of the six Jewish religious acknowledgements, and even one for Ramadan. Mention is made of Passover in the spring semester along with Easter. We find it startling that there is no mention of Christmas nor Good Friday, and for that matter with all else you mentioned, All Saints Day in November. If this was an oversight, you should be embarrassed. If it was intentional you, should be ashamed of yourself.

Sincerely,
Mr. & Mrs. P.J. Del Giudice

Posters misrepresent

To the Editor:

I am writing concerning some signs that were recently put up on campus regarding the "living wage" issue. I do not mean the Conservatives Club's (BUCC) "here and now common sense" posters, but the posters that purport to be written by the BUCC, stating that members of the club oppose the "living wage" because "we like eating hamburgers more than they (the staff) deserve to feed their families."

I, as well as the rest of the BUCC, simply want to make sure the campus is aware that this notion is erroneous and libelously attributed to the members of the Conservatives Club. The "thoughts" on those posters are not ours, but, in fact, belong to someone without the class to even put his/her name, instead of ours, on his/her reckless insults.

Sincerely,
Denise Chaykun '04
President of the Conservatives Club

Point system is pointless

By Tom Elliott
Senior Writer

Bored? I recommend taking a gander at the University's alcohol policy, located on pages 32-33 in the Student Handbook. You may find yourself inclined to agree with a growing sentiment: not only is it ineffective, it's dangerous. You may even be mildly amused.

The sanction system's most bothersome aspect is its overriding objectivity. There are innumerable ways in which hypothetical students could easily earn themselves a semester-long suspension. In the interest of observing the policy's effects in reality, I'll stick to actual events.

One student was recently notified by the administration that he would be required to leave school for the duration of this semester. He didn't vandalize, he didn't cheat and he didn't fail out. He was, however, caught drinking.

I don't want to trivialize underage drinking, but I do want to note that the school has an unusual attitude towards it—one that overly bastardizes booze.

The student had a clean record until April of his first year. During Houseparty weekend, he was caught with a beer on Fraternity Road. A week later, he was guilty of being in the presence of empty beer containers while also being under the age of 21. A week later, he was nabbed again, this time for tampering with snow-fence light bulbs while under the influence. This was the only incident that he felt merited a substantial punishment. These events amassed six points, and all within one month. Finally, along comes his sophomore year, and almost immediately, more trouble. This time, the crime was an open container, off campus.

Certainly his actions deserve repercussions. But is a semester-long suspension the appropriate recourse?

To help answer the question, I asked one of my friends, who missed fall semester last year under similar circumstances. (Ironically, weeks after he had left campus, he was found not guilty of the public-drunkenness charge. But it was too late, he had already been suspended.)

"My semester off was spent working," he said. "It sucked because everyone was progressing while I was forced to stay stuck in time for four months. When I finally came back, my brain was out of shape. It was my worst academic semester here."

The deans claim that the threat of suspension is a worthy deterrent. Maybe. Is it possible to deter underage drinking while simultaneously acting proactively? I believe it is, and I believe this alcohol policy fails miserably in achieving this ideal.

Alcohol is to Dean Ferraro what Shaq is to the 76ers—you can't stop it, you can only hope to contain it. Underage drinking is not preventable. A stringent alcohol policy is one idea, but there are others. No policy will ever be 100 percent effective, but it is possible to create a system in which underage drinking occurs as infrequently and harmlessly as possible. It's also advantageous to have punishments that will teach the culprit, benefit others or procure other positive outcomes. Suspending students achieves none of these objectives.

It takes eight points to earn a semester-long vacation. Playing beer pong is five points. If you get caught playing this game twice, your parents will wish it were OK to be happy about spending so much more time together. Pong is by far the most unduly punished violation in the entirety of the policy. DUIs and supplying minors with alcohol are the only other violations carrying five points. This being so outlandish, I hereby challenge the administration to produce one study that shows any danger in playing the game. If they can't, why shouldn't we be allowed to play it?

Not only does our current policy do little to combat the dangers of underage drinking, it also encourages even more dangerous drinking habits. The reasoning is twofold.

First, it is not in the interest of the administration to drive a wedge between the students and those in charge. Previously, a student's record wouldn't collect violations in the cumulative fashion it currently does. It was possible to make a mistake, pay the price and to continue to roam campus without fearing Public Safety like it was the enemy. Now, a student with points has an increased incentive to cease communication with Public Safety, the agency in charge of protecting the student body. In uncertain times, it now becomes questionable to call for help from Public Safety. This leads to the second reason.

Ferraro seems to be on the Evangelical Hospital receptionist's speed dial. Every student who's admitted for anything alcohol-related usually ends up talking to Ferraro shortly after. If you have consumed alcohol to the point where you need to seek medical attention—yet have some write-ups from your first-year RA—in your hazy state, it may seem more reasonable to hope for the best, rather than risk certain suspension by going to the hospital.

Public Safety seems determined to not let one incident go unnoticed. Even before the first two weeks of the school year had elapsed, 50 students living in Bucknell West had been written up. Fifty! More recently, a student was acting in a highly condemnable nature—breaking windows—and soon Public Safety attempted to detain him. When he failed to comply, the officer threw his flashlight at his back, knocking the student over, so he could then be written up. I detest people who vandalize, but I question if this kind of action is necessary to further the interest of Public Safety. This type of statistic reflects less an implication of a rambunctious student body, rather, that of overzealous enforcement.

The alcohol policy would only gain effectiveness if it were to lose its cumulative point methodology. What can be accomplished through accumulating points can be done so without the actual points. A student's record should be available to the deans when he commits an infraction so that everything is weighted accordingly. There's no reason action should be taken because a chart says so. I believe the deans are able to determine appropriate punishments without their higher-up, The Chart.

Many students who must take the semester off have parents that are unwilling to continue to finance their tuition. For some, crossing the eight-point threshold means the indefinite end of their higher learning experience. The deans shouldn't be able to alter the direction of our collegiate careers because of an empty container.

Much ado about global warming

By Josh Fisher
Opinions Editor

For decades now conservatives have yelled and screamed about the liberal myth that is global warming. Oil companies and their political crony counterparts have gone to great efforts to find scientists who will prove that it does not exist, that this is just another "tree-hugging-pinko-commie" ploy.

Well guess what. If you have enough money, you can hire scientists to prove that arsenic makes a good toothpaste. Such is the beauty of America, the best democracy money can buy!

You might not have noticed, but the Bush Administration has quietly admitted that global warming is indeed taking place, and that human activity is most likely the cause.

What was that? Did you just suck up 30 years worth of vitriol, hoping that nobody noticed? Oh, too bad that we didn't even get to see you swallow.

The obvious solution to this problem, developed by the great minds and razor-sharp intellect of this administration; do exactly nothing about it.

Unbelievable, yes. But in the parlance of "self-help," the first step to recovery is admitting you have a problem. Let us clarify:

The United States, in a study recently conducted by the Environmental Protection Agency (EPA), has admitted to the United Nations "the changes observed over the last several decades are likely mostly due to human activities."

Although the report did not, go so far as to rule out that some of these changes might be a reflection of natural variability, ignoring this problem could still have more dire consequences than expected.

Greenhouse gases and other pollutants stay in the atmosphere anywhere from 100 to 1,000 years, meaning whatever steps are taken today, humanity (along with the rest of planet) is doomed to experience the lag effects of at least the past 100 years of human activity.

Global warming is expected to substantially change our climate within the next few decades with serious consequences, including heat waves, water shortages, rising sea levels, imbalanced ecosystems and more frequent and violent weather.

But although the U.S. Climate Action Report 2002 warns of catastrophe, it also recommends simply adapting to these "inevitable" changes, maintaining that there is no reason to reduce oil consumption or limit the output of greenhouse gases, including carbon dioxide, one of the main contributants to the global warming phenomenon.

According to United Nations Intergovernmental Panel on Climate Change, the rest of the world has known that we have had a "discernible impact" on the environment for a while now. And for the first time, in this incredible turn of events, the Bush administration acknowledges that global warming is indeed mostly caused by humans burning fossil fuels!

Yes, that's right. And they still propose to do exactly nothing about it.

I can just see the beads of sweat on ol' Dubya's brow as he tries to calm the nation, offering an odd smirk and a sincere message of hope: Don't panic. Go about your business as usual. Purchase gas. For God's sake, people, there is no need to curb your consumption of oil or other oil-related products.

But human consumption has an environmental impact? Yes, it's hard to believe! Well, what do you think we should do, consume less? That's ridiculous! To a lifelong oilman like Bush, it is certainly nothing less than heresy.

While never actually denying the report (and never actually reading it either—he was only briefed on it, sources say), Bush has refused the EPA's findings as a product of "bureaucracy," that ever-present and villainous "bogy man" of right-wing ideology.

Conservatives and representatives of the oil industry, who will no doubt continue to dispute the damaging effects of global warming "from here to perpetuity," went apocalyptic at this announcement, fearing that (gasp!) the administration might shape policy around this report's disturbing conclusion.

Environmental groups worldwide have suggested a different strategy altogether than the Bush Administration's comprehensive "do nothing" plan. Some even suggest switching to clean, green energy sources immediately, reducing the output of pollution and greenhouse gases, which would mean a greater planetary chance of survival as well as greater economic and physical well-being for most Americans! Wahoo!

The downside? It might cut into those Exxon executives' pocketbooks, and we wouldn't want that to happen.

Economics department hypocritical towards Living Wage

By Aaron Hanlon
Writer

Accountability is important. Even the most knowledgeable, qualified and politically savvy are reduced to spectacles of hilarity and embarrassment when their actions fall short of their promises. Everyone is guilty of this at least once in a lifetime (or a week), but those who are entrenched in heated ideological campaigns are generally held to a higher level of scrutiny.

Such is the dilemma of the economics department here at the University, in which the office doors are adorned with "Living Wage" posters, calling for "Here and Now Justice"

Unfortunately, the Department of Praise for Sweden has come down with a serious case of foot-in-mouth: self-advertised champions of the Living Wage Campaign, the department has sent out a regrettable e-mail to all economics majors showcasing their unwillingness to financially support the program that it aggressively lauds time and again.

The e-mail, written on behalf of the economics department and signed by Department Chairperson and Associate Professor of Economics Janet Knoedler, requests a student to take on the paid position of "student assistant" in a rare and unexpected display of appreciation for capitalist endeavors.

According to the e-mail, the responsibilities of this position would be "such duties as retrieving the departmental copies of The New York Times from the Bookstore and the departmental copies of the Financial Times and The Wall Street Journal every morning and delivering them to the economics office."

Essentially, the elitists in the economics department would rather spend department funds on an errand boy to deliver their papers roughly 150 yards uphill from the Langone Center than put excess funds toward their noble and exultant "Living Wage" cause.

This is particularly ironic in light of the recently posted attacks against the Conservatives Club's opposition to the "Living Wage Campaign," suggesting falsely and without any empirical evidence (libelously) that the Conservatives Club cares more about the privilege of eating good hamburgers than the livelihood of the "underpaid" support staff's "starving" children.

The irony lies in the fact that the people in the economics department (many of whom support the "Living Wage Campaign" and the messages of the signs that defame the Conservatives Club), have proven blatantly in this e-mail that they would rather pay a student to fetch the newspapers than walk literally less than two minutes to the Langone Center in the morning and save some cash on the side that could potentially be reallocated to a "Living Wage" fund.

This hypocritical scenario is an exceptionally lucid illustration of what is perhaps the most ridiculous aspect of the University's "Living Wage" campaign: Those who seem to support it the most also happen to be those who want to pay for it the least.

Instead, many who support the campaign are elitist idealogues who think, in some sort of twisted, degenerated logic, that everyone else should pay for their cause and fetch their newspapers!

It is admirable and a compliment to people's character to avidly support a cause in which they truly believe. Conversely, it is deplorable for people to defame and criticize those who do not support their cause when they fail to live up to their own recommendations.

I humbly suggest to the economics department: Put your money and your actions where your mouth is. Should you decide not to take my suggestion, I am more than willing to pick up your newspapers in the morning for $10.54 an hour, though my union contract stipulates that I would have to receive overtime compensation to fetch your slippers.

Walking campus will benefit University

By Jeff Day
Writer

As I stand in front of Dana Engineering, I find it hard to believe that this beautiful area was a concrete parking lot only a year ago.

For those of you who are new to campus, or who have simply never ventured to that "engineering place," the change that took place over the summer to convert a parking lot into a grass quad was simply remarkable. Not only does it beautify a section of campus, but it also contributes to the University's environment in which you don't have to look both ways before going to class.

This commitment to a truly rural environment has been a crucial factor for many prospective students in their decision to attend the University. We are, or have been, students here, and, for many of us, the appearance of campus played a major role in our decision to come to the University.

It is true that over the years, the appearance of this campus has changed dramatically. The past two years alone have shown major changes, including the addition of McDonnell Hall, Sigfried Weis Music Building and, of course, the impending athletic center. These have certainly changed not only the appearance of campus, but the size and character as well.

Additions and subtractions from the campus setting such as these can begin to detract from the original University environment. Consequently, the school has decided to convert much of its concrete and pavement into grass and walkways.

The question that must be answered is, "how far will the process go?"

Currently, the University is moving toward a "walking campus." This would eliminate the need and/or ability of students to drive around campus.

Now hold on. I know that at first this idea seems unfavorable and without cause, however, the benefits may indeed outnumber the drawbacks.

Although the University is indeed a beautiful school, many students feel that "crossing streets" on campus detracts from the rural atmosphere of the University. Furthermore, despite the small inconvenience that it does create, it would certainly be enjoyable to walk around an even more beautiful campus without the beeping of car horns or the sight of passing Jettas.

I'll admit that it is extremely nice to be able to cross campus by automobile and, for that matter, park right next to each building. But the University is committed to maintaining that small school aura while on college grounds, and turning it into a walking campus would help such a cause.

The most important thing to keep in mind, quoting "What About Bob," is, "baby steps."

We will not wake up tomorrow morning to see the inner roads and parking lots of the campus removed, nor will all roads cease to exist. Instead, the perimeter streets and parking areas will still be in place, and additional parking will be created. The administration is aware of the significance of such a change, and is still discussing the matter and its effects.

As a non-driver on campus, I freely admit that I have a different opinion than those who may cross campus often via their vehicles. My view is also not set in stone. There are certain aspects of a walking campus that need to be modified and questioned.

Whatever solution the administration decides to implement will undoubtedly be in the best interest of the students and faculty. We will just have to wait and see.

The business of rebuilding

On the one year anniversary of the World Trade Center attacks, a ceremony was held at the bomb site. Efforts to rebuild around the site are already underway.

By Jim Leahy
Senior Writer

Lower Manhattan is one of the most vital areas of the New York City economy, a place where many of the world's most powerful financial firms operate and some of the world's biggest stock exchanges trade. Until just over a year ago, the area was home to a vibrant atmosphere and extensive commerce. Then Sept. 11 came. Now there is a 16-acre hole, numerous businesses displaced and a dispute over what to do next.

What stood on that 16-acre hole was once known as the World Trade Center, a complex completed in 1973. The Twin Towers were Manhattan's most readily visible buildings and they stood above a complex that housed thousands of workers, millions of square feet of office space, thousands of square feet of retail space and a transportation facility connecting the area with New Jersey and the rest of New York City.

One and Two World Trade Center were 110-story towers that, according to CNN, contained 4.8 million square feet of available space, with each floor taking up one acre. Three World Trade Center was a hotel containing 600,000 square feet of space and Four, Five and Six World Trade Center contained a total of 1.4 million square feet of floor space. In addition, Seven World Trade Center stood across the street with its own office space.

Around the complex there were other buildings that were severely damaged. The World Financial Center, which runs along the Hudson River, sustained heavy damage when the towers fell and was shut for many months as renovations were undertaken. The center was home to companies like American Express and Dow Jones. The Winter Garden, an atrium among the World Financial Center buildings, was opened last week to much fanfare, ahead of schedule.

Legendary Century 21, a large discount department store across the street from the complex, also sustained heavy damage when the towers fell. It was closed until late February while crews spent $10 million, according to Newsweek, to reconstruct the space. The company has no plans to leave.

Additionally, businesses like the telephone company Verizon are rebuilding their infrastructure in the area. The phone provider had a major switching station located under Seven World Trade Center. According to a November Wall Street Journal report, the company's infrastructure was rebuilt in the area, with all 300,000 lost phone lines restored.

The losses in Lower Manhattan are staggering. According to a Newsweek report, "six buildings and 13.4 million square feet of space were destroyed, and a further 21 million square feet damaged. About 100,000 jobs were lost and $1.6 billion in much-needed city taxes. The total economic losses by the end of the year have been calculated at more than $50 billion."

But New York is beginning to recover, and the signs are everywhere.

Amazingly, many of the businesses in the area have returned to their former offices following the attacks.. They have found is that life is very different. Security is tighter, people are more on edge and there is the empty feeling of that space to which everyone keeps returning.

The first thing you notice is the security. The New York Stock Exchange, about three blocks from the site, is one of the most heavily guarded sites in all of Manhattan.. Employees and visitors go through extensive security. Any deliveries coming to the building must be put through scanners, and the roads around the building are closed off with heavily laden pickup trucks guarding them. Most employees working around the area now wear photo identification at all times to get into and out of their buildings. The people are another story. All around Lower Manhattan, people have been coming back to their residences, businesses and restaurants to begin their lives again. The streets are full of people, including plenty of tourists. Any loud noise or airplane overhead instantly gets people wondering if there is an attack underway. But people are again in Lower Manhattan, a sign that life does go on.

Then there is the subject of the site itself. It has become the star of the show, the center of everyone's attention. Tourists visit the site non-stop during the day, and the street vendors flock to the area to take advantage of their wallets. The site is still empty and, as of right now, there are many different plans on how to rebuild it. Some include new towers, some include transportation hubs and all include some sort of memorial.

Lower Manhattan will never be the same following the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks. However, the people of New York are trying to recover, to bring back normalcy to the area. Businesses are open again, tourists and residents walk the streets and eat in the restaurants and people have regained their swagger. But there is still an emptiness there that is hard to shake.

Zimbabwe must change its direction

By Gretchen Schrock
Business and Politics Editor

B & P Commentary

The history books on the colonial relationship between Africa and Europe during the past two centuries have been written and remain in the process of minor revisions as new insights and explanations are formulated. The President of Zimbabwe Robert Mugabe is extremely unsatisfied that the history books are on the editor's desk, destined soon for publication. He wants to turn back the clock and rewrite the ruinous saga of colonialism that has forever altered the lives of his fellow Zimbabweans.

However delusional or naive one might consider this project of historical revision, Mugabe is employing all possible means, including illegal arrests and violence, to redraw the colonial map, which left millions of Africans stranded on rocky, arid soil with a tiny white minority in control of half of Zimbabwe's fertile land.

What is his proposal for rectifying this imperial injustice that has been ignored since its inception in the 1880s? Mugabe and his cronies view the seizure of nearly 5,000 white-owned farms and their redistribution to landless black—which has the support of other southern African countries like Namibia and Mozambique—as the logical and necessary steps to punish the selfishness of the whites.

"Greedy, greedy, greedy colonials," said Mugabe in a New York Times article. "We can't satisfy that greed at the expense of the rest of the people, you see."

The faulty assumption of Mugabe is that the Zimbabweans of European descent today share the same claims of superiority and colonial attitudes as their counterparts in the heyday of British expansionism. The majority of the families with English ancestry have farmed the land and called Zimbabwe home for generations, while maintaining relatively meager ties to Great Britain. Their forced evictions are considered the ultimate betrayal from the government to which they have pledged their loyalty. Mugabe should instead be praising them for making Zimbabwe one of Africa's main exporters of grain and a symbol of potential success in the post-colonial era.

The black peasants who have resettled on this disputed land do not possess the essential skills, knowledge and equipment to manage a prosperous farm, plunging Zimbabwe into severe food shortages. According to the Washington Post, the U.N. World Food Program estimates that as many as 6 million Zimbabweans face starvation if they do not receive food aid soon. Following the U.N. Conference on Sustainable Development, Secretary of State Colin Powell, among with other diplomatic figures, accused Mugabe of pushing the country to the brink of starvation.

Aggravating this threat of mass starvation is the fact that prominent politicians with close ties to Mugabe's government have conquered vast fertile farmlands, while many poor blacks are left with stretches lacking adequate water and sanitation.

"His violent land-reform program is about entrenching his political power and rewarding his cronies and not about addressing historical injustices," said Tendai Biti, a senior member of the opposition party, the Movement for Democratic Change, in a New York Times article.

If this statement is correct, then the issue is no longer the redistribution of property wealth and the legacy of colonialism, but instead the desire for absolute political control and corruption hidden by the veil of racism. Just as the destructive imperial tendencies of Europe in the last two centuries irreversibly altered peoples and nations in Africa, so too will the detrimental policies of Mugabe harm the citizens of Zimbabwe. How can the president claim that his program of land redistribution will lift his fellow blacks out of dire poverty when it results in widespread starvation and social chaos?

Mugabe must recognize that the ink is dry on the pages of colonial history and there is no way to erase the words. Instead of nostalgically looking back into the past and vainly searching for possible methods of reverting to a bygone era, one must acknowledge the present system and find viable ways for forward movement for all citizens. Flipping Zimbabwean society upside down, crossing our fingers and hoping that it would somehow undo the inequalities of colonialism is inviting the twin evils of political upheaval and economic disaster into the country.

Increased social mobility for the black population would be better achieved through agricultural education and management training, along with some hands-on experience, giving them the skill sets required in the farming profession. With greater competency and enhanced confidence in their abilities, the black community would possess the foundation on which to build a renewed and stronger country.

The next chapter of Zimbabwe's history is waiting to be written and it is up to Mugabe to determine what the first sentences will be.

Bush and Lieberman push Homeland Security

The President continues to work with both parties in Congress and the Senate in an effort to establish the Homeland Security Department

Bush has threatened to use veto power on Homeland Security legislation if the Senate does not cooperate.

In wake of the first Sept. 11 anniversary, President George W. Bush and Sen. Joe Lieberman (D-Conn.) are pressuring Congress to approve the establishment of the Homeland Security Department. Much controversy has arisen in private and public sectors about its validation since Bush proposed the need for the department.

According to CNN, Bush has criticized the Democrat-led Senate for hinting at legislation that would curtail the administrative capabilities of the President and his Cabinet. If the agency is approved, it will attempt to consolidate over 20 government agencies such as the CIA and the INS. Bush said that the Senate legislation curtails the authority of the proposed department and underestimates its pertinence for keeping Americans safe.

Lieberman has pressed upon his Democratic counterparts that swift approval is necessary and that getting wrapped up in the minor details must be avoided. The former vice-presidential candidate supported his argument by legitimizing the need for a Department of Homeland Security in serving the best interests of the American people.

One problem that Bush addressed is the contention that complex regulatory statutes within the department may delay rapid response in the event of a national crisis, reported CBS News. Bush firmly stated that he would not allow special interests to interfere with the department's primary responsibility to protect the American people.

Senate Democrats countered Bush's assertions with a similar argument. Lieberman announced that his party's legislation would consolidate 24 security agencies in order to directly respond to terrorism. Lieberman also added that Bush supports a strictly bureaucratic structure similar to the agencies that failed to protect the American people last September. The Senate has become increasingly worried that Bush's demands would create a department too cumbersome to operate effectively. Senate Democrats also showed concern that the bureaucratic approach, supported by the president and the House of Representatives, would generate a security department that would undermine appropriate decision-making efforts.

Bush also requested that he have the power to hire, fire and transfer workers within the department, according to Reuters. This provision has been strongly opposed by Senate leaders due to the increased potential to infringe upon labor rights. Bush has threatened to use veto power if the Senate sends him legislation that does not permit direct authority over workers.

Amid the controversy, both parties within the Senate have expressed optimism that an agreement may soon be reached. Next week the Senate will resume voting on provisions that may or may not grant the authority over the department that the president is seeking

After a similar beginning to the 2001 season, the Bucknell football team has to put its 35-14 opening day loss to the Duquesne Dukes behind it and looks forward to playing on the west coast this Saturday. In this year's opener, the Bison have a chance to put their season on the right track when they travel to California to play St. Mary's on Sept. 14.

The Bison defense picked up where it left off last season, shutting down the opposition's running game. However, the offense could not pick up the slack for the Bison early on, going three and out on its first four possessions. Duquesne eventually found their way into the end zone late in the first quarter on an eight-yard pass play to make the score 7-0.

Offensively, things came together for the Bison midway through the second quarter. Bucknell strung together a seven-play, 55-yard scoring drive, capped off by a 16-yard touchdown pass from Todd Wenrich '03 to Nisan Trotter '05, to tie the score at seven with eight minutes and 53 seconds remaining in the first half.

On the ensuing drive, the Dukes connected on a 74-yard touchdown pass on second down. The two play drive gave Duquesne a 14-7 lead. Both teams struggled to move the ball for the remainder of the half, and the Dukes took a 14-7 lead into the locker room.

Defense ruled the third quarter, as neither team was able to put the ball into the end zone. The Bison looked as though they were going to put the ball in for a score towards the end of the period, but Wenrich was intercepted in the end zone, and the quarter ended with the score still 14-7 in favor of Duquesne.

The defense held for the Bison one more time at the beginning of the fourth quarter, and the Bucknell offense was put in position to tie the game. Jess Brinson '04 capped off the six-play, 49-yard drive with a four-yard touchdown run. Chris Lundberg '03 added the extra point to tie the score at 14 with 10:54 remaining in regulation.

On the next Bucknell possession, Wenrich was picked off again. Duquesne returned the interception 32 yards to the Bucknell 11-yard line. Two plays later, the Dukes put the ball in the end zone to take a 21-14 lead that they would not relinquish. On the next Bison possession, Wenrich was intercepted again, and Duquesne returned the ball 46 yards for a touchdown, pushing its lead to 28-14.

The Bison turned the ball over on their next three possessions. Following an interception of backup quarterback Kyle Fields '05, the Dukes connected for an 18-yard touchdown pass to make the final score 35-14.

The general consensus among Bison players and coaches was that they did not execute the way they had planned.

"We came out with a plan, and we just did not execute," Lundberg said.

Bucknell turned the ball over six times against Duquesne.

"Penalties and turnovers kill you," Assistant Coach Dave Kotulski said. "It's our ball, and we can't let somebody else have it."

"With six turnovers, you definitely cannot win a game," Lundberg said.

Kotulski seemed very confident in the future of his team, and especially Wenrich, his quarterback.

"[Wenrich] will bounce back and lead us to where we need to be," Kotulski said. "I feel good about where we are, but we have a long way to go," he added.

Now the Bison look forward to traveling across the country to play a tough opponent, St. Mary's College.

"We just have to put it behind us, take that loss and try to turn it into a positive and learn from our mistakes," Lundberg said.

"I think we will make a big improvement for next week," Wenrich said.

"We have a great task ahead of us in St. Mary's," Kotulski said. "They are going to move the ball. They know what they are doing, and hopefully we can come out and perform up to our potential."

Women's soccer edges Marist

By Dave Cohen

The Bucknell women's soccer team came out victorious over Marist on Sunday, Sept. 8 by the score of 1-0. The Bison, who were shut out by the identical score in their recent match-up with Saint Francis of Pennsylvania, controlled the game with a tally of 20 total shots attempted on goal.

The Orange and Blue defense was stellar once again, as it allowed just eight shots on goal, four of which were denied by goalie Laurie Purse '03. The Bison defense has squandered a mere four points over the first three games. Purse feels as if the squad will always have a good opportunity to stay competitive because of its strength defensively. She is also certain that winning by virtue of a shutout was imperative to rejuvenate the team after it came up short against Saint Francis despite dominating the game.

"We are just as strong if not stronger this year than we were last year," Purse said. "We have a lot of young players that are becoming dominant defensively. This was a good win to regain confidence in defending our title."

It wasn't until the 71st minute that the Bison got themselves on the board, thanks to Emily Keber '03.

"It felt great to score the goal," Keber said. "We all worked really hard the whole game. We had so many opportunities throughout the game and it felt great to finally capitalize."

Abbey Seayboyer '04 was appreciative of Keber's goal because it alleviated some of the pressure that the defense had to withstand throughout the afternoon.

"Keber's goal was a great shift off a corner," Seaboyer said. "She was right where she had to be. Keber tends to come through when we need her and yesterday was a prime example of that."

The play began with a corner kick by Michelle Santonacita '05, which Keber received before striking the ball into the net from 16 yards out. Santonacita credits an intense halftime discussion for the team's ability to put the ball into the net in the second half. She, like Purse, feels as if the victory was crucial in bouncing back from the Saint Francis loss.

"We were working really hard out of the back just to get the ball up the field in the first half," Santonacita said. "Once we got the ball up there we were having trouble putting the ball away. We came out on fire in the second half and our goal was to make sure our hard work would be rewarded. By that we were going to have to take quality shots. It was critical to win this game because it brought up our moral. Nobody was happy coming out with a loss from the last game and this game put us back on our feet."

In a game that proved to be a defensive dogfight, Santonacita and Keber provided most of the offensive firepower throughout. The two combined for seven shots on goal in helping the Orange and Blue improve its record to 2-1, 0-0 for the season.

New-look logo surpasses expectations

By Brian Klotz
Senior Writer

The Bucknell athletics department delivered on its commitment to introduce a new logo by this fall. At a special ceremony held at the Weis Center on July 22, the new logos and word marks were unveiled as the new official representations of Bucknell sports.

"We are excited about the new athletics logo and related marks," Director of Athletics John Hardt said at the presentation. "Our goal with this project was to create a look that would be unique to Bucknell Athletics, but at the same time would fit in appropriately with the University's current word mark. We are very pleased with the results, and I am confident that our student-athletes, our graduates and our fans will take great pride in the new set of athletics marks."

The origins of the Bison mascot go back a long time. The University first became known as the "Bisons" in the early 1900s, when William Bartol, a longtime professor at the University, suggested that the nickname "Bisons" be adopted to give the sports teams a true nickname. The campus's location in the Buffalo Valley—where 10,000 American bison, or buffalo, used to roam—was a primary reason for the choice. Many logos of bison have appeared on football helmets and uniforms, but none were really considered official until around 1990.

The last official Bucknell sports logo first appeared on helmets of the football team during the 1990 football season and had a surprising similarity to the logo of the Buffalo Bills. This was no coincidence because it actually was the Buffalo Bills logo. Originally, permission was given to Bison Club Director Jim Cambell around 1988 to use the Bills logo on Bison Club letterhead. Campbell had connections with the NFL and the Bills at the time, which enabled him to get the written permission to use the logo solely for that purpose.

For reasons unknown, the logo began populating itself throughout the athletic department and soon became the official representation of Bucknell sports. It took Campbell's retirement from the Bison Club during the 1999-2000 academic year, severing the University's tie with the Bills, to make the athletics department realize the logo needed to change.

"We needed to create a look unique to Bison Athletics," Associate Director of Athletics and External Affairs Todd Newcomb said.

Working closely with artists from Joe Bosack Graphic Design Co. of Pipersville, Pa., during the 2001-2002 academic year, the Bucknell athletics department has created an identity it can finally call its own.

"The new marks have already been incorporated into many facets of the athletics and recreation program, including uniforms, stationary, the Web site and on and around the athletics facilities," Newcomb said. "It is our hope, and expectation, that the general fan base will come to identify Bucknell University by the new marks, and therefore we need to make them as visible as we can."

Response to the logo has been largely positive, often dealing with the originality of the design.

"I do think it is original," Luman Bauta '03, a member of the football team, said. "Original is good because a place like Bucknell is known for its originali-

On Sept. 7, the Bison men's and women's cross country teams started out the season on the right foot (no pun intended) with an impressive finish at the Spiked Shoe Invitational Meet at Penn State. Both the men's and women's teams finished among the top five in their races out of a total of 20 and 17 teams, respectively.

The women's team finished second out of 17, which was an excellent first step in defending its four-year title of Patriot League Champions. Theresa Dennis '03 finished ninth overall with a time of 22 minutes, 25.43 seconds for the 6k.

"I feel that this team did exactly what was needed to prove themselves as great runners," Dennis said. "We are made up of both new and experienced

Men's soccer starts season off 4-0

The men's soccer team capped last week off with three wins to improve its season record to 4-0. The Bison traveled to Binghamton University Wednesday, Sept. 4 and came home with the first of their three shutouts, outscoring the Bearcats 2-0.

The Orange and Blue were outshot 10-7, but the defense managed to keep their opponents off the scoreboard. A little over six minutes into the game, forward Elliot Maruffi-Cowley '03 took advantage of a Binghamton mistake and rocketed a shot into the net.

Over a minute later, Nick Taylor '03 had a net-ripping shot from 22 yards out to score the Bison's second and last goal of the game. The defense took over for the remaining 82 minutes to hold Binghamton for the win.

The men traveled to the University of Buffalo this past weekend to play in the 2002 Bulls Fall Invitational. The Bison opened the tournament play against the hosts, the Buffalo Bulls. Both teams battled to get on the board, but the first half remained scoreless. Bucknell's Eric Brunton '06 ended the game's scoreless streak with a goal at the 68th minute.

The Bison's lead was sealed at two goals thanks to Chris Beekman's '04 one-on-one challenge with the Bulls goalie. Beekman's goal started with Adam Edwards' '06 punt from the Bison's defensive end. Steve Feather '03 won the air ball with a header directed towards Beekman. The Bulls had no chance, as Beekman sped past the defense and knocked the ball into the net.

"We were outplayed in the first half, but held on defensively. Our goalkeeper made some good saves to keep us in the game. The second half was a different story, as we pressured Buffalo and kept the ball in their end. We eventually got the goal and continued to push for the second goal, rather than set back and protect the 1-0 lead," Head Coach Brendan Nash said.

Bucknell came out on top at the Bull's Fall Invitational, when they beat Canisius 2-0 on Sunday, Sept. 8. In the first half, Maruffi-Cowley netted his second goal of ty." "I think the new Bison logo is a great addition not only for the basketball squad, but for Bucknell athletics as well," basketball player Boaki Lalugba '03 said. "It's unique, colorful, meaner looking and we won't be associated with the Buffalo Bills anymore."

Newcomb is very optimistic about the reactions and gives some perspective on the final design.

"We are extremely happy with the response the new graphics package has received, particularly from our student-athletes and our coaches," he said. "There are some out there, albeit a very small minority, that feel the Bison is too scary or mean looking, but we felt very strongly that the logo needed to convey an athletic image of a serious contender."

The result of all the hard work of the athletics department has produced a number of different logos. The main logo has a stampeding Bison with the words "Bucknell Bison" displayed below it and the secondary mark has just the head of the charging bison over the Bucknell "B." There are also word marks for each of the 26 varsity sports. According to Newcomb, there seems to be a split in liking the primary or secondary logo.

"There seem to be two separate favorites developing, in that the primary logo (with the words "Bucknell Bison" underneath it) is a hit with the alums and older crowd, while the secondary logo, featuring a bison head and the Bucknell "B," is more popular with the students and the student athletes," he said.

Either way, the new logo goes a long way towards moving the University's athletic image forward. Head Volleyball Coach Cindy Opalski believes strongly in the goals of the new logo.

"I think it's not only classy, but will also promote more departmental unity," Opalski said. "It's terrific that we have a unique mark that will help identify all the sports teams."

Anticipation grows for end to construction

The new Recreation and Athletic Center is scheduled to open in the spring of 2003. The facility will have a nutrition center, among other additions.

By Ainsley Maloney
Writer

It has been one year since the construction of the new Recreation and Athletic Center started, and curiosity about the building has continued to rise. Designed by Ewing Cole Cherry Brott Architects from Philadelphia, it is being constructed by R.S. Mowery and Sons at an estimated cost of $64,000,000.

Though the building is named the "Recreation and Athletic Center" for the time being, it is still subject to change. According to the Project Manager Angelo Vieceli, it is possible that the building may be named after an individual under the discretion of Ken Langone.

Curiosity about the progress of the building has left many people wondering when each facility will be open and who they will be opened to. Those interested in landmark events of the new athletic center are anxiously awaiting the first major milestones: the opening of the natatorium and the fitness center. These centers are expected to open in the middle of the first semester.

"We've been consistent on what's been communicated not knowing how the weather and construction would affect us. We were saying we'd like to open the first portion in early October and we're still here on that target," Senior Associate Athletics Director, Tim Pavlechko '91 said.

Unknown to many, portions of the new athletic center are currently in full use. The sports medicine center has been operational since the first day of classes, coaches have moved into new offices and some teams are moving into the new locker rooms.

"I get a little more excited by the little steps each day," Pavlechko said. "The target dates are slowly becoming a reality."

Vieceli set the final completion date for the spring of 2003. The last components will include a 4,000-seat pavilion housing three basketball courts and an instructional weight room where the old pool is currently located. The first event in the new pavilion, a women's and men's double-header against Lehigh, is tentatively set for Jan. 15—the first day of classes in the second semester, .

Though the wait is long for some, the results should be well worth it. The new facility holds many new options, including a nutritional center and snack bar which will provide an additional dining opportunity. In the fitness center, people will be able to complete their cardio workouts while watching television.

This opportunity will be provided through a system called "Broadcast vision" where people can tune into television stations through their walkmans. To the relief of many, the new center will also provide the luxury of air conditioning, which the old center lacked.

Not only will the new center provide more facilities, but it will also a greater number of activities. The extra space and equipment will provide such things as water aerobics and instructional weight lifting seminars, along with a coordinator for fitness and conditioning, as well as other added professionals.

Similarly, the new facility leaves the old facilities open for additional use. Davis Gym will still have three basketball courts, which will remain open for recreation.

"All the new facilities enhance what we used to be able to provide," Pavlechko said.

Until then, students are asked to remain flexible to the construction needs. The water polo team was asked to move its tournament to Franklin and Marshall since an event that size could not be hosted comfortably under the current conditions. Despite a few adjustments, many facilities are still accessible.

"We've done the best we can to continue to host events through the construction," Pavlechko said. "That was our goal, to keep things available as much as we could. The weight room and treadmills are still accessible; we didn't just close things down."

With some cooperation, students shouldn't be strongly affected by the construction, and with some patience, the facility will be ready in no time.

Volleyball improves to 4-3

By Cecily Cairns
Sports Editor

The Bison volleyball squad charged ahead of the .500 mark last Tuesday evening, defeating Howard to improve its record to 4-3 on the season. The Orange and Blue dominated the match by a score of 3-1, due mainly to their powerful defensive play.

The Bison had little difficulty putting Howard away in the first game, as they pounded their opponent by a score of 30-22 during the contest. Their foe, also known as the Bison, proved stubborn in the second game, evening things up with a 32-30 victory.

In the final two games, the Orange and Blue battled on to win both contests 30-27 and 30-28, respectively, and grab the overall victory.

On the defensive side, Jessica Le '06 and Carolyn Dougherty '05 led the way, while Breean Trapasso '04 continued to keep the offensive action rolling with 47 assists. Brandi Trapasso '04 and Melanie Ghiz '03 tallied 27 kills apiece.

The defeat of Howard followed a successful performance in the Holiday Inn Express Tournament at Stonybrook from Sept. 6-7. The Bison managed a 2-1 record over the weekend, defeating St. Francis and Providence along the way.

Although falling to Stonybrook in the first match on Saturday, the Orange and Blue still put forth some impressive performances, as Ghiz and Brandi Trapasso each had 13 kills. The team regrouped for the afternoon contest to defeat Providence 3-1, after sweeping the last three games in the match.

Ghiz and Breean Trapasso were both named to the All-Tournament team after their stellar play throughout the weekend.

The Bison will host their own invitational this weekend, the Bull Run Invitational. The matches are on Friday, Sept. 13 and Saturday, Sept. 14.

"It felt like a bee sting."

Those were the words that Ed McCaffrey chose to describe his injury to NFL Films just over a year ago. It was the kind of nonchalance that fans have grown accustomed to from McCaffrey, the 215-pound antithesis to histrionics. "Easy Ed" was never one to publicly bemoan his misfortunes, let alone do it in a melodramatic fashion. That he likened the complete fracture of his leg to the sensation brought about by a half-inch insect's defense mechanism encapsulates his entire approach to pain in general.

However, this understatement came with a silent disclaimer of doubt, of irresolution—it had to. That doubt was born from an image that burned itself into memory under a glimmering sky on the 10th night in September of 2001.

ABC rolled it over and over: McCaffrey reeling in the pass like a chameleon snagging its hapless victim; Shaun Williams thundering in from the left and leveling the 6-foot-5-inch daredevil; the big receiver tumbling over, still tenaciously gripping the ball as though it were a bomb that would detonate if it touched ground; that left shin buckling grotesquely several inches below the knee, allowing the lower part of the leg to vacillate as his foot was whipped about by centrifugal force.

It seemed at the time that it would be the last completion on a resume loaded with miraculous catches. Everyone runs out of magic some time. But surgeons patched things up with an intermedullary rod and a few screws and told him a comeback wouldn't be entirely implausible. So McCaffrey said he'd be back. It wasn't perfect, but it was good enough to elicit hope.

Eddie Mac just never stopped plugging away, never stopped hoping, or dreaming, or believing that when his Denver Broncos streamed out of the tunnel on Sept. 8, 2002 and into the bombardment of flashbulbs at Invesco Field at Mile High Stadium, he'd be right there with them. He endured the 15 remaining games, watching from the sidelines while his heart ached with the agony of not being able to bound out to the huddle and come to the aid of his struggling team, of not being afforded the opportunity to sacrifice his temporary well-being for a much-needed first down.

As the Broncos faltered along, McCaffrey's tibia and fibula were slowly reknitting themselves around that titanium rod. He was walking on his own, albeit with a substantial limp, by October. Doctors told him he might be running by May if everything went smoothly; he started running in April. He was ready for training camp, just like he had said he would be, catching passes, running routes and looking a little like the Ed McCaffrey of old. He even caught a couple passes in exhibition play.

Still, a shroud of uncertainty hounded him through it all, through the waning weeks of preseason and right into the opening minutes of last Sunday's contest against the St. Louis Rams. What would happen when he lined up against first-string players, when the game mattered, when his opponents held nothing back? How would his reconstructed leg hold up to the first grinding hit from an unabatingly relentless defense?

Perhaps what mattered the most, ultimately, was that McCaffrey had the courage to search for definitive answers to those doubts. In his particular debacle, the greatest imaginable tragedy would have been the loss of that fortitude, his trademark irreverence for the eminent danger he repeatedly placed himself in.

There was something inherently comforting about the sight of his towering frame loping onto the field—same unrelenting, "all-business" demeanor, same unnerving lack of protective padding, same endearing raggedy haircut. What was infinitely more reaffirming was that he proceeded to recklessly hurl himself around the field—throwing blocks, taking hits, bouncing right back to his feet—just as stalwartly as ever.

He didn't exactly set the field afire, but his presence was invaluable to the Broncos' offense. He caught two passes for 50 yards, one of which was a 27-yard grab that he hauled into the end zone for the game-deciding touchdown. It was enough to reassure McCaffrey, who claimed that before the game his heart rate must have been 250—and if McCaffrey admits that his heart rate was at 250, you can bet it was probably somewhere around 300.

To say that he's back to 100 percent, or to forget that he was ever gone in the first place, would be somewhat overzealous and a little delusional. It was painfully evident, on brief occasions, that he hadn't quite regained his speed or agility to the fullest extent. Yet.

In truth, there's no guarantee that he'll ever get it back (although it's easy to believe he will), nor is there any certainty that his return to the NFL will last. In accordance with common sense, it's fair to say that every play he makes is a product of borrowed time, and he probably knows it—most guys in his situation would have bid the game adieu last September.

His career could last another game, or it could last another seven years. While he's banking on the latter, he's aware of the former as a possibility. It's evident that he's prepared to play every snap as though it will be the last one he lines up for. Then again, he's been doing that his whole career.

One thing is for certain: however long it lasts, McCaffrey's return has been, and will continue to be, a pleasure to witness. No one in the league is more dependable, more hard-knocking or easier to cheer for than Easy Ed. He's indefatigable—unflinching, really—and for that reason he is in some ways indestructible.

If his metaphoric bee is lurking behind every snap, every hit, every cut of every route, brandishing its wicked stinger like a bayonet on a loaded rifle, you'd never know it by looking at him.

Maybe it's because he possesses a courage that could out-gun any antihistamine on the market.

What it takes

It was an all-American cast at the 2002 U.S Open Finals, an event held annually in New York, N.Y. The red, white and blue sported its perseverance in a city where overcoming obstacles is second nature. Pete Sampras, Andre Agassi and the Williams sisters each conquered the competition en route to a picture-perfect final.

Sampras overpowered Agassi to win the 2002 U.S. Men's Open. Sampras, behind a blistering 129-mph serve, kept Agassi on his heels throughout the match, making him look more like a "Shoot the Geek" game target on the Jersey boardwalk than a competitor. Sampras used his first serve genius to collect 33 aces in the match, cheating Agassi from many break point opportunities.

Both Sampras and Agassi are in their early 30s, old-timers in a sport where 21 is considered your prime, yet they left their walkers behind to rekindle a rivalry that goes back to the early 90s. In this, their 34th meeting, Sampras was to the one raising the trophy and earning his record-setting 14th career Grand Slam victory. In doing so, he became the oldest man to win the U.S. Open since Ken Rosewall in 1970.

Sampras collected 33 aces to defeat long-time rival and friend Andre Agassi.

Sampras has been battling critics' views that his game has progressed on a downward trend now that other passions in his life—mainly his wife and impending child—were taking center court. Also, having the dubious honor of a 33-tournament winless streak, nay-sayers seemed justified in his 17th-seed ranking at the U.S. Open.

Still, Sampras claimed he had one more Grand Slam victory in his body and he delivered. That being said, is Sampras satisfied to leave the sport that made him a star just yet?

"To beat a rival like Andre, in a storybook ending, it might be nice to stop," he said. "But I still love to compete. I'll see in a couple of months where my heart is and my mind. My head is spinning," Sampras said.

Rising tennis sensation Tanya Sichko '05, from the University's women's tennis team, commented on the match.

"Pete controlled the game with his first serve-second serves combination. Andre did not have a chance to return many winners and therefore found himself forced to the baseline swinging for survival."

A day after a draining four-set victory over the defending champion at the U.S. Open, Lleyton Hewitt, Agassi was not his usual spunky self, conceding, rather than dazzling, on strenuous points.

"I just was flat," Agassi said. "I tried to get myself into the match and had to work pretty hard just to give myself a chance. Just was never quite enough."

There is no rest for the weary—or is there? As much as fans would love to see their favorite athletes competing 24/7, 365 a la ESPN, the sugar pills eventually wear off and sleep becomes a requirement. As such, neither Sampras nor Agassi will be representing the U.S. Davis Cup team against France in Roland Garros. Patrick McEnroe, captain of the team, selected Andy Roddick, James Blake, Todd Martin and Mardy Fish instead.

On the ladies side, it was Serena Williams topping her older sister, Venus, for the U.S. Open Championship. Serena, a winner of the past three Grand Slam events, had to hold back impressive spurts by Venus to capture the title. Together, they have won eight of the past 13 major titles. Plus, the Williams sisters have met in four of the past five Grand Slam titles.

With this trend in mind, it is rumored tennis vendors are getting a head start on printing the finals' programs for the next major contest—the are already being made with the Williams sisters' pictures on them!

So does all this intra-family competition detract from their relationship? Serena offers her outlook on the unusual situation.

"Venus dominated me for a long time, but we always stayed close," Serena said. "Family comes first for us."

It must have felt like all their brothers, sisters, cousins and uncles from past generations were watching them with a record crowd of 23,164, which included celebrities such as Hank Aaron, Spike Lee, Joe Torre and Susan Lucci cheering the sisters on.

Between the lines, Serena showed little love for Venus, taking full advantage of her 10 double faults and 23 other unforced errors.

"I did the best I could today. I did make a lot of errors and that makes it tough to win the match," Venus said. "I think Serena was the best player in the tournament this year."

Advantage Pete and Serena ....

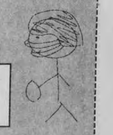
The white fly and its Chardonnay antics



If it weren't for the incessant advertising, the endless faux-psychoanalytical commentary and the cheerleaders in skimpy outfits, one might not have realized that professional football began its season this past weekend.

There was much ballyhoo and trumpeting for this first season under the newly realigned divisions and the inaugural season for the Houston Texans, but then again, in this commercialized age, there isn't much that doesn't get blown up to Leno-chin sized proportions (I swear tha; thing grows visibly over the course of a show).

Much could be said of the games themselves; three games extending into overtime, the fall of the St. Louis Rams, David Carr's first day, Titans, Packers and Bears, oh my. But when it really comes down to it, what do we really care about? Yes, the commentators.

Now, we all know about how, after years of working side-by-side, Pat Summerall and John Madden made their Super Bowl split. Much to popular misconception, Summerall did not retire, but rather refused to work with Madden. Now Summerall and Madden work for Fox and ABC respectively. This realignment is quite appropriate since Pat Summerall looks like a pouty-aged woodland creature recently pummeled with an ugly-stick, and Madden, or Jabba the Hutt as he's known to his friends, needs to work on the ABCs of shutting the hell up. I just want to remind everyone that Madden is the one who stated during the Super Bowl last year, "He just got right up behind the tight end and penetrated."

Also, did anyone notice the shameless EA Sports Madden football video game advertising during the Pats-Steelers game? They actually tried to reproduce a play from the game and replay it like it were an actual instant replay. Walter Benjamin must be rolling in the aisles of the dead right about now. To borrow a line from Dennis Miller, "I haven't seen choreography that stiff since the Lee Harvey Oswald prison transfer."

Speaking of Dennis Miller, as much as he flopped on Monday Night Football, he brought a unique and colorful approach to the game. Bantering his pretentious jabberwocky to even the most die-hard of football fanatics, he entertained millions with his highbrow and elitist literary rhetoric. Why a man seemingly so intelligent would attempt to add class to a sport that gives MVP recognition to murderers, pompons and tube tops to working mothers and spawned a media/sex-driven deceased orphan-league known as the XFL, is beyond my own cognitive recognition. Or in other words, "Demmis Milliner not so smrt, concusions and misspeelings funny."

Phil Simms is the latest in this barrage of inane verbal diarrhea we have dubbed "color commentating." Simms' nugget of wisdom this week in the Jets-Bills game was "getting a penalty is ... not ... good." That rivals a comment made during the Houston-Dallas game where the commentator stated that the Houston "special teams" unit really was special. Thank you, you can both pick up book two of "Hooked on Phonics" at the door.

And it's been on for a few years now, but what's up with the robots playing football on Fox's cut-scenes? Anyone having the Bicentennial Man over for a barbeque and a quick game of two-hand touch? This rivals baseball's superhero/comic book graphics of each player. I've got an idea, why don't we glorify these athletes a little more? The last thing we need is a picture of Jeter-tron banishing evil from distant nebulae. This man can't keep the ball in the infield and we're expected to believe he's been endowed with superhuman abilities?

It's not so much that people want to be like Mike, smell like Mike and dress like Mike, but now we have to build golden idols to Mike and pray to the God of Epsom salt and formaldehyde for resurrecting him like Superman from the ashes. Meanwhile, we're the first ones on line to witness this glorious comeback like it's the second coming (when it's actually the third). Jordan, you've already marketed your eau de toilette, so why don't you stop stinking up our arenas and have some bran. You are no hero, just a man with a magic jumpshot and a smile of gold.

Commentating is an extremely difficult field to master. I feel bad for baseball commentators because they basically need to sit around for three or four hours reciting numbers and doing the AFLAC trivia questions like trained monkeys. Like the plot of a Jon du Bont film, the action in baseball is so diluted, patent lawyers at Pfizer laugh with giddiness.

It's a wonder that these commentators are less prone to homicide than federal postal workers. Imagine being locked up in a 15-by-10-foot booth with one other person for 81 days a year—he's supposed to be the "funny one," yet the only one laughing is the janitor Spoogee who is also in charge of replenishing your free ballpark hot dogs (or as your bosses put it, your "Christmas bonus"). By the third inning your sidekick is getting edgy, not to mention he's two caffeinated drinks past being legally allowed to operate heavy machinery, but still licensed to drive a Manhattan taxi, he's been spouting nonsensical statistics like the name of the guy who caught six fly balls in a row in a night game back in 19 aught two, and every word you say is relayed to 50,000 viewers who aren't listening to a word you say because they've all turned the volume down on the television to blast the new Bruce album over the play-by-play. Now tell me you're gonna look around your own 150 square feet of Dante's seventh concentric circle and say, "You know, I think I'm mentally in a good place right now."

And if you can recite those lines without cracking a grin, then give me your social security number and I'll have you terminated. And by terminated I mean killed.

Oakland (1-0) at Pittsburgh (0-1)

The Steelers were thoroughly outplayed last week, committing five turnovers and numerous penalties destroyed would-be scoring drives. It seems Bettis may not be 100 percent, which places a greater burden on Stewart to perform. The Raiders defense dominated last week, holding its opponents to 200 yards of total offense. Garner led the Raiders' offense, but will have a lot more difficulty against a Steelers' defense that ranked first against the run in 2001. Although most people would pick Oakland based on week one performances, I have to stay true to the Black and Gold and believe that they will correct their mistakes.

Cincinnati (0-1) at Cleveland (0-1)

The Bengals enter the "Dog Pound" after a week one annihilation. Corey Dillon rushed for a mere 10 yards and Gus Frerotte ... well .... The Bengals must have a successful rushing attack if they are to win games. The Browns are coming off a heartbreaking defeat, losing on a field goal and a penalty with literally no time left. Couch is questionable, but the way Holcomb played last week, Brown's fans shouldn't be too hasty. Cleveland will win this division rivalry easily.

Miami (1-0) at Indianapolis (1-0)

The Colts are essentially the same offense-minded team they were last season with a defense-minded coach in Tony Dungy. It has yet to be seen whether the Colts defense will improve from being the worst last season, yet it is still one of the weaker in the league. Miami was able to upgrade dramatically at the running back position with the acquisition of Ricky Williams, and he was everything Fielder and the Dolphin's offense had hoped. Ultimately, Miami's defense will be the difference and will give them the victory.

New England (1-0) at New York Jets (1-0)

These two teams play in the hardest division in the NFL. Therefore, every division game counts. The Patriots are coming off a masterful game last week and are looking to establish an early lead in the division. The Jets are coming off an emotional victory. With Martin questionable, Testaverde will be tested against a Patriots' defense that had three interceptions last week. Pats win, although not in as convincing fashion as last week.

Philadelphia (0-1) at Washington (0-1)

Many picked the Eagles to win the NFC before the season started. However after their sloppy offensive performance, that may not be the case. Washington, on the other hand, has built a formidable offense around first year coach Steve Spurrier's fun 'n gun style. Ultimately, whichever defense plays the pass better will win. I'm picking the Redskins.

runners who have a lot to offer here at Bucknell. I believe that this race shows the league that their confidence in our team still stands.

"This season will be both exciting and challenging," Dennis said. "We are definitely on the right path to win Leagues, and place high at Regionals. There is so much to say about this team."

The women's team accumulated a score of 82, behind Penn State's dominating score of 22. Newcomer Alison Cole '06 placed 16th, with an impressive time of 22:56.72. The Bison sent a total of 24 runners to the line in this meet.

"I was very pleased with the team's performance this past weekend and wanted to comment on the atmosphere of the race," Cole said. "During the race, my teammates helped each other to work together. Their efforts were always positive, trying to make us run harder and go faster with the goal of placing closer to the top runners. I felt their support during the race, and would not have been able to perform as I did without them."

Other top contenders from the first-year class were Kayla Halloran '06,who finished 18th with a time of 23:02.69, and Rachel Tutmaher '06, who finished 19th with a time of 23:04.99.

On the men's side, Bucknell's top finisher was Wesley Reinhardt '04, who ran the 8k course in 26:49.43, placing 11th overall. Following closely and also cracking the top 25 was Nicholas Mousetis '04. Douglas Creveling '05 finished 27th with a time of 27:30.19, while Marcus Jones '04, and Eric Furst '03 finished 30th and 33rd, respectively. There were a total of 24 Bison participants in this meet. The Orange and Blue finished third, with a team score of 120, just behind Oklahoma State and Penn State.

Both teams have high expectations for what they can accomplish this year. Experienced and new runners alike are excited about the team.

"I think that the influx of freshmen is going to have a great effect on the cross country team," Faizal Asumda '06 said.

Both teams are back in action against their Patriot League foe Army as they travel to West Point, N.Y., on Sept. 14. This may be especially momentous for the men's team, which has finished second behind Army in the league for the past two years.

the season for a 1-0 Bison lead.

The Bison's offense dominated the play with 22 shots on goal. With just seven minutes left in the game, Dennis Deluca '05 capitalized on one of those shots, to increase the lead to 2-0.

"In all three games, I thought our conditioning and bench were key factors. Over the course of 90 minutes with our high-pressure defense and confidence in our bench, we can break teams down. I think we will have a lot of late game heroics this year. Other teams have been defeated with ten minutes to play as we keep going at them," Nash said.

The Bison improved to 4-0 for the first time since 1990, as Adam Edwards recorded his third straight shutout. Edwards has been a key player in the Bison's defense this season, and has greatly contributed to all four of the Bison's wins so far. He was named the Bull's Fall Invitational Defensive MVP and has recently been awarded Patriot League Rookie of the Week honors for the week ending Sept. 9, 2002. Edwards has a 0.48 goals against average and a .913 save percentage.

"Adam has been coming up big. He's not playing like a freshman. He stopped four or five breakaways in the Buffalo game and has been a vocal leader for us in the back," tri-captain Tom Ryan '03 said.

"Being a freshman playing in a Division I men's soccer program is different from playing at any level at which I have previously played," Edwards said. "The play is much faster and more physical than the high school level. The demands of the coaches and my teammates are much higher. So far, everyone on the team has been very supportive. The confidence level is very high after our past four games and I am sure it will carry into practice this week before our game against Holy Cross."

"In all three games, I thought our conditioning and bench were key factors. Over the course of 90 minutes with our high-pressure defense and confidence in our bench, we can break teams down. I think we will have a lot of late game heroics this year. Other teams have been defeated with ten minutes to play as we keep going at them"

— Brendan Nash,
Head Coach

The Bison open league play against Holy Cross on Saturday, Sept. 14 at 3 p.m. on the Mods Fields.

"We will prepare [for Holy Cross] just like any other game. We do not need any extra motivation going into the Patriot League games. Everyone knows how big each one is, so the team is self-motivated at this point. All we need to do is fine tune the scouting report and pay attention to the little details. It will be a battle up there, but I know our guys will be ready," Nash said.

Pushing herself to the limit

Student Jenny Schlack '03 came to the University a Cadet, but will be leaving as the top Cadet in her regiment and with further dreams in mind

By Leah Cunningham
Writer

The University campus may be diverse, but it is difficult to find a student who can successfully dive off 250 foot towers, jump out of airplanes, shoot M16 rifles and double major in English and secondary education while maintaining a 3.86 grade point average. Difficult, but not impossible, because Jenny Sue Schlack '03 does all that and more.

"It was a little scary to be only 17 years old and signing a four-year scholarship contract for ROTC at Bucknell. I agreed to four years of active duty after college which is a hard decision," Schlack said. "But now that I'm a senior, four years seems like nothing. My experience has been the best ever."

Born and raised just outside Pittsburgh in Beaver, Pa., Schlack made the most important decision of her life when she decided to come to the University and spend her next four years in the ROTC program. The ROTC Cadet Battalion, referred to as "The Bison Battalion," consists of 70 cadets from not only the University but also from Susquehanna, Lycoming, Penn College and Bloomsburg.

From the moment Schlack stepped onto campus and joined the ROTC program, her instructors knew she had the commitment, strength and social skills that very few people ever acquire.

"ROTC is designed to be the best available leadership course, to develop the army's leaders and prepare cadets to go into the army," Assistant Professor of Military Science Captain Brian Elliott said. "Jenny is a natural leader and that's what ROTC is all about."

Numerous awards have followed Schlack throughout her ROTC involvement. In her military science first and second years of ROTC, she has been recognized as a Superior Cadet, the highest ranking cadet in her class. She has also been recently handpicked as the Cadet Battalion Commander for first semester of senior year.

Professor of Military Science Major Nathan Smyth explained the selection process for this elite position.

"I ultimately make the final decision on who will lead the Battalion during their senior year. Despite all that Jenny has accomplished, the decision was not easy. We have several senior cadets that have performed very well during their tenure in the program," Smyth said. "I knew that Jenny was a very focused cadet, who has established an outstanding rapport with the underclassmen and has worked extremely hard over the previous three years of school. She has proven she can handle increased responsibilities, and always strives for excellence … Jenny has my utmost confidence."

As Battalion Commander, Schlack is responsible for the training, administration, morale, discipline and esprit de corps for the entire Cadet Battalion.

"As the highest-ranking cadet, she will serve as my principle advisor on matters regarding the cadet battalion. Jenny will set the example for the cadet battalion in appearance, attitude, conduct, military bearing, discipline, physical fitness and soldier skills," Smyth said.

"My biggest challenge is going to be continuing to work with my peers and taking authoritative roles. This is an interesting dynamic, but it teaches new skills," Schlack said.

Even more notably, Schlack received the National Defense Transportation Award, which is given to only 20 ROTC cadets nationwide.

"I was at my junior year awards banquet, and all I can remember is hearing the award and '20 out of all the cadets in the country.' My parents were so proud!" Schlack said.

This award is essentially an invite into the Transportation Corps division of the army, if Schlack so chooses to join this corps. More importantly, the award designates her in the top percentile of cadets in the country.

In addition to her National Defense Award, Schlack was recently recognized as the top cadet out of 300 in her regiment during the National Advanced Leadership Camp at Fort Lewis, Wash. This mandatory 32-day camp challenged over 4,000 cadets mentally and physically.

"This camp is huge because how well I did at Fort Lewis in addition to my performance at Bucknell dictates my branch in the army," Schlack said. "We were always being watched at camp, everything from how we talked to people to how we motivated them and maintained leadership skills."

Schlack noted that the camp was more mentally challenging than anything and that the University had trained her so well that she felt as or even more prepared than anyone else.

Schlack's preparedness led her to success when she received the honorable distinction as Regimental Honor Graduate based on her outstanding performance.

"In order to be considered, a cadet must be ranked in the top five percent of their regiment at the conclusion of the course. Those in the top five percent excelled in evaluated leadership positions, basic rifle marksmanship, land navigation, physical training and military tactics, to name a few. Those that are ranked in the top five percent must then endure a grueling interview, testing the cadet on their military skills," Smyth said.

You may wonder just how Schlack would have time for any campus activities, but she explains that time management is one of her best attributes. She is a member of the cheerleading squad, and former player and president of the rugby team, a past Resident Assistant and a member of Alpha Chi Omega sorority. She is even planning a spring break for Mardi Gras in New Orleans with three friends she met at Airborne School in Fort Benning, Ga.

"Airborne School was the best experience ever … I would grab my canteen, put on my helmet and run a mile to the air field," Schlack said. "It was like the scene from that movie, 'Private Benjamin,' where Goldie Hawn hooks the parachute to the plane, waits for the green light and then everyone shuffles towards the door and people are just jumping out. It's amazing; I could hear my heart beat as I peacefully floated to the ground."

It is difficult to find someone who does not have something positive to say about this avid cadet, focused student and dedicated friend. Schlack is described as "the model cadet" by Elliott.

"[She is] extremely intelligent, physically fit and can be counted on to perform extremely well with no supervision" Smyth said.

Schlack is even praised by her professors.

"Her mental sharpness and abilities are quickly apparent," said Professor of Biology Richard Ellis, Schlack's first-year professor, with whom she is still in contact. "One of the many perks of being a professor is meeting people of the caliber of Jenny Schlack."

After graduation, Schlack plans to spend this spring through early fall as a Gold Bar Recruiter for ROTC. Her next challenge, in fall of 2003, will be fulfilling her duty as a second lieutenant in her military branch. Schlack's primary choice is the military intelligence branch or medical service corps.

"This semester is going to push me. I'm going to know my limits and capabilities," Schlack said. "I'm definitely ready to go into the army, but I don't know if I'm ready to be called 'Lieutenant Schlack' or 'Ma'am' yet."

Being pushed to her limits is Schlack's strong suit, and she knows the University has prepared her well for the military commitment she will soon encounter. It is only a matter of time before this cadet battalion commander will use her skills in the army and perhaps even get used to being-called "Ma'am."

OIPS provides inexpensive, good food

By Alyson Walker
Features Editor

Really hungry for good food but can't afford a fine dining experience? Original Italian Pizza (OIPs) is the place to go.

I ventured to Plaza 15 on a Saturday night and behind the façade of the shopping center, I, like other University students, found OIPs to be an exceptional treat.

My dining partners and I were unimpressed by the ambience, which is, at best, tacky in a typical pizzeria style. Bright flags add to the general cheeriness with glitter on the walls and fake flowers decorating the tables.

Eric Graham—The Bucknellian

Inside local landmark, Original Italian Pizza, also known as OIPs, located on U.S. Route 15.

Placemats tell of Italian history, and there is a television for those who wish to watch while waiting for their food.

Smoking and non-smoking sections are divided, but on a crowded night it can be difficult to find a table in the section of choice at this seat-yourself restaurant.

Also, with the size of OIPs, it hardly makes a difference where you sit—if one person has a cigarette, everyone gets to inhale.

If you are seeking a quiet, peaceful décor with great atmosphere, OIPs is not what you want. It is welcoming to loud groups, but finding seating for groups larger than seven can be difficult on the weekend.

It is typically packed with University students, especially on the weekend, searching for a cheap alternative to caf food. Dinner for a group could also be inexpensive, if you're just splitting a pizza and a pitcher of soda.

"OIPs is convenient and cheap," Audra Bielke '04 said.

OIPs offers a variety of meal options, from hot subs to seafood dishes, pizza to pasta. Certain dinners, such as the cheese tortellini, come with salad and bread as appetizers.

Service is rather quick considering how crowded OIPs becomes. On this jam-packed Saturday night, we waited only 20 minutes before our food arrived. The wait is helped by our salads and fresh baked bread.

Eric Graham—The Bucknellian

OIPs is often crowded, keeping its workers on the ball.

The salad, consisting of lettuce and four slices of tomato, was adequate at best, but the bread was delicious, tasting more like a dessert than an appetizer.

"I love the bread!" Bielke said.

We enjoyed our meal profusely. No need to fear leaving hungry—portions are sized for a hearty eater.

I was only able to eat half of the small calzone, while a slice of pizza was enough to satisfy others. The pasta dishes provided two meals, thanks to doggie bags.

"The thing that makes OIPs such a local landmark is that you get so much food for so little money. There is always enough for the next day," Lacy Gonzalez '04 said.

The vegetable pizza is loaded with fresh veggies, including hot peppers, so if spicy doesn't do it for you, be sure to ask your server to hold them.

The broccoli and cheese calzone is served with marinara sauce on the side and is an appetizing choice.

Vegetarians watch out—often entrees might include ham or other meats not specified on the menu, so make sure your server informs you.

We almost ended up with broccoli, cheese and ham calzone and an order of cheese tortellini with ham on top!

Another caveat—for those who are used to traditional Italian cooking, a pizzeria might not satisfy a craving for home cooked food.

"OIPs is good, but if you're used to authentic Italian food, it leaves a bit to be desired," Grace Annis '03 said.

We might not have been impressed by the exterior, but we found our meals and the amount of the bill quite agreeable.

OIPs might not be the classiest dining establishment the Lewisburg area has to provide, but it is one of the tastiest!

Definitely give it a try for an affordable and enjoyable meal in a college student- friendly environment.

Fair teaches students about community service opportunities in Lewisburg

By Caitlin McKee
Writer

Assistant Dean of Students Amy Badal said the goal of the University's Community Service Fair was to expose students to the variety of service opportunities the Lewisburg community has to offer. The fair was held in the Terrace Room of the Langone Center this past Sunday.

"The overall goal of the event is to expose students to the opportunities in Lewisburg," Badal said.

Badal also emphasized how important she feels community service is for college students.

"It is extremely important for students to give back to the community," Badal said.

About 12 community organizations sent representatives to the fair. The representatives had good things to say about past student volunteers.

"The students did everything and anything we wished them to do. They did everything from service to fundraising," said Jeannette Lasansky, president of the Union County Historical Society and coordinator of Linn Land Waterways.

> "Service in the community allows students to work together and give back, make a tie between the school we go to and the community we live in. Community service is definitely a positive thing."
> —Christine Hebling '05

Professor of Management John Miller, who teaches Management 101 (MG101), said he hoped the fair would show students the demand Lewisburg has for student service.

"The word needs to get out to campus that there is an incredible amount of need in the community for service and a wide variety of choices for service activity," Miller said. "Organizations really, really need money, and there is no other way to get it but through service."

Associate Professor of Management Tammy Hiller, who also teaches MG101, said the fair provides an option for everyone.

"There are options for both individuals and groups. There are even fundraising opportunities for the philanthropic needs of fraternities and sororities. I hope students find their match," Hiller said.

Many students did explore the fair and were pleased with the variety of choices.

"The fair provides easy access to a lot of community service options. One trip exposes you to so many organizations and all the representatives want to talk to you," Adam Hjuja '05 said.

Students at the fair also said how important they feel community service is.

"Service in the community allows students to work together and give back, make a tie between the school we go to and the community we live in. Community service is definitely a positive thing," Christine Hebling '05 said.

Abroad perspective: a semester in France

By Sarah Mournighan
Contributing Writer

When I was a sophomore, I decided that I wanted to go abroad. My sister had set the example by spending a year at St. Andrews in Scotland, and I wanted to share some of her experiences.

At first I wanted to go to either Ireland or Denmark, partly because classes were in English. After talking with my parents and Associate Professor Angele Kingue, I decided to spend a semester with the Bucknell en France program in Tours, a small city in the heart of the famed Loire River Valley.

Sarah's host family included her host father and mother, Jean-Louis and Pastora Loriau; two Mexican students, Armando and Fernando; a Japenese student, Nana and Bill, a 60-year-old Canadian.

On Sept. 2, 19 Bucknellians flew from Newark to Paris a day late after our original flight was canceled. Once we got to Paris, Professor of Spanish Susan Fischer, our professor-in-residence for the semester, met us and sent us on the bus to Tours, where our host families were waiting.

When I got off the bus, Pastora Loriau, my host mother, welcomed me with open arms and took me to a beautiful house on Rue Michel Colombe, my home for the next three and a half months.

The household consisted of Pastora and her husband Jean-Louis, who always made amazing meals for dinner and put his often humorous two cents in any conversation; Armando and Fernando, two young Mexican students who brought a witty sense of humor to the dinner table; Nana, a shy Japanese student just learning French; and Bill, an incredibly nice 60-year-old Canadian, who sometimes had a little trouble understanding the younger generation.

In the end, it was my house that made my stay in France memorable. When my parents came to visit me, it was fun watching my host parents interact with my real parents, along with the other members of my household. Fortunately, the ban on speaking English at the dinner table was lifted, as everyone but Nana spoke English. My parents were insistent on trying out their French. After that evening, it was almost like I had two families, with two very different sets of parents.

Classes were necessary, as this was a University program, and they started almost immediately after our arrival. All of us spent the first month at the Instituit de Tourraine, a school geared towards foreign students interested in an intensive language study. I was in classes with students from around the world, everywhere from Sweden to Thailand.

I learned a lot there and brushed up on French, which I had not spoken all summer. When that month was finished, I was happy that I was switching to the Universite Francois Rabelais.

At the University Francois, I took classes such as economics and political science, all of which were in French. My professors didn't go easy on us with the language, but were very understanding when we didn't know a word or a phrase. Even then, they tried their best not to speak English.

My political science class was the most intriguing. The subject was France in the fourth and fifth republics. It was interesting to learn about their foreign policy, how they viewed Americans and getting a different perspective on situations such as Vietnam. Professor Rolde brought a sense of humor to the class, never hesitating to say that something was wrong or stupid. He said this about anyone, including the French.

The best part about being in France, however, was France itself. Most of us found that we had much more time on our hands than we would have had at the University, so we found different activities to keep us busy.

I spent many lazy afternoons reading a book on the benches along the river, just letting time go by between classes. There were also many beautiful gardens throughout Tours, and I was blessed with one near my house. I used to sit there and do my homework before I went home for dinner, and always felt the temptation to feed the swans that were in the pond behind me.

Fortunately for us, there was so much to see close to home. Tours is in the center of the Loire River Valley, an area which was once the playground for the French court. To accommodate these people, beautiful chateaux were built. These magnificent structures have vastly diverse and sometimes horrific histories behind them.

Bucknell en France excursions led us to places like Villandry, with its magnificent gardens, and Chernenceau, which has beautiful gardens that actually span the Cher river. It was once a hospital and a crossing into free France during World War II.

My favorite was Amboise, which I visited with some friends on one of our first weekends. Standing from the ramparts, I looked over the town and the river and saw a magnificent view of the countryside. To my surprise, I dicovered that Leonardo Da Vinci lies in the chapel that I saw.

Down the road from this chateau was le Clos Luce, where Da Vinci spent the last years of his life. It was in Amboise that I realized the language barrier went both ways, as I saw some interesting translations of French to English, including "keep of the grass."

Time in France would not have been complete without an adventure into Paris. After meeting the other Bucknellians on the bus in Tours at 5 a.m., which was a little adventure in itself, we arrived in Paris to see all we could. We found out that all of the museums were closed because the workers were on strike.

Like many people, my friends and I saw one of Paris' most popular and famous attractions—the grave of Jim Morrison. I can't say that I'm a big fan, but I now have a picture of his grave and all the candles and flowers that surround it.

I liked Paris because it brought history alive, nothing more so than walking though la Place de la Concord. I spotted a plaque on the ground and read that the area used to be known as the Place de la Revolution. All of the public executions that took place during the Reign of Terror happened there. It was eerie, knowing that thousands of people died where I walked, a place that looked like normal city square.

The River Loire Valley, in Tours, was once the playground for the French court. Later chateaux were built for accomodation.

The most impressive activity for me was a stroll through Giverny, Claude Monet's home and gardens. I could actually picture some of his paintings as I strolled through the gardens with Japanese style bridges and water lilies in the pond.

It was during this time in France that the events of Sept. 11 unfolded. I will always remember how the French people poured their hearts out to us. While walking past a brasserie that fateful evening, a waiter told us to come inside, where he turned off the music so we could watch the news.

The next day we were pulled out of class at the Institut. We were told that CNN would always be on in the library and that more English-language newspapers would be available to us. What many people do not realize is that, while Americans were standing together that week, I witnessed the amazing love and support of the French people.

For three minutes that Friday, France stood still in silent support to remember the tragedy, while the bells of every church rang throughout France. There was even a special service at San Gatien and a memorial service at the prefecture. I was unable to go home after the tragedy, but the French people and their support made me realize that this was the next best thing.

With the events of Sept. 11, the group trip to Normandy was even more meaningful. Even though it was cold and windy outside, we walked along the D-Day beaches in remembrance of what was sacrificed. It all started with a walk along the ramparts of San Malo, a city in Brittany that was destroyed during Allied bombings, but restored after the war.

We also visited Arromanche, where the remnants of the artificial Allied Port Winston had washed up on the moss-covered beach. The most poignant trip was yet to come. We saw the American Cemetery that overlooks Omaha beach, the bloodiest beach of the D-Day landings. I almost found myself crying when I walked along a wall of the missing bodies. The inscription says that those are the men who lie in watery graves and were not found.

Rows and rows of white crosses and stars line the field; a reflecting pool and the American flag flying overhead. The most poignant reminder came when looking at the gravestones and reading the names of the soldiers. Some just stated that that the soldier buried there was unknown but to God.

The feeling of young men dying for freedom resonated with other monuments and films about the war, but walking through the cemetery made this story more real than just a history lesson learned in high school.

That is not to say that every trip was confined to France. With every Friday off, and two breaks, many of us made time to see the rest of Europe, as many cities, towns and monuments were at our disposal because of the train system. I toured Italy and spent a day in Salzburg, Austria during my vacation. The view from the train between Venice and Salzburg was breathtaking, as the journey took us directly through the Alps.

My favorite trip was to London, where I watched my friend chase the swans through Kensington Park and pushed my friends up to the Lions in Trafalgar Square. I came to France for such events—to explore the French language and civilization.

For me, it was the events outside the classroom that made my trip to France one of the most memorable experiences of my life. People and places often make more of an impression than textbooks because I find them harder to forget.

I might not remember all of President Mitterand's foreign policy, but I will never forget getting hit by a hockey puck after the Diables Noires, the Tours ice hockey team, scored the winning goal, watching a rock and roll puppet show on the Paris metro or having a bird poop on me in Rome. These memories are the ones that last a lifetime.

For me, France was an experience I will always treasure. I will never regret taking a chance and going abroad to an unfamiliar place, speaking a foreign language and trying new things. I was sad when I had to go back to Paris to get on the plane bound for Newark. Looking back, I would not change anything.

Professor Solomon nominated for 1956 Lectureship Award

By Ashley Malikan
Writer

The University takes extreme pride in not only its remarkable student body, but also the character, fervor and accomplishments of many teachers and faculty members such as Associate Professor of Physics Thomas Solomon.

At graduation each year, four of these wonderful men and women are publicly recognized and honored for their exemplary performance in their respective careers.

Solomon is the recipient of the 1956 Lectureship Award for inspirational teaching. Solomon is a man very worthy of such an award, a fact to which any one of his colleagues or students could attest.

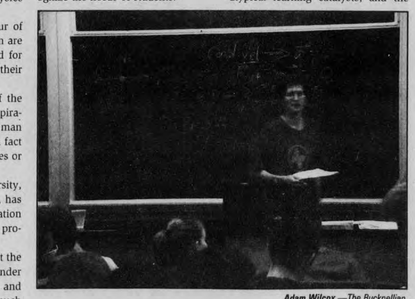
His tenure here at the University, now spanning close to a decade, has been marked by a brilliant reputation and much accomplishment as a professor and researcher.

For those who do not frequent the physics department, you may wonder who this famous professor is and what makes him deserving of such profound recognition.

His personality can best be understood by asking those who work closest with him, such as his colleague of nearly 10 years, Associate Professor of Physics Jeff Bowen.

Bowen and Solomon have worked side by side in co-teaching positions, and both are familiar faces for students of Physics 211 and 212. Bowen speaks very highly of Solomon and was in full support of his recommendation for the 1956 Lectureship Award.

"I wrote his nomination [for the award]," he said. "He is enthusiastic, very approachable, and is able to recognize the needs of students."



Adam Wilcox —The Bucknellian

Solomon accepted his nomination and will present a lecture on "Order, Randomness and Chaos—A History of Prediction" on Oct. 7.

Karen Marosi, the associate dean of the physics department, described him as a "very collegial person."

This is the popular opinion among his students as well.

"I've already gone to him for some help, and he's more than willing to lend a hand," Lauren Amatrudo '06 said.

Students especially respond to his vitality and strange affinity for physics gadgets.

Solomon labored intensively two years ago to get a stipend for these atypical learning catalysts, and the fruits of his labor could be seen over the past few weeks in the arms of many physics students. They were given blowguns, yoyos, water rockets and more to help increase their understanding of physics and make the learning process that much more interesting.

"He's a fun guy," Matt Gorney '06 said. "And the physics toys are great, though I don't always use them as I'm supposed to."

"That's the main thing; trying to make it real," Solomon said of his beloved toys. And though he admits that they presented a few problems the first year in operation, they've now become an acclaimed portion of his class.

In addition to teaching, Solomon is also a very active researcher. The University provides a home where he is able to do both, and he finds the environment to be "the best of both worlds."

Solomon was rather surprised to learn that he had been nominated for this award.

"I had no idea that anything was going on," he said.

Despite his surprise, he is more than willing to accept this award and is looking forward to presenting his lecture. All recipients of the 1956 Lectureship Award are required to give a lecture on a topic of their choice as part of their acceptance.

Solomon has chosen, "Order, Randomness and Chaos—A History of Prediction." All are encouraged to attend and support one of the University's best and brightest.

The lecture is scheduled to take place on Monday, Oct. 7 in the LC Forum at 8 p.m.

Author gives talk and reads work

By David Allen
Writer

Last Sunday evening at the Stadler Center for Poetry, author Edith Pearlman spoke and delivered three of her award-winning short stories in the first of a series of readings sponsored by the West Branch literary magazine. Pearlman's story "Trifle" appears in the most recent edition of West Branch. Her appearance at the University was first solicited by Stadler Intern Ron Mohring and organized by Andrew Ciotola, the magazine's managing editor.

Assistant Professor of English Michael Carlin gave a short introduction in which he described Pearlman as a "gentle and generous" writer, skilled in crafting "vivid, engaging" characters and settings. Pearlman then took the podium and briefly prefaced her stories with an examination of the two questions she is asked most frequently: "Why do you write?" and "Why do you write?"

She stated that "we write because we read," out of "a love for words and stories." In answer to the second question, she stated her three chief motivations: "To reorganize the mess of life into a seemly design ... to reveal some new truth ... through characters and events ... and to make public something, until now, only privately remembered."

Her first story, "The Jigsaw Table," unfolds slowly in a sleepy third-person narrative. It centers around the late summer exploits of an unnamed family of five in a small Massachusetts town. The seemingly mundane details that shape and color the descriptions of the family and its house are revealed not through dialogue, but by the omniscient narrator. Once the family's large table in their cluttered living room is introduced, a simple but important sentiment arches over the rest of the story: the everyday bonding rites which keeps the family united, such as eating together, hanging laundry on the clothesline and, most importantly, completing jigsaw puzzles. The story has a measured, careful pacing, and though it is loaded with details, it maintained a light tone. The thoughtful and perceptive style of narrative served as a good introduction to Pearlman's work and to the next story, whose events and setting were both more specific and curious.

Monica McMurrer—The Bucknellian

Award-winning author Edith Pearlman spoke and read some of her short stories at the University last Sunday. One of her pieces was in the most recent edition of the West Branch literary magazine.

"Mates" also followed a family of five very closely, but it begins with just two characters—a married couple, Keith and Mitsko McGuire. They arrive in Godolphin, a fictional Massachusetts town that appears in many of Pearlman's stories, packed as though they are hiking or camping and without any suitcases. They rent an apartment upon their arrival, but remain there even after they start a family.

The narration in this story shifts to first person, voiced by a schoolteacher and lifelong resident of Godolphin. Her personal contact with this family of outsiders (living around the corner from them, teaching their children) and establishment in the town color her comments about them. The McGuires settle in Godolphin and raise their family largely without forming any intimate attachments to the community; it is mentioned that the McGuires do not attend church or belong to any clubs and register as Independents. This lack of connection with the town allows them, after renting the same apartment for 25 years and sending three children to college, to uproot themselves and leave town without any warning.

The story ends on a mysterious yet romantic note with the narrator unsure of whether Keith and Mitsko have departed for a new life as husband and wife or separately.

The last story, "Ropes and Hooks" is another first-person narrative. The story is billed as a "reminiscence" by an unnamed female narrator. She attends an all-girl high school and, though she is disappointed with the lack of extracurricular activities which it offers, she maintains interest in theatrical productions despite being "eager but ungifted." In her junior year, she appears as an Etruscan slave in "Androcles and the Lion," whose cue line is the story's title. She memorizes her single line diligently: "How many dead?" Once she has learned it, she shouts with urgency to whoever is nearby.

The responses of her family and friends to her recitations are quite humorous, but the most outrageous and downright funny moment comes during the actual performance of the play. The narrator makes her entrance, but a stage piece from another play gets caught on her props and is pulled on stage. Only the quick thinking of the female lead rescues the final scene from disaster. The audience in the story is described as falling into hysterics; the reaction of the audience at the reading to the story's humor was less riotous, but certainly audible.

Several students in attendance at the reading expressed their enjoyment. "[Pearlman] really gets into her readings, and that makes it more interesting to watch," David Ruskin '06 said.

"[The reading] got better as it went along," Jenn Strout '06 said. "The first story went kind of slow, but the other two were more interesting."

Uptown hosts energetic band

Phantom Planet, one of the "100 bands you need to know," played at Uptown on Saturday.

Signaling an impressive turnout, a line steadily grew outside Uptown to see the up-and-coming band Phantom Planet on Saturday at 9:30 p.m. Phantom Planet has been dubbed one of the "100 bands you need to know" by the Alternative Press.

Uptown was filled with students waiting to hear the sounds of the band, which is a unique alternative to the "bubble gum pop" that has recently been the craze. With a sound that was described as "new rock that's sincerely iconic and serious fun" by Interview Magazine, Phantom Planet was a hit with the crowd.

Who are the inspirations for such a new rock sound that is obviously impressing music reviewers? The band's Web site says it is influenced by "bands like Elvis Costello and the Attractions, U2, Air and the Flaming Lips."

People who know of Phantom Planet and have enjoyed its first CD may see a growth in the band's material and performance.

"It's a big step since our last record," vocalist Alex Greenwald said of the band's latest effort. "We were kids who had just gotten our driver's licenses. Now we are four years older, I got my license revoked and we're ready to make some real rock and roll."

For those of us who had not heard the sound of Phantom Planet before Saturday's concert, we were thoroughly impressed. The band made many new fans during its fun and energetic performance. Its songs seemed to immediately win over the crowd, including its current hit, "California."

The intimate setting of Uptown allowed many people to get up close and personal with the band. For those seated in the back of the room, TV sets were broadcasting a view from the stage, so that no matter where you were in the room, you were able to see the band.

Uptown sponsored this free event for University students. Both the main room and the pool table area of Uptown were open and students were spread throughout the rooms.

As for Phantom Planet, the southern California band is currently on a nationwide tour and will later tour as the opening band for Elvis Costello.

Ensemble plans to show color

"For Colored Girls," will feature a unique, intriguing format designed to combat racial misunderstandings

By Melinda Kummer
Senior Writer

Bucknell's Multicultural Theatre Ensemble (BMTE) aims "to bring all major and minor organizations together to free our mind and hearts by way of stage," according to its mission statement. This is a truly honorable aim on a campus that all too often misunderstands racial issues. BMTE hopes that its fall production of "For Colored Girls who have Considered Suicide when the Rainbow is not Enuf," on Nov. 21 (location to be announced), will help University students to step into other people's worlds.

'The main reason to bring the play to the University is to bring awareness and truths of the world to campus," Producer India Branch '03 said.

"'For Colored Girls' focuses on the woman of color's search for identity and solace in society," Director Jaynemarie Angbah '03 said. "It explores where she finds her spirit and how that relates to her life and her encounters."

The play captures the essence of maturation for a black female in America. Presented on stage, the stories become real, the emotions become real—the characters relate to the audience as human.

Branch, bringing her experiences in the arts as a native New Yorker, admires the level of quality in the University's Theatre and Dance programs.

"'For Colored Girls' is a production that will push the envelope in an already high quality artistic atmosphere," she said.

In an intriguing and yet unusual format, "For Colored Girls" does not make use of dialogue and scenes. Instead, the play utilizes poetic monologue, self-described by the playwright, Ntozake Shange, as a "choreopoem."

In addition to "fearless and beautiful writing, the play also incorporates dance and music increasing the depth of the audience's experience," Branch said.

"My goal in directing 'For Colored Girls' is to give [the University] a venue to view black culture and black women through a new lens, an artistic lens," Angbah said. "I also would like to expose [the University] to a powerful play that has the ability to impact everyone—especially women on multiple levels."

Ultimately, the play challenges the members of the audience to learn more about themselves through another culture.

BMTE has realized its mission of "representing the full spectrum of the human condition" in this play that brings color to the University's environment in a way that holds nothing back. "For Colored Girls" is the culmination of real diversity that demands attention to culture. The stage teaches aspects of life that cannot be learned by a book or in the classroom.

i can't hear anythin but maddening screams
& the soft strains of death
& you promised me
you promised me ...
somebody/ anybody
sing a black girl's song bring her out to know herself to know you
but sing her rhythms carin/ struggle/ hard times sing her song of life she's been dead so long closed in silence so long she doesn't know the sound of her own voice
her infinite beauty

"For Colored Girls," presented by BMTE, is a unique presentation that holds nothing back. It opens Nov. 21.

"Signs" raises questions

By Ken Holroyd
Writer

What would you do if you suddenly felt like prey? What if you didn't believe in the hunter?

These are just a couple of the questions presented in M. Night Shyamalan's "Signs," in which a Pennsylvania farmer wakes to find crop circles in his corn fields, his dogs becoming violent and his children acting like the boy from "The Sixth Sense."

Mel Gibson's character, known as "Father," lives with his two children and his brother on a corn farm in Bucks County, Pa. After finding the strange designs in his field, he and his family begin to notice more odd coincidences, such as all TV channels showing the same program. These eerie events lead the characters to question the origin of the crop circles and what other possible consequences await them.

Movie Review

At times, it is nearly impossible to tell what kind of movie "Signs" is—whether it is a thriller, horror or drama. It has the suspense of "The Blair Witch Project," the setting of a Stephen King novel and the intense family devotion of "Armageddon."

Written, produced and directed by Shyamalan, the portrayal of the story raises several questions. Are the crop circles simply a hoax? If they aren't, who (or what) is making them and why? These questions and several others remain unanswered throughout most of the movie.

Taken by itself, the plot is not impressive. It is slow-moving and often dull. "Signs" seems like just another suspense movie that makes you jump at weird sounds and sudden visuals.

Shyamalan had a whole different meaning for the movie than simply to entertain. Within the first half hour, I imagined several different meanings of the story. Is the film about the possibility that past crop circles are real? Is it about human paranoia and the idea that alien visitors aren't necessarily hostile? Is it about aliens at all?

Mel Gibson, stars in "Signs" as Father. The mystery of the crop circles raises many questions,

The mystery is intensified by the fact that there are only six major characters. By keeping the cast small, Shyamalan can easily show only one point of view at a time, adding to the confusion. The audience knows only what the characters know.

If you are going for a bit of light entertainment, a mindless thriller or any other movie that doesn't require thinking, this is not the movie for you. Every detail is important in this film, right down to the situation involving Father's last conversation with his wife.

If you want a movie that's going to make you turn white, jump every minute, cry and slap yourself in the forehead by the end, you cannot miss this film. I would go see this movie again and again merely to see what I missed the last time.

Children's studies program under consideration

By Michelle Dombeck
Arts & Entertainment Editor

A group of faculty members met this summer to discuss the possibility of a children's studies program at the University. While nothing has been formally approved, there are plans to create new courses dealing with children's studies.

"We're exploring the possibility of a children's studies program. What we need to ask is what can we reasonably do well and how much at a time?" Professor of English Michael Payne said. "This project is potentially huge."

Last April, The Lion and the Unicorn—one of the two principle children's literature journals in the United States—devoted an entire issue to children's studies. This prompted Payne, who teaches children's literature, to conduct a summer workshop about children's studies with interested members of the faculty.

"The main idea of this particular issue was to encourage people to consider the potential need at their own campuses for a children's studies program," Payne said.

The University seems to demonstrate this need.

"The courses that are offered in human development, child psychology and children's literature are overflowing," Payne said. "I teach a section of children's literature every semester with 60 to 70 students, and we have to turn away that many people. The interest is definitely there."

Lacy Gonzalez '04 is currently enrolled in children's literature.

"Besides the variety of children's novels, the course also uses a variety of media such as films and sociological essays, as well as a hands-on field-work component similar to those in the education department," Gonzalez said. "Everyone can relate to popular children's works from their own childhoods, but viewing them through the lens of adulthood and academics is very different and many times surprising."

A formal children's studies program would prompt the development of new classes.

"There will definitely be some new courses. Although nothing has been formally approved of yet, I would like to offer an introduction to children's studies," Payne said.

Assistant Professor of English Virginia Zimmerman is also planning a new course.

"I am developing a course on adolescent literature, which I hope to offer some time in the next couple of years," Zimmerman said. "I taught a course last spring at Lafayette College in which we did a section on adolescent fiction, primarily 'Alice in Wonderland' and 'Harry Potter.'"

John Rickard, associate professor of English and department chair, feels that the University's children's literature course showcases children's studies' interdisciplinary nature.

"Children's literature not only allows faculty and students to read some wonderfully imaginative works, but it also opens up important questions related to myth, psychology, education, sociology and many other fields of study," Rickard said. "In fact, it's quite possible that in the future we may offer interdisciplinary courses in children's studies that would incorporate some of these different perspectives into the study of childhood."

Payne agrees with Rickard.

"Children's studies is intended to have an interdisciplinary approach to research and teaching about children," Payne said. "At the University, we have discovered that there are a lot of faculty members who are interested in this from many different departments, ranging from physics to education."

In addition to the interdisciplinary nature of children's studies, another side of the program is advocacy.

"We're interested in doing scholarship in such a way that responds to children's needs and promotes their rights," Payne said.

The interdisciplinary and advocacy aspects of children's studies make it a more complicated field than it formerly was. For more than a century, people merely studied the developmental and social aspects of children. Children's studies is no longer so simple.

"The basic notion behind children's studies is that children are complicated," Payne said. "We would never have something called 'adult studies.' How do children see the world? How do they think?"

Greeks celebrate new members

The Greek community rallied Saturday afternoon at the annual porch event, held above Freas Hall this year due to Hunt Hall renovations. The porch event is the first time new fraternity and sorority members congregate together to show spirit and pride for their new affiliations.

New Rush policies receive mixed reviews

By Rachel Laskow
Editor-in-Chief

Despite a longer Rush period, new Rush policies and Former Director of Fraternity and Sorority Affairs Roy Baker's departure, responses from the Greek community show that Rush went well, but improvements are needed.

"Considering the circumstances, Rush went as well as possible," Intrafraternity Council (IFC) President Aziz Megii '03 said.

Alpha Chi Omega pledge Larissa Brown '05 feels that Rush was a positive experience.

"I loved being able to meet new people, even more girls from my own class. Just through Rush, I met a lot of girls I wouldn't have ever gotten to know otherwise. Even if I hadn't accepted my bid, I thought it was worth going through it for that reason alone," Brown said.

According to Panhellenic President Kate Kenner '03, the recruitment schedule was expanded to accommodate Jewish students wishing to return home for Rosh Hashana. Recruitment was one week longer and evenly distributed over that time frame.

Kenner, Megii and Assistant Director for Greek Affairs Shauna Irwin agree that Rush should be shorter next year.

"Members seem to prefer completing the process faster, from academic and personal perspectives, so recruitment will likely return to its more condensed time schedule next year," Kenner said.

Besides the longer Rush period, fraternities and sororities had to adapt to new policies. One of the most significant changes that affected fraternity rushees was the requirement for each rushee to visit all fraternity houses twice during round one. In the past, rushees were not required to visit all of the houses.

According to Kenner, the IFC policies that were incorporated this fall, by requiring men to visit each fraternity, mirror the Panhellenic approach to equitable recruitment for each chapter.

"It went well and I've received positive feedback. They got to see houses they had never seen before. The houses liked this new system because it put new life and breath in their houses and also increased diversity," Megii said.

New Sigma Phi Epsilon Brother Andy Cox '05 believes that visiting each house once would have been sufficient.

"There were a lot of places that I knew I would never even consider or fit in, there were other places that I knew I might belong and there was one frat that I knew was the place for me from day one. Consequently, I learned a lot during Rush, but it still consumed a lot of my free time during the first two weeks," Cox said.

Dana Engineering construction to begin soon

Engineering department hopeful for spring start to extension of overcrowded building

By Matt Ellis
Opinions Editor

The College of Engineering has started its final push towards the beginning of construction on an addition to the Dana Engineering building.

Dean of Engineering James Orbison and the rest of the engineering department are hopeful that construction of the new building will begin this spring.

"We are hopeful that the Board of Trustees will approve, at its November meeting, construction of a new engineering building. If the project is approved, construction will begin next spring with a completion date about a year later," Orbison said.

The new building will allow the Engineering College to expand space for lads and classrooms. The new addition will contain six additional classrooms, one large computer laboratory, offices, project spaces and informal interaction spaces.

"During the space allocation part of the design process, the engineering department made decisions on the basis of what was most important for the educational programs and for the students," Orbison said.

The most important thing the new building will give the engineering department is much needed space.

"Over the past 15 years, the College of Engineering has grown slowly, with increases in numbers of students, faculty and staff. Whereas 15 years ago we typically offered a single section of each required course, we are now finding it necessary to offer two sections of many required courses, with a corresponding increase in the need for classrooms," Orison said.

"We are hopeful that the Board of Trustees will approve, at its November meeting, construction of a new engineering building. If the project is approved, construction will begin next spring with a completion date about a year later."
—James Orbison, dean of engineering

The University's College of Engineering is beginning to fall behind competing universities for the amount of space per student. A study of other engineering schools has shown that their engineering facilities provide an average of about 190 square feet of space per undergraduate student, while the University provides about 126 square feet per undergraduate student

"The space limitations we're facing in the College of Engineering at Bucknell is real. Without additional space, we will need to limit new projects and initiatives, such as the new biomedical engineering program. This would be a distinct disservice to our present and future students," Orison said.

The addition to the engineering building will also allow the University's engineering students to stay competitive in an ever-changing job market.

"Engineering education is changing, with a greater emphasis on team projects, including much more substantial design projects. As a result, Dana is now one of the most heavily utilized academic buildings on campus and continues to face scheduling difficulties, lab facilities that are inadequate and a shortage of office and student project space," Orison said.

The new building will be Georgian in style to be fully compatible with the campus architecture and will have a brick exterior. The current plan is for the building to be the same height as Dana, with four stories and a basement. The building will extend from behind Dana across Fraternity Road and into the field next to Phi Kappa Psi Fraternity.

The new building, which will be named Breakiron, is being partially financed by a donation from Lauren "Larry" Breakiron and his wife Margit. The Breakirons donated $5 million to support the construction of the new building.

Public Safety Log

Wednesday, Sept. 11

CRIMINAL MISCHIEF—An employee reported to Public Safety that unknown person(s) damaged three University owned car-pool vehicles while parked in the car-pool parking lot. The incident is under investigation.

CRIMINAL MISCHIEF/GRAFFITI—A University official reported to Public Safety that unknown person(s) wrote offensive graffiti on Vedder Hall walls. The incident is under investigation.

VANDALISM—An employee reported to Public Safety that unknown person(s) damaged a University library book at the Bretrand Library. The incident is under investigation.

INFORMATION/PHONE CALLS—Four students reported to Public Safety that they had received unusual phone calls from an unknown male. All the calls were similar in nature with the male asking for relationship advise. The incident is under investigation.

MEDICAL TRANSPORT—A student contacted Public Safety and requested transportation to Evangelical Community Hospital for treatment of back pain. The Student Health Services driver transported the student to the hospital. The individual later returned to campus.

TAMPERING WITH FIRE EQUIPMENT—Public Safety responded to a fire a monitor trouble alarm at Sigma Phi Epsilon Fraternity and upon arrival determined that the alarm was caused by a plastic bag covering a smoke detector in room 205. Charges filed for tampering with fire equipment.

Thursday, Sept. 12, 2002

ASSIST POLICE/UNDERAGE DRINKING—Public Safety responded to Phi Gamma Delta Fraternity to assist Lewisburg Police Department with two intoxicated students. Citations were issued for underage drinking.

INFORMATION—University officials of Muskingum College contacted Public Safety with the report that a student of that school might be a risk to a University student he planned to visit. The student was interviewed and advised Public Safety that the visit is authorized by her.

INFORMATION/PROVIDING FALSE INFORMATION—While on routine patrol, Public Safety was informed by an employee that he had lost his decal. The employee was granted temporary parking privileges for three days. Upon investigation, the officer determined that the employee had an expired decal and multiple parking violations.

Friday, Sept. 13

THEFT—A student reported to Public Safety that unknown person(s) removed his bicycle from the Trax Hall bike rack where it was locked. The incident is under investigation.

INFORMATION/REPORTED RECKLESS DRIVING—Two employees reported to Public Safety that a vehicle operated by an unknown male driver was seen driving at an unsafe speed on the grass in front of Roberts Hall. The license plate check by Lewisburg Police Department determined that the vehicle belonged to a student. Citations issued for reckless driving, failure to register vehicle, driving on grass and driving on paths or sidewalks.

FRATERNITY ALCOHOL VIOLATIONS—Public Safety responded to a fire alarm activation at Lambda Chi Alpha Fraternity. Public Safety observed a group of males spraying beer on one another. Fraternity officers stated that no one was consuming the beer. A University official responded. Citations are pending.

MEDICAL TRANSPORT—A student contacted Public Safety and requested transportation to Evangelical Community Hospital for follow-up treatment of a bee sting. A Student Health Services driver responded and transported the student. The individual later returned to campus.

DRUG VIOLATION/UNFOUNDED—Public Safety responded to McDonnell Hall for the report of the odor of marijuana. Upon a plain view search, Public Safety did not observe an drugs or paraphernalia or detect the odor of marijuana.

INFORMATION/SUSPICIOUS BOX—Public Safety responded to the University West Mods for the report of a suspicious box sitting in the parking lot. Public Safety determined the box contained riding equipment. The box was placed in Public Safety storage until someone claims it.

DISORDERLY CONDUCT/PUBLIC DRUNKENNESS—A student reported to Public Safety that her intoxicated ex-boyfriend, a University alumnus, had kicked her car in the Phi Psi Fraternity parking lot. East Buffalo Township Police Department responded to the scene and cited the visitor for public drunkenness and disorderly conduct.

Saturday, Sept. 14

ASSIST POLICE/UNDERAGE DRINKING—Public Safety responded to the front of Larison Hall to assist Lewisburg Police Department with an intoxicated student. The individual was placed in the care of a resident assistant. Citations issued for littering, open container violation and underage drinking.

MEDICAL/AIDED—Public Safety responded to Freas Hall for the report of a visitor who had fallen and injured her ankle. The female refused medical treatment and signed a medical assistance refusal form. Public Safety did assist the visitor to obtain ice to treat the injury, while she was traveling to her home.

UNDERAGE DRINKING—While on routine patrol, Public Safety observed a female staggering by Delta Upsilon Fraternity. Upon investigation, it was determined the female was a student, under the age of 21, who admitted to consuming alcohol. Citation issued for underage drinking.

UNDERAGE DRINKING—While conducting a party check at Sigma Chi Fraternity, Public Safety observed a male throw a cup of beer on the floor. Upon investigation, it was determined that the male was a student under the age of 21, who admitted to consuming alcohol. Citation issued for underage drinking.

UNDERAGE DRINKING—Public Safety observed a male carrying an open container of alcohol in the Lower Harris lot. Upon investigation, it was determined that the male was a student under the age of 21, who admitted to consuming alcohol. Citation issued for underage drinking.

Sunday, Sept. 15

UNDERAGE DRINKING—While on routine patrol, Public Safety observed a male attempting to flee from Lewisburg Police Department behind Vedder Hall. Upon investigation, after receiving false identification, it was determined the male was under the age of 21 who admitted to consuming alcohol. Citations issued for underage drinking and false information.

THEFT—A student reported to Public Safety that unknown person(s) removed the upper half of the driver's side door frame of her friend's Jeep while it was parked in Bucknell West. The incident is under investigation. East Buffalo Township Police Department was notified.

Former professor Kieft earns Joseph Priestly Service Award

By Chris Styers
Senior Writer

In 1876 in New York City, 35 chemists came together to establish the American Chemical Society (ACS). On Sept. 18, the ACS—now more than 160,000 members strong—recognized Lester Kieft, University professor emeritus of chemistry, with the Joseph Priestley Service Award.

The Joseph Priestly Service Award was recently created by the Susquehanna Valley Section of the ACS, which includes such schools as the University, Bloomsburg University, Penn State at Wilkes-Barre, Lycoming College and Susquehanna University.

Former University professor Lester Kieft received the Joseph Priestly Service Award from the American Chemical Society Wednesday. The ceremony coincided with his 90th birthday.

The late chemist Joseph Priestley was best known for the discovery of oxygen. Priestley settled locally in Northumberland, Pa. after he left England because of his support of the American and French Revolutions. In America, he conducted research in a high quality laboratory that stands now as a historical site.

Kieft was attuned to the important contributions Priestley made to chemistry and he took it upon himself to ensure Priestly received recognition. Kieft single-handedly confronted the U.S. Postal Service and lobbied the legislature to bring about the creation of a Joseph Priestley stamp that would commemorate his accomplishments. Kieft succeeded and on April 13, 1983 the stamp was officially issued. Kieft's devotion to Priestley's work is further illustrated in the manuscript he authored, entitled "Joseph Priestley and the Priestley House." The main lobby of the Bertrand Library displays this manuscript, as well as other significant information and pictures involving the lives of both men.

Coinciding with his 90th birthday, Kieft is the first recipient of the award. It was not, however, simply his contributions to Priestley that earned Kieft this honor. Kieft's work with faculty and staff, his influence for 39 years on University students and the contributions he has made to the Lewisburg community and various organizations were what truly earned him this recognition.

Kieft received his Bachelor of Science degree from Hope College and his Ph.D. from Pennsylvania State University. In 1942, Kieft came to the University and served as a professor of chemistry for 39 years. During that time, Kieft was chair of the chemistry department for 25 years and served as Secretary of the Faculty for 12 years. In addition, Kieft became the first premedical adviser and was co-founder of the Association for Advisors for the Health Professions.

"He was very student oriented. He was always a go-getter and very dedicated to Bucknell and the community," Associate Professor of Chemistry Timothy Strein said.

Another of Kieft's endeavors was in 1958, when he and John Day of Merck co-founded the Susquehanna Valley Section of the ACS. Kieft was the first chairman of the section and served as its Councilor for 21 years.

Aside from his professional career, Kieft took a very active role in the community. He was an avid member of the Lions Club and began the Pa. Lions Conservation and Eye Research Foundation. Kieft received a number of awards and recognitions for his work with the blind, including the Lions International President's Award. Outside the Lions Club, his continued devotion to help people earned Kieft the position of president of the Eastern Union County United Way. In 1991, Kieft was recognized by the governor of Pennsylvania with the Governor's Highway Safety Award for offering driving instruction to more than 400 seniors through the 55 Alive/Mature Driving Program. In addition to these organizations, Kieft has also very devoted to his church and has served as Church Deacon, Elder, Session Member and Sunday school teacher.

Kieft also served as president of the Lewisburg Borough Council for four years and served as a member of the Borough Council for many more years. In the 1950s, Kieft performed the duties of Chairman of the Lewisburg Planning Commission, which helped establish zoning laws. He remained on the committee for more than 20 years.

University opens Summit House

By Chris Styers
Senior Writer

The University recently acquired and began renovations on the vacant Theta Chi Fraternity House. Renamed Summit House, the building now provides residence for alumni of the Humanities Residential College and a common area from which the humanities program can flourish.

Matt Vanaskie—The Bucknellian

Summit House, formerly the Theta Chi Fraternity House, currently houses alumni of the Humanities Residential College.

Last school year, Summit House had no residents. The building's doors and windows were boarded up and the interior was in various states of disrepair, including water damage and ruined flooring. Instead of leaving the building dormant and allowing its condition worsen, the University purchased the house from Theta Chi. Assistant Dean of Students and Director of Housing and Residential Life Dan Remley said that by the University purchasing the house, it will allow Theta Chi to focus more on recruiting and re-establishing the fraternity.

Once the settlement was made, the University sketched plans for renovations with hopes that the building would be available for this school year. With confirmation that the house would indeed be ready this year, Remley approached Kelly Finley, the program coordinator of Residential Colleges, to see if the house could be utilized in the Residential College Program.

"The Department of Housing and Residential life is interested in assisting in academic enrichment. Providing a space to strengthen the Residential College program allows a peer group centered around a common theme to find ties back to the academic mission in their everyday life," Remley said.

Taking advantage of the opportunity, Finley went to the Residential Colleges to seek enough students to fill the house. With the opening of Tower House for Arts College Alumni, the Humanities Alumni were the only ones without a house. She saw Summit House as a possibility and the Humanities alumni had a strong response with more than enough people to completely fill the house. Humanities alumni recognized the opening as a possibility for both the alumni community and incoming first-year students.

"Summit is a great place because it gives the Residential College alumni a place to live that still has Humanities overtones," said Humanities Residential Fellow Matt Baker '05. "By having a house for the Humanities College, we can host college events and strengthen the sense of community with the freshman making them feel more welcome at school."

The Humanities College has hosted events for first-year students, such as its "Buddy Program," in which Humanities Alumni and new Humanities students are paired up to interact. A barbecue was also held at Summit House, allowing alumni and students to get to know each other.

"I think it's crucial to break that class difference barrier and get to know our newest Res College arrivals," Tyler Kidder '05 said.

"Summit House allows the Humanities Buddies Program to provide additional academic and social support that first year students may need in order to make a successful transition both to the Residential College and the University," Kang Tchou '05 said

Summit House provides benefits for the Residential College that a hall in a residence hall like Swartz cannot hope to provide. One of the features that Finley mentioned was the large common space in Summit House that is excellent for group programming. Although much of the alumni programming works with first-year students, they are not the only ones that benefit from the program and the house.

"[Alumni can] continue their connections with students from their Res College into sophomore year," Finley said.

Other alumni remarked that the program also allows learning to extend beyond the classroom.

Humanities Alumni are extremely grateful that they have been given this opportunity. Tchou and others were very happy with the renovations made to the house. Before the renovations, Tchou said the house was horrible.

"I could not understand why a pledge would want to live there. Now, it's like a completely new house. There are still things that need to be done, but it is wonderful," Tchou said.

Although the future of the house is uncertain, Humanities alumni are making the best of the house using it to promote a positive college experience for both first-ye - students and alumni.

Class of 2006 elects officers

By Megan Fox
Writer

The Class of 2006 elected its first representatives to the Bucknell Student Government (BSG) on Sept. 10. Voters elected Paul Wolujewicz president, Kyle Mumford vice president and Joel Buckman secretary/treasurer.

First-year students also chose Leah Cunningham, Allison Fitzmaurice, Vanessa Harper, Lizzy McDaniel, Dave Merin, Scott Messinger, Gretchen Perry and Lars Weborg to be their representatives in BSG Congress. Amanda Roof, Matt Gabler and Lily Williamson were selected as alternates.

> "I just think it's destiny that three great lads were put together in one campaign and in one election."
> —Paul Wolujewicz, Class of 2006 president

Voting was conducted electronically through a link on the University's Web site. Students were informed of the election results via e-mail the following day.

"I think the election went excellently," said Amir Sadaghiani, president of BSG. "There was a great voter turnout."

Initially, the election was scheduled for Sept. 9, but an error in the original ballot and a candidate disqualification caused a postponement.

The newly-elected president, vice president and secretary/treasurer campaigned together under the slogan "Vote BMW"—"B" for Buckman, "M" for Mumford and "W" for Wolujewicz.

"I just think it's destiny that three great lads were put together in one campaign and in one election," Wolujewicz said.

Wolujewicz had experience in student government during high school, holding various officer positions in the past four years.

" I think I represent the class very well. First and foremost, I love Bucknell. I think all the things Bucknell offers is what keeps it a great school, instead of just an academic environment," Wolujewicz said. "I just want to keep the ball rolling because all of the previous years have set the precedent, and I want to make this freshman year a memorable one for the rest of our lives."

Buckman also took part in student government, in addition to holding numerous other leadership positions throughout high school.

"I wanted to be secretary/treasurer because I definitely wanted the new experience of being a treasurer and I wanted an officer position so that I could influence the school and work to make freshman year great," Buckman said. "My goal is to work well with the freshman congress members and bring good quality events to the freshman class."

The newly-elected representatives of the Class of 2006 attended their first BSG meeting last Sunday.

"The officers all seemed really motivated and I am looking forward to working with them this year," Sadaghiani said.

The representatives of 2006 scheduled their first class meeting for last Thursday at noon. At the meeting, the officers began planning a fundraiser for the freshman fall formal.

According to Wolujewicz, the formal, scheduled to take place sometime after fall break, will be one of many events planned this year for first-year students.

Bush, Rumsfeld push case for action

WASHINGTON—With the United Nations wavering in its support for tough action against Iraq, President George W. Bush and Secretary of Defense Donald Rumsfeld sent a strong message Wednesday that the United States is resolved to move against Saddam Hussein on its own. After meeting with congressional leaders at the White House, the president said lawmakers had agreed to consider a resolution approving military action against Baghdad. On Capitol Hill, Rumsfeld said the approval must come before the U.N. Security Council votes on a return of arms inspectors to Iraq.

United States had 12 warnings of jet attacks

WASHINGTON—Intelligence agencies failed to anticipate terrorists' flying planes into buildings despite a dozen clues in the years before the Sept. 11 attacks that Osama bin Laden or others might use aircraft as bombs, a congressional investigator told lawmakers Wednesday as they began public hearings into the attacks.

JERUSALEM—A Palestinian blew himself up after police challenged him at a bus stop in northern Israel during evening rush hour Wednesday. One policeman was killed and two people were wounded. The bombing, the first suicide attack in six weeks, came in a new burst of violence a day after Israel turned down a Palestinian offer to halt attacks on civilians in Israel as the first stage of a gradual truce.

RUSH

Another policy change for fraternities was that rushees had to rank their top six choices.

"With ranking, the fraternities were able to see the interest levels and the rushees could focus," Megji said.

Although Megji believes Rush was successful overall, he would have liked to place everyone in a fraternity who went through recruitment.

"It was difficult because IFC Rush Chair Chris Perrella '03 and I were new to the process, and Shauna is still in her first month and has so much on her plate. We were not able to be as aggressive in getting everyone placed as when Dean Baker was here. Hopefully this will be reconciled with open bids, and a more formal spring recruitment," Megji said.

Sororities had to face their own challenges by holding Rush in Vedder Hall because Hunt Hall is being renovated.

"Vedder was different for the sororities, but it allowed them to think outside of the box. The challenge allowed them to build bonds between sororities that weren't there before," Irwin said.

Despite some problems that the sororities faced in Vedder, Kenner remains optimistic.

"Because Vedder Hall is inhabited by a variety of students, there were more incidences of vandalism to our suite decorations than had happened in Hunt. But, torn posters are relatively unimportant, especially knowing that we will be returning to a beautifully renovated dormitory next semester," Kenner said.

Kenner also believes the sorority members were very cooperative and diligent in preparing for recruitment events.

"All seven sororities accepted the maximum number of women possible through our bid-matching process. This significantly reduced the number of women who did not receive a bid to any sorority," Kenner said.

According to Irwin, students have risen to her expectation of their leadership skills in two weeks time.

"We started off on a good foot. We put the positive foot forward. I expect them to stay on that road—to be leaders and to be honest, and to become a community," Irwin said.

Wage minimum for workers changes

By Jennifer Jenchura
Senior Writer

Immediately effective, all University employees can attain a wage rate above $9 per hour after four years of satisfactory employment.

The dollar amount of an employee's wage will increase annually in proportion to wage increases at lower levels within the local wage survey. The personnel office will develop a model for this wage target development plan.

The cost of this one-time change will be insignificant relative to the wage budget, according to the report from the University's Committee on Planning and Budget.

The committee makes recommendations to the administration on the financial aspects of program planning, facilities planning and the capital budget, and on the general policies and guidelines for the annual budget. Voting membership includes four elected members of the faculty, members of Bucknell Student Government (BSG), a salaried employee, two hourly staff employees and a handful of various University officials.

Last April, the committee agreed to study the issue of staff salaries and the living wage proposal submitted by the Bucknell Caucus for Economic Justice (BCEJ).

The BCEJ was started in the fall of 2001 to bring attention to any distance between the University's employment practices and its mission statement commitment "to engage in institutional programs and practices that exemplify compassion, civility and a sense of justice."

Since then, the BCEJ estimated $10.54 per hour as the living wage rate for University employees.

"A living wage is defined as the level of wage that would allow a family adequately to meet its basic needs without needing public or private assistance," Associate Professor of Geography Paul Susman said.

In April 2001, Associate Professor of English Saundra Morris and Associate Professor of Economics Charles Sackrey requested that the committee undertake a study exploring the cost of implementing a living wage at the University. They proposed a pay rate no lower than $9 per hour and asked the committee to identify possible sources of revenue to finance the change.

Soon after the request, University President Steffen Rogers responded by formally asking the committee to analyze the concept and financial implications of a living wage.

The committee spent last spring considering the "Living Wage" issue. In April, Committee Chair and Professor of Geography and Environmental Studies Ben Marsh sent draft recommendations to the president and received a response in May.

> "We hope we are an employer who can attract the best employees in the local market, can treat them with pride and decency and hope that they can respond with pride in their employer."
> —Steffen Rogers, University president

"The committee was unable to endorse the Living Wage concept as it came to us; it seems vague in its expression and contrary to certain other principles within the University employment system," according to the memo sent by Marsh.

"The committee believes that the University should commit itself to providing opportunities and support for the advancement of every hourly employee who performs satisfactorily to rise in responsibility, and therefore to rise in pay past some certain wage target," Marsh said.

Following the focus on "potential for advancement" in the memo, the committee found that just a small percent of employees worked at the University for more than four years but continued to earn less than $9 per hour.

Currently, about 15 percent of the total support staff earns less than $9 per hour and that percentage was essentially zero after four years of satisfactory service.

The committee narrowed down the type of hourly employee the $9 wage would include to only full-time, "benefits-eligible" support staff employees. It did not include non-benefited staff or employees of outside contractors, such as some food service workers.

The campus has approximately 500 University wage employees. No salaried staff in benefited positions fall below the equivalent pay level.

Some members of the committee felt that raising the minimum wage to a designated level removes incentives for workers to work to their potential and also puts those who have previously earned raises at a disadvantage.

"This wage was a weighted average of estimations of living expenses of several family sizes in several local counties. The committee does not see a way to identify some single income level that constitutes a Living Wage for all employees," Marsh said in his memo.

The committee believes that the existence of lower wage rate jobs in the local market satisfies the employment needs of entry-level workers seeking to develop skills, as well as workers who prefer to have a less challenging job at matching wages.

Some members of the committee believe those in lower pay ranges may underestimate the total benefit of working at the University because of the health and education benefits (the same ones faculty receive), the retirement plan and advancement opportunities the University provides.

Rogers accepted the committee's report.

"We hope we are an employer who can attract the best employees in the local market, can treat them with pride and decency and hope that they can respond with pride in their employer. We pledge to recognize and respect those improvements that your report recommends," Rogers said.

He subsequently directed that an acceleration scale be prepared to allow present and future employees to achieve the inflation-adjusted four-year floor in future years.

The president's implementation does not solve the wage debate.

"The announced policy was that workers would receive $9 if they had satisfactory work reports for four years. In other words, it applies to just a tiny number of people. Others may receive less until they have completed four years of work. No other job that I have ever heard establishes a low wage probationary period of four years. Thus, it omits about 100 people and is not yet a meaningful minimum wage at Bucknell," Susman said. "I believe that we should take to heart Bucknell's Mission Statement that calls for 'compassion, civility and a sense of justice,' and we should all do everything possible to ensure that members of Bucknell's work force to not suffer from want."

The Living Wage campaign at the University began in response to the low wages of dining services workers. The new proposal does not include workers for the company hired to provide the University's food service, nor does it insist that its subcontracted dining services company pay the same wages other University staff employees receive.

Rogers and his staff have been working on staff issues. They created a staff category of "benefited casuals" to give some level of benefit to all campus workers.

A new workplace adviser program will also be implemented immediately. In response to results from the campus climate survey conducted over the summer, Rogers announced that elected staff members would serve as liaisons to provide a confidential means of registering work-related complaints. Managers will soon receive training.

"Fear and concern for job security among staff people led many to bring complaints to BCEJ on a confidential basis over the last few years rather than go through the existing grievance procedures at Bucknell. The ombudsperson program is a step in the right direction to create a means for bringing job grievances without fear of reprisal," Susman said.

Susman proposed that the immediate implication of a wage floor of at least $9 per hour adjusted annually for inflation for all University support staff including dining services, not just certain workers who fit the four-year satisfactory performance level requirement.

"There would be major budget implications if the minimum wage was increased to $9 per hour. It would not be fair to the person who started out making lower than $9 per hour, so the new plan would push up all salaries. If the motion passes we will see compressed salaries after the $9 wage," Marsh said.

The issue will be discussed at next month's faculty meeting.

Campus reacts to Sept. 11 ceremonies

By Elisabeth Salemme
Staff Writer

The one-year anniversary of the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks on America was commemorated last week at the University and throughout the nation. Students, faculty and staff gathered around campus for religious ceremonies, a Remembrance, Reflection and Renewal ceremony and to receive support and comfort through one-on-one and group sessions.

"A lot of planning went in to the ceremony, especially with the office of chaplains. The services were well planned, meaningful and very inclusive," Catholic Chaplain Father Marty Moran said.

According to University President Steffen Rogers, preparation for the event began more than six months ago. A great deal of organizing took place, including planning for the choir and the presentations.

Rogers could not be present at the ceremony due to University business in California. According to Rogers, a large number of people were invited to a dinner that night for fundraising and alumni affairs. He said that it was not until after everyone had responded to attend that the realization was made that it would be impossible for him to attend the ceremony.

"I was very disappointed not to be here," Rogers said.

According to Moran, the ceremony, held behind Rooke Chapel, had the theme of Remembrance, Reflection and Renewal to help the University community understand what had happened, but also for everyone to realize it is a time to move on.

"I commend the organizers for achieving a highly appropriate tone and a very good result. The multiple acts of remembering, reflecting and renewal were each important, not only to individual community members, but also to the Bucknell community as a whole," Vice President for Student Affairs Charles Pollock '70 said.

Students also appreciated the efforts of those who planned the memorial.

"I think Bucknell did a great job with its handling of Sept. 11. The ceremony was very tasteful. It gave a sense of closure, as much as any memorial or program could give," President of Bucknell Student Government Amir Sadaghiani '03 said.

Anyone who wanted to participate in the ceremony by reading poetry, essays or religious prayers, or by speaking could do so. University Chaplain Ian Oliver said he was grateful that so many students, faculty and staff came forward to participate.

"It is very difficult to design something that will respond to an unpredictable response," Oliver said. "What we wanted to do is to make room for people to feel what they were feeling."

"I think the University did a good job of handling the anniversary of Sept. 11. [The University] provided a ceremony and service for those who chose to participate, while not going overboard, for example, bringing up the topic in every class," Kristen Reichardt '06 said. "If someone needed to talk, they had the opportunity to do so."

According to Rogers, a "full spectrum" of reactions from students was anticipated. Although student reactions varied, according to Oliver most people were not as upset as might have been expected. He said a big response was anticipated, as the crisis center and Meditation Chapel were set up for students to seek counseling.

"It was interesting because we didn't know [what reactions to anticipate from students]," Rogers said. "I talked with our two psychologists who helped us last year as well as other faculty members and we discussed what the reactions might be. What we tried to do was prepare the faculty. We had a discussion about the various approaches to take at a faculty meeting, we set up the emergency response team again, just in case, and asked the faculty to be aware that they were going to have those kinds of reactions in the classes."

Oliver was also unsure of what to expect from students.

"I've talked to a few students, but I haven't talked to them all. I talked to the RLC (Religious Life on Campus) staff and housing staff just to see if there was a lot of upset on campus, if there were a lot of people having major difficulties and they said there were surprisingly little," Oliver said.

According to various University chaplains and administrators, the University has changed since Sept. 11 in terms of the attitudes and ways by which by the students, faculty and staff live their lives. In addition, a more prominent sense of community has been established.

"The primary change that I have picked up is that people are much more tolerant. People seem to be much more open to one another, even to strangers, than perhaps before, and even on campus there is a seriousness about academics and service learning, reaching out to other people in so many different ways," Rogers said. "We always did those things, but now there is just an umbrella of a much stronger feeling of caring about other people."

"At Bucknell, many of Sept. 11's lasting effects have been subtle, and many have been positive. More of us appear to be placing importance on having a sense of community, and on helping others, and on understanding international issues and current events," Pollock said.

Administrators and chaplains encourage students who still deal with lingering pain, fear, anger and grief to speak with someone at psychological services, or University faculty, friends or family.

"The number one thing is to talk to somebody," Oliver said. "There are lots of confidential resources on campus. It is very important to get those feelings out and to share them with other people who may feel the same way."

Administrators and chaplains also expressed hope for the future both at the University and throughout the nation.

"I would hope that Sept. 11 has reminded us that we take a lot of very important things for granted, and that we shouldn't," Oliver said. "I would hope that a university would be a place where people would be thinking hard about these things, because if not here, then where?"

"I am hopeful that our collective, increased interest in other cultures, other nations and history will grow even stronger, with long-term results, such as that enhance cross-cultural understanding," Pollock said. "I hope that we continue looking out for one another in the new ways we have."

Mixed feelings from Rush, improvements needed

This year, many changes were made to Rush, bringing mixed results from the Greek community.

In order to accommodate Jewish students who wanted to celebrate Rosh Hashana, Rush was extended to three weeks, instead of the normal two-week period. Many Greek members agreed that three weeks was too long. For sororities, girls had to wait longer in between rounds to find out if they received a bid from a sorority. This waiting causes more anxiety than a two-week Rush period would.

Because of the longer Rush period, there were many days in which no events took place. Although the extra days between rounds gave people a break from the activities, they also provided more opportunities for dirty Rush. However, dirty Rush is inevitable and can happen if Rush is two weeks or three weeks long.

Another significant policy change that affected fraternities was the requirement for all rushees to visit each house twice during round one of Rush, similar to how girls have to visit each sorority. Last year, rushees only had to go to four fraternity houses. One of the goals of Rush is to meet new people and by going to all of the houses, rushees are meeting many new people. If they only went to houses where they already knew people, Rush would not be as successful in fulfilling that goal.

Although going to all of the houses provided an opportunity for rushees to visit houses they normally would not think of going to, visiting the houses twice seemed to be excessive. Most people are able to know whether or not they are interested in a house the first time they visit.

Another significant change that took place for fraternities was ranking. This year, rushees had to rate their top fraternity choices. This system allowed rushees to focus more on which house they wanted to join. Also, current fraternity members could better judge the interest levels of the potential pledges.

Perhaps one of the biggest challenges facing sorority Rush was the fact that Rush had to take place in Vedder because Hunt, the traditional home for sororities, is being renovated. During Rush, some sorority girls living in Vedder had to move furniture out of their rooms to create a make-shift suite.

Although there were some problems, such as vandalism to door decorations, Rush in Vedder created a common bond between sororities. For example, on the Chi Omega hall, there were a few members from other sororities. Therefore, members from different sororities were able to interact more than they could in Hunt.

Due to the Hunt renovations, the Porch Event was held on top of Freas Hall. Although the Porch Event was still successful in getting the Greek community together, some criticized the event's new venue. When the Porch Event was held at Hunt, there was the connection to the sororities because sororities are housed in Hunt. However, that same connection was not present at Freas.

Considering the policy changes and extended Rush period, Rush went well. Once Hunt is finished and some policies, such as visiting houses twice, are revisited, Rush should go smoother.

Bush much smarter than many suggest

By Aaron Hanlon
Writer

If you've been following the news over the past few years, you are undoubtedly sure of three things: the Earth is still round; Anna Kournikova, though strikingly beautiful, is horrible at tennis;and President George W. Bush is a complete moron.

Chances are, you've heard the latter far more than any popular media slogan since the Clinton administration's bestseller "It's Just About Sex." But while we know that the Earth is indeed round, and unfortunately, will have flattened out by the time Kournikova wins a tournament, the malicious attacks by the mass media on Bush's intellectual capacity and competence as our president are false and poorly justified.

There are essentially three main categories of oft-used claims suggesting that Bush is intellectually bankrupt and unfit to be president.

The most prevalent of these is the "babbling idiot" claim. Bush stumbles over words, so, naturally, he must be stupid.

While the president is certainly not a fantastic public speaker, this is no indication of stupidity. Even before his psychological disorders set in, Nobel Laureate John Nash had a stuttering problem and has always had some difficulty forming sentences.

This is not to say that Bush is a genius because he stutters like Nash. Rather, your inability to speak well is not necessarily a reflection of your intellect, or lack thereof. In fact, many "intelligent" politicians who are not the target of media slander misspeak from time to time.

The brilliant former vice-president Al Gore, whom the media dubs too intelligent to connect with the average voter, had these words of wisdom: "A zebra cannot change its spots," and "I always had a very vivid and clear sense that men and women were entirely and completely equal, if not more so." Bush may not be history's most articulate president, but that doesn't make him an idiot.

Another favorite used to attack Bush's intelligence is the claim that at Yale he was merely a C-student. By his own admission, Bush made many poor choices in college, probably including too much partying and not enough studying. While a C is not exactly a presidential-quality grade, it is important to note that, back when Bush attended Yale, it was still possible to get a C at Ivy League schools. In addition to this, college grades are not an adequate indicator of one's intelligence and ability.

If I am incorrect here, I would expect all C students reading right now to put this paper down and resign themselves to the notion that they will always be middle management or average employees after graduation. To quote Kenneth Langone in last year's commencement speech, "The world is run by C students." Gore, who has climbed his way to the top of the Democratic Party, received mostly Cs at Harvard. (He received straight As in his art classes.) Oddly enough, the same people who criticize Bush for being stupid on the basis of his college grades also consider Gore to be "too intellectual," although Gore had virtually the same grades.

Perhaps the most effective cheap shot at Bush's intellect and capabilities is that he was given everything, including his current position, by his father. Thus, Bush never achieved anything on his own because he was too stupid, or because he didn't need to due to Daddy's power and influence. Contrary to popular belief, Bush the elder was a scarcely-known congressman who was about to lose his first Senate race when his son was admitted to Yale.

Being an out-of-work congressman makes one a virtual nobody among Yale Admissions. The idea that G. W. was admitted to Yale because of his father is ludicrous. After graduating from Yale and earning his M.B.A from Harvard, G. W. Bush revived the Texas Rangers and made a $15 million profit (though you may have been taught otherwise, profit is a good thing) from his investment in the team. Bush's work with the Rangers showed anything but intellectual vacancy, as he demonstrated superior managerial skills. Generally speaking, you cannot do what Bush did for the Texas Rangers without substantial ability and leadership qualities.

Though managing a baseball team to success certainly does not qualify one to be president, this was merely the beginning of Bush's achievements as a chief administrator. He drew 53.5 percent of the vote in unseating wildly popular Democratic incumbent Ann Richards in the Texas gubernatorial election of 1994. Thereafter, he became the first Texas governor to be elected to consecutive four-year terms in the 1998 election, taking 68.6 percent of the vote. Unless Bush the elder somehow ran throughout Texas and stuffed the ballots in favor of his son, G. W. Bush destroyed a popular incumbent in consecutive elections because he is an intelligent, likeable and capable leader. The voters in Texas (and later Florida) seemed to agree.

Bush is probably not a genius, and certainly not infallible. Most people can have intelligent debate about his policies and effectiveness. But those who take unsupported cheap shots at his intellect show their own ignorance and stupidity. Intelligent people cannot debate with those whose critical rhetoric is limited to that of a broken "you're stupid" record. Calling someone dumb in the absence of a legitimate, fact-based claim wouldn't even earn you a C at Yale.

University bumped down again

By Xino Jiang
Writer

According to the newest U.S. News And World Report, the University is tied for 29th among the nation's 217 liberal arts colleges with another six colleges. The ranking is not too bad, but in comparison to our rankings in past years the trend is not optimal.

I started to observe the college rankings in U.S. News And World Report when I was in high school. I was just like everyone else in my high school, searching online all the time, trying to get into a highly-ranked college.

Based on my observations, the University's ranking has been dropping every single year, from 26th in 2000 to 29th currently. The University was once ranked 20th. Now, it is ranked in a six-way tie above Bard College and Franklin & Marshall College, which are tied for 36th.

It is possible that if we follow the trend of the past years, we will drop from the top 35 liberal arts colleges altogether.

As a self-supported student, I also noticed that our tuition has increased by 4 to 5 percent in the past few years. This year, tuition increased 8 percent. The apparently inverse relationship of the ranking and tuition does not make any sense.

As a student at the University, I do not know what is really happening with the administration. I really hope some "inside people" can give me an explanation. Maybe there is something I do not know. I do not mind paying a higher tuition to get a better education, but I do mind seeing the University's ranking decrease every year while tuition simultaneously increases.

Some people might argue that college ranking is not important, but I disagree. First, all prospective liberal arts students need rankings of schools in order to place themselves.

Secondly, both employers and graduate schools look at the rankings of the schools from which their applicants graduated in order to make final acceptance decisions.

Third, ranking represents how prestigious a school is when compared with other schools. As one of the 3,500 students here, I always hope to see my beloved college doing better than other colleges.

The trend is definitely not optimal, and I hope that all of the students and faculty members become aware of this and do something about it. Quite frankly, when I applied to the University, it was ranked 26th, and by the time that I was accepted, it was ranked 27th.

When I matriculated, it was ranked 28th. Now it is ranked 29th! When I graduate, I hope that I will still be able to find this school somewhere in the list of top schools nationwide.

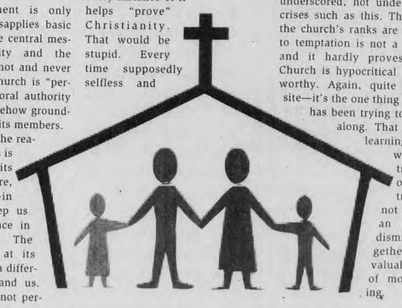
Catholic church scandals do not represent the church

By Michael Boland
Senior Writer

The Catholic Church's recent sex scandals have understandably caused some observers to turn away from the Church, and quite possibly the concept of organized religion altogether. At first glance, the entire affair seems to have undermined the Church's moral authority and threatened to out the Church as little more than a consortium of arrogant, self-righteous hypocrites. It has become a fearsome new arrow in the quiver of the Church's critics, and some have suggested that it calls into question the Church's right to speak aloud on moral issues. After all, if they can't keep their own moral house in order, then who are they to instruct the rest of us on what's right, what's wrong and how we ought to live?

But this argument is only appealing if one misapplies basic Church doctrine. The central message of Christianity and the Catholic Church, is not and never has been that the Church is "perfect," or that the moral authority of the Church is somehow grounded in the conduct of its members. Quite the opposite. The reason the Church exists is to communicate its message of who we are, and who God is—in other words, to keep us mindful of our "place in the universe." The Church's message, at its core, is that there is a difference between God and us. Unlike Him, we are not perfect and we never will be. We are fallible creatures, and unlike God, we are going to mess up and do bad things time and time again, not because we aren't trying hard enough, or because we haven't yet perfected the institutions that shape us—but because it's in our nature to do so. We can't help it. In the Church's model of the universe, the reason we need God (and a Church here on earth) is to help counter the predisposition of every single human being to wickedness.

You may agree with this doctrine and you may not. That is not really the point. The point is that this summer's scandals actually went a long way towards validating the Catholic worldview. That is not to say that naughty behavior by Church officials ought to be condoned and encouraged because every instance of it helps "prove" Christianity. That would be stupid. Every time supposedly selfless and "moral" people us (like a Catholic priest or bishop) prove themselves capable of the worst conceivable crimes, it lends more credibility to the principle of Christianity that "There is no one who does good; not even one."



A handful of members of the Church bureaucracy are guilty of some truly ghastly sins, unspeakable betrayals, which should probably disqualify them from further service. But in our rush to take easy swipes at a prominent institution, and in so doing make ourselves feel more righteous, the least we can do is not confuse the Church's message in the first place. They are not telling the world, "Do as we say because we are blameless." What they have said, and should continue to say as Christians, is, "Do as God says, not as we do."

The necessity of the Church is underscored, not undermined, by crises such as this. That some in the church's ranks are susceptible to temptation is not a new story, and it hardly proves that the Church is hypocritical or untrustworthy. Again, quite the opposite—it's the one thing the Church has been trying to tell us all along. That it may be learning the hard way the truth of its own doctrine should not be used as an excuse to dismiss it altogether as a valuable source of moral teaching.

Rights aren't what you may think

By Tom Elliott
Senior Writer

"Yeah, release the beast from within, baptize gins/ Keep company with friends that repel sin/ I'm out to win, ain't no pretendin'/ F—k the First Amendment/ My speech was free the day that my soul descended/ Earthbound." These are lyrics from the group, Jurassic 5, and this particular verse happens to be one of the more intelligent things I've heard from a rap artist recently.

I believe it's MC Akil who is providing this thoughtful introspection. Akil's lyrics speak of something that warrants an overdue discussion: Where exactly do our rights come from?

The government cannot grant you rights. It cannot give you the right to housing, health care, a living wage, medicine or even the right to speak freely or own a gun. The only areas governments have proven effective are infringing our natural rights and, in every American's case, protecting the majority of them. Although, even in America, the government is frighteningly involved in significant amount of our lives.

Many seem to feel that our government gave us our rights. Akil knows better than that. The only thing our government—as well as any other—does, is take away rights. The fact is, every person on this earth was born free. God put us here, blessing each person with individual freedoms; most importantly, are those inalienable ones Thomas Jefferson spelled out in the Declaration of Independence—(life, liberty and the pursuit of happiness). If religion isn't your bag, then you probably believe that these inherent rights come from human nature, or simply being a citizen of this planet.

Many seem to feel that our government gave us our rights ... The only thing our government—as well as any other—does, is take away rights. The fact is, every person on this earth was born free.

Either way, the important question is whether or not you're born into a system that respects these rights. Luckily, our Constitution does a better job than most to protect our liberties. Confusion tends to arise from the Bill of Rights, which many seem to attribute our rights to. But if you take the time to read it carefully, you will notice that everything is written in the negative—Congress shall make no law abridging your right to this, that and some other things. The framers of the Constitution believed that it was their job to merely protect as many of these rights as possible.

If the government does—in all its celestial wisdom—bestow us a patient's bill of rights, an equal right or any other some such thing, keep in mind, whatever it gives, it can always take away.

The United Nations has informed us that medicine, clothing and housing are all "human rights." The irony of this is interesting, since governments that have declared to provide such social-equality type provisions tend to have citizens living in the world's worst conditions (e.g. Cuba). They may be poor and starving to death, but at least they'll smile when thinking of their great state-run health care access.

Governments all over are working on granting new rights every day. An article on rights proliferation by Chuck Todd noted some of the current "new" rights under consideration around the United States. Among these are: a children's bill of rights; a hunters' bill of rights; a teachers' bill of rights; students' religious bill of rights; a parents' bill of rights; and a voters' bill of rights.

In this era of modern political rhetoric, Americans are increasingly coming to understand that rights refer to things unintended—a right to air conditioning, prompt pizza delivery and even Internet access. Women's "reproductive rights" grant them the right to kill unborn babies. The "gay rights" movement seeks to allow an institution defined as the holy bond between a man and a woman, to be redefined. Naturally, it's their right to believe this nonsense, but it isn't the government's right to make it true.

New York City Mayor Michael Bloomberg feels it's the government's duty to treat each New Yorker in the same manner a parent does their teenager, which should be embarrassing to his constituents. What I am referring to, of course, is another "new" right floating around America. From the beginning of time, man has been able to grow and smoke tobacco—but now, a person essentially has the right for another person to not smoke. Bloomberg wants to ban smoking in all bars and restaurants for fear that other patrons may not be able to fend for themselves and avoid the secondhand smoke.

One reason the University banned smoking in dorms because it was possible to have a non-smoking roommate. Of course, that person could always just request the other to go outside; but college isn't quite the real world. It's almost as if our parents were in charge. I only wish we had the right to be treated like adults.

Self-image greatly affects eating disorders

By Becca Susman
Writer

"What do you like to do for fun?" My women's literature professor posed this question last semester. The responses from my peers varied widely from reading to watching television to running. My professor shook her head sadly, commenting that not a single person had listed eating as something that they enjoy. The mere idea of food as something to enjoy had not even entered my sphere of thinking.

Growing up in Lewisburg, I watched as many people that I cared about succumbed to eating disorders, due in part to the misery of not "fitting in." This is a very simplistic explanation for a complex nature of the problem. There were, of course, many reasons for them to systematically starve and purge themselves, but the one theme that was constant throughout was the idea of beauty.

According to the Society for Eating Disorder Prevention, 91 percent of college women have attempted to control their weight by dieting, and according to Time Magazine, 80 percent of children started dieting by the time that they were in fourth-grade.

These statistics horrify me.

How is it that we equate thinness with beauty? We all know of the millions spent promoting fashions and beauty ideals, and we feel the bombardment of diet industry ads ($50 million a year) encouraging a particular body type. Ads continue to perpetuate these values through the choices they make as consumers simply fuel the diet industry. This industry today pilfers $50 million a year.

While I pride myself on being a non-conformist and not allowing society's stereotypes to influence my behavior, in reality this is impossible. I begrudgingly and shamefully admit that I am influenced by the body images from the various magazines in supermarkets to billboards to malls to images on television.

Are there possible alternative images? While studying abroad in Seville, Spain, last semester, I had a much-needed reprieve from American society.

While Spain does have its share of eating disorder problems, I found that the everyday images are dramatically different. In Spain, both women and men have relatively realistic body types and the overall diversity of actors seemed to me to be much greater.

I have heard that it is a common to gain weight while studying abroad in Europe, especially if living and eating with a family, and therefore is obligated to eat home-cooked food. Although I found this to be the case in my program, I also found that in my group, most of the women (there were very few men in the program) were relatively happy with their bodies and not overly concerned with their weight until two weeks just before returning to the United States.

The last two weeks marked a drastic change when many of the women. Most of the people I encountered went on crash diets and exercised excessively in order to shed the pounds acquired from our altered diets. One friend even confided if she did not lose weight before returning, she would resort to bulimia once at home.

This mentality reflects a fundamental weakness within our culture. If people are overwhelmingly more comfortable being heavier abroad than in the United States, our culture is in need of an immediate change.

How is it that the cultural cues through the millions of images in the United States keep their stranglehold on us even when abroad? Is it that we feel a higher loyalty to feeding money into the diet industry at home? Without this mentality, one more corporate giant would cease to exist. Can any of you honestly say that you know of anyone who does not have issues with his or her body? While I consider myself relatively comfortable in my own skin, at the same time, I cannot think of a single woman who does not have issues with her self-image.

Whether the root of these issues is internal or external, the result is the same. After a work-intensive summer last year, I returned to the University significantly smaller than when I left. The compliments that I received from friends and regular comments about my "new" body caused me to monitor my intake of food to an extreme extent. My friends are, for the most part, also people who consider themselves and their beauty standards outside of the mainstream culture. Yet we still unknowingly perpetuate the same standards.

Studying abroad afforded me a perspective on the American university system. Whether in a city-based, large university or a small university in rural Pennsylvania, the issues of self-image and self-hatred persist. Everyday interactions between peers have an enormous effect on the individual's self confidence and actions.

We, as a student body, have continually perpetuated the cycle of self-hatred that has become such an integral part of the University culture. Despite recent media attention to this problem, we continue to ignore the very real effect it has on each of us, and without dialogue it will continue to control our behavior.

Difficult to move forward

To the Editor:

In an article entitled "Zimbabwe must change its direction," Bucknellian business and politics editor comments on President Robert Mugabe's problematic land reform policies, and argues that Mugabe is a victim of false assumptions as he tragically attempts to turn back the clock of colonial history. Briefly citing the injustice of forced redistribution of land to the benefit of whites during the colonial period, the business editor states that, "The faulty assumption of Mugabe is that the Zimbabweans of European descent today share the same claims of superiority and colonial attitudes as their counterparts in the heyday of British expansionism."

The article then continues, "Mugabe must recognize that the ink is dry on the pages of colonial history and there is no way to erase the words. Instead of nostalgically looking back into the past and vainly searching for possible methods of reverting to a bygone era, one must acknowledge the present system and find viable ways for forward movement of all citizens."

Part of the problem with the article's analysis of the situation in Zimbabwe is that it speaks of past, present and future as though they are discrete categories rather than waypoints in a continuum. One can criticize aspects of Mugabe's land reform policies while simultaneously acknowledging the conundrum that his regime, like most post-colonial governments in the so-called Third World, seeks to escape. The fact is that it probably does not matter much to Mugabe or most black Zimbabweans that the Zimbabweans of European descent today do not share the claims of racial superiority their forebears did.

The point is that they possess the "lion share" of the best land in the country, and this fact is part of their inheritance from their white forebears. It is part of the legacy of colonial atrocity and injustice that has benefitted the descendants of colonial masters in formerly colonized countries all over the globe; it is part of the legacy that has disenfranchized the descendants of the colonized peoples all over the globe. What was atrocity in the past, achieved the status and sanction of legality under colonialism, and managed to maintain legality and respectability even after formal political decolonization.

Thus, the legacy of the colonial past still haunts the descendants of colonialism's "wretched of the earth." The colonial past informs the present, and proposes a bleak future for, in this case, the majority of black Zimbabweans. Thus, the ongoing conundrum is, "How do the formerly colonized and still disenfranchized prepare a future of justice and equity without reopening the historical scabs of past colonial injustice?"

Sincerely,

Econ dept. justifies actions

To the Editor:

We must confess, the author of the recent Bucknellian article, "Economics department hypocritical towards Living Wage," is correct in arguing that we have failed as professors, although not in the way suggested in the article. Judging by the column, we have failed to instill in at least one of our majors the value of careful research and reasoned debate, as opposed to name-calling and invective.

It would have been helpful if the student had done some research before blasting the economics department for hiring students to help retrieve mail and newspapers, do copying and otherwise assist with work around the department. The writer implies in the article that we should use department funds to help pay for a living wage on campus instead of hiring students to work at various tasks in the department.

If the student had done any research, the author would have discovered that (1) we cannot use departmental funds to help give workers around campus a living wage (no matter how much some of us might want to do so), because it is expressly prohibited under University budgeting rules; (2) we try to offer employment to students who need the money whenever possible through work study and other student help programs (surely the author would not want to deny someone the opportunity to do this work); (3) that the economics department is not a monolithic group with one point of view, but a collection of people with varying viewpoints on the living wage issue and (4) that those of us who do support a living wage do in fact put our money where our mouth is by donating money to the living wage cause and by devoting our free time to fighting for a cause we see as just.

The debate over the living wage on campus is too important to be reduced to name-calling and diatribes. The quality of the lives of our workers is at stake, as is the way we choose to allocate resources at the University. That is what we should be discussing.

Sincerely,
Janet Knoedler

Calendar to be reviewed

To the Editor:

Last week's letter from Mr. and Mrs. P.J. Del Giudice questioned the inclusion of only certain religious holidays in the on-line University Calendar. As chair of Bucknell's Calendar Council, I am grateful to have learned that the calendar's intent was not clear and that its listing of holidays likely can be improved.

The University Calendar is meant to help members of the Bucknell community schedule events thoughtfully, in part by listing the most important holidays of our largest religious groups. Thus, holidays occurring when the University is closed have not been included. But to check the appropriateness of which holidays are and are not listed, I have asked our Catholic, Jewish and University/Protestant chaplains to review the current version.

A much more extensive calendar of religious observances and holidays can be found on the Web at http://www.departments.bucknell.edu/chapel/holidays.shtm). This is distributed annually to every administrative office. The University does not cancel classes for any religious holidays, but our Chaplains' and Provost's offices regularly remind faculty of upcoming religious observances, and they urge faculty to be as flexible as possible with our students of different faiths.

Sincerely,
Charles R. Pollock

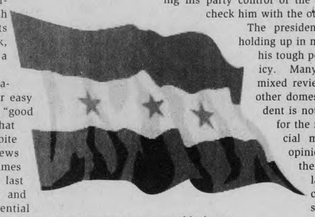
The first test of autumn

By Mike Niebauer
Senior Writer

It seems the intentions of the president this fall is to use the "bully pulpit" to force a confrontation with Iraq. As Maureen Dowd of The New York Times in a weekend commentary states, the Bush family operates best in an atmosphere of foreign confrontation.

The first Bush administration used the military in Panama and Iraq and failed in many ways domestically. The economic performance of the first Bush presidency was its Achilles heel, so to speak, and led to his defeat for a second term.



The Bush confrontation mentality makes for easy analogies and a clear "good versus evil" pattern that plays well in the sound bite addicted television news cycles. How many times have we heard in the last year "the axis of evil" and "evildoers" in presidential speeches? It is explicitly clear that this president has found his foreign policy footing in September of last year.

Domestically, our economy is weakened and saddled with a stock market down 17 percent this year and billions of dollars of lost worth. The corporate scandals (Enron, WorldCom, Global Crossing) that have combined to undermine the confidence of small and large investors is endangering the now-fragile recovery from last fall's weakness and this summer's sell-off. The president was slow to recognize the severity or extent of the economic scandal or its political fallout.

Only after weeks of tepid reassurances did the president realize that it was more than just a few "bad corporate apples" and he had to increase funding to the Securities and Exchange Commission (SEC). By this time a huge amount of corporate bonds listed were considered "junk status." Conditions are so bad that Bush's initiative to invest a portion of Social Security invested in the stock market has been quietly forgotten even within the Republican Party.

With the beginning of autumn, the test of the congressional elections will begin to get some attention. The flag waving and patriotism has yet to increase the rate of voting in this country. Our choices seem to be whether to give affirmation to the president by giving his party control of the national legislature or check him with the other party.

The president's popularity is still holding up in most polls, mainly from his tough positions on foreign policy. Many are giving him very mixed reviews on economics and other domestic issues. The president is not yet getting the blame for the meltdown of the financial markets, but informed opinion is that the cost of the tax-cutting program of last year will have the country in deficit spending for the foreseeable future.

The democracy test is not whether we choose the Republicans, Democrats or third party choices, it is whether or not we can afford this White House's "guns and butter" economy. The last time we tried this it took two major recessions over 10 years to wring the hyperinflation out of the economy.

With the beginning of autumn, the test of the congressional elections will begin to get some attention. The flag waving and patriotism has yet to increase the rate of voting in this country.

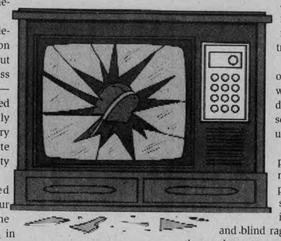
This president seems reluctant to ask us to sacrifice in these stressed times. His administration fought against fuel mileage legislation that would lessen our over-dependence on foreign oil imports from the Middle East. This would have shown the world that we would attempt to work toward alternative fuels and finally get off our oil addiction. Consumption seems to be the overall pre-election White House strategy. One wonders if this will change after this fall's election.

Real tragedy in real life

By Josh Fisher
Opinions Editor

Last Wednesday, I proclaimed my house downtown a "TV-free house" for the day, but my decree was quickly undermined when my roommates had the inane impulse to share their 8:46 a.m. minute of silence with the televised world.

I sat firmly in the kitchen crunching on my Cheerios loudly, unwilling to break my own minute of silence for worldwide victims of someone else's cause.



Now the maudlin celebration of 9/11 television events is almost over, but this trend with the mass media certainly continues—it has, after all, developed so steadily and persistently over the past half century that we have not quite woken up to the absurdity of it all.

Corporate-sponsored mental pollutants flood your brain every day, from the time your alarm sounds in the morning to the lurid glow of late-night television. In that same day 12 billion display ads, three million radio ads and more than 200,000 television commercials are pumped into the American collective unconscious.

This psychological subversion is almost impossible to escape, and it is no surprise that ordinary people feel the need to turn to the television for answers and clarity on 9/11's anniversary. There is certainly little doubt of the media's intent to leverage for their own interests the sentiments of gravity and maniacal patriotism culminating on this day in more rating-friendly footage of planes slamming into buildings and people falling to their deaths.

Perhaps it is appropriate to observe the anniversary of these horrific events in a manner similar to last year with a gigantic deluge of news coverage, corporate sponsors, special guests and endless tales of near misses.

But are we a society of people so completely detached from the natural world that we exist entrenched in television's fictitious and imaginative unreality?

In truth, most of us are fortunate enough to not know the horrible loss of a loved one, and we cannot beyond simple empathy. But Wednesday nevertheless offered us all the opportunity to reflect upon the future and past actions of humankind, to do more than wave a flag in the face of such an unbelievable tragedy.

Coming to an understanding of the violence and terror in the world certainly would not be so difficult if the coverage didn't seem like little more than an ultra-realistic action movie.

If we were really able to dispel this pervasive sense of numbness and disbelief, as a peaceful and compassionate society, we would not so willingly turn sorrow into bitterness and blind rage. Perhaps we would not feel the need to perpetuate unto innocent humans elsewhere the violence that the networks replay time and time again.

And perhaps if our psyches, our "selves," were expanded to include the outside world, the world beyond our televisions, our radios and our newspapers, then this raging destruction of fellow humans would be perceived as nothing less than self-destruction.

And perhaps if our psyches, our "selves," were expanded to include the outside world, the world beyond our televisions, our radios and our newspapers, then this raging destruction of fellow humans would be perceived as nothing less than self-destruction.

In my reflecting and even in the absence of mass media's powerful grip for the day, a quote by the famous author Arthur Koestler came to mind: "If one looks with a cold eye at the mess man has made of his history, it is difficult to avoid the conclusion that he has been afflicted by some built-in mental disorder which drives him towards self-destruction."

But then again, there is indeed a whole other world beyond the one on the screen.

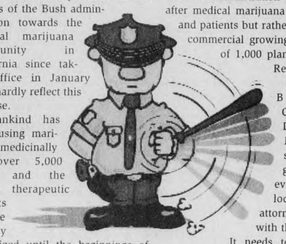
Medical marijuana raids defy reason and compassionate conservatism

By Tim Hinkle
Writer

Is it just me or has our president forgotten what it means to be a conservative? What, you decry? President George W. Bush not a conservative? Just hear me out.

During his campaign to become ruler of the United States, Bush, when asked about his stance on medical uses of marijuana, said that he believed it should be up to the states to decide.

Now, we generally don't hold our politicians to the trite lies they tell us on the campaign trail in order to get elected, but Bush's answer is patently conservative in that it reflects the traditional doctrine of state over federal control on many issues. So we might actually expect Bush to hold to this promise. But the actions of the Bush administration towards the medical marijuana community in California since taking office in January 2001 hardly reflect this promise.



Mankind has been using marijuana medicinally for over 5,000 years and the drug's therapeutic benefits were widely recognized until the beginnings of marijuana prohibition in 1937. These benefits include "pain relief particularly of neuropathic pain (pain from nerve damage)—nausea, spasticity, glaucoma and movement disorders. Marijuana is also a powerful appetite stimulant, specifically for patients suffering from HIV, the AIDS wasting syndrome or dementia."

Marijuana prohibition makes no exception for the medical use of marijuana. This all changed in 1996 when California voters passed Proposition 215 allowing doctors to prescribe marijuana to patients whom they believe would benefit from it. Since then, nine other states have passed laws allowing for the medical use of cannabis.

Still, federal laws have not budged on the issue, even after the Drug Enforcement Agency (DEA) ignored its own research, which found that marijuana's medical effectiveness and lack of serious health risks warranted a radical reevaluation of marijuana prohibition.

Under former President Bill Clinton, the federal government did not attempt to intrude on state law. But under Bush, an ultra-conservative president, the DEA and the FBI have trampled California state law and threw out past DEA guidelines for busting marijuana growing operations.

DEA Administrator Asa Hutchinson has repeatedly stated that his administration does not go after medical marijuana distributors and patients but rather large-scale commercial growing operations of 1,000 plants or more. Recently, the DEA raided Butte County's Diane Monson's six-plant garden, even after her local district attorney pleaded with them not to.

It needs to be made clear that this government harassment of a state- sponsored institution goes beyond the drug war fervor that our main political parties are so deeply entrenched in.

In an age where law enforcement is stretched thin by the pervasive threat of terrorism, why is our government wasting precious resources in raids like the one on Santa Cruz's Wo/Men's Alliance for Medical Marijuana (WAMM)? In the early hours of Sept. 5, dozens of assault rifle-toting federal agents broke into WAMM's collective garden, arresting founders Valerie and Michael Corral and tearing down 130 plants destined to relieve the suffering of dying American citizens.

This raid was not on a hardened criminal growing operation somehow funneling its funds to al-Qaida, but rather a group of 238 people all suffering from debilitating diseases, 80 percent of which are terminal. The club operated will full public disclosure and in complete compliance with local regulations.

"It's just absolutely loathsome to me that federal money, energy and staff time would be used to harass people like this," Vice Mayor Emily Reilly said. If you take into account that the Corrals were never even charged with a crime, you begin to see a pattern of federal harassment of the voter-approved medical marijuana system of California. With the concerns of terrorism and real drug problems like methamphetamines and heroin, why is Bush wasting our scarce and finite resources to go after AIDS patients and the people who help to relieve their suffering?

Is this what is meant by "compassionate conservatism"? The Bush administration gives a new definition to terrorism.

I hope that you are as appalled at the actions of our government against the sick and dying in the state of California as I am. Fortunately, there are some people who are working to combat this tyranny.

The Santa Cruz City Council has decided to show its support for the WAMM cooperative by organizing a medical pot giveaway at the Santa Cruz City Hall on Tuesday Sept. 17. You can write to your state representative expressing your outrage at this egregious act of federal interference in state matters and tell them to support HR 2592 or the States' Rights to Medical Marijuana Act.

Regardless of where you stand on this issue, the conflicts between federal and state law must be clarified because real people are suffering and being put in cages for using a potentially life saving medicine.

Bush encourages General Assembly to back war

The president's speech calls doubtful members of U.S. Congress and the U.N. General Assembly to support a war in Iraq

By Charles Mitchell
Senior Writer

President George W. Bush presented a tersely worded speech to the United Nations General Assembly, urging it to support his administration's Iraq policy on Sept. 12, one day after the anniversary of the attacks on America. The speech was, according to observers, also directed at the U.S. Congress, which has not endorsed the president's push to topple Iraqi president Saddam Hussein's regime.

Responding to criticism that he had yet to "make the case" for an invasion of Iraq, Bush enumerated a litany of offenses the Hussein regime has committed against the international community and the Iraqi people. Minutes after U.N. Secretary-General Kofi Annan warned the United States not to act alone against Saddam, the American president listed U.N. resolution after resolution that the Iraqi dictator has violated.

Bush told the assembled delegates that they needed to enforce these resolutions and that, if they did not, the United States would. He claimed that if the United Nations stood by while Iraq defied its will, it would become irrelevant like its predecessor, the League of Nations.

The 25-minute speech was distinct from the president's Sept. 11 addresses in that it was interrupted by applause only once—when he announced that the United States would rejoin the U.N. Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization. Television cameras frequently panned to the Iraqi delegation, whose members did not look pleased, and to the American table, where the dovish Secretary of State Colin Powell was on hand.

A news ticker in Times Square reports Bush's comments on Iraq. The president met with the U.N. General Assembly in New York on Sept. 12 to discuss monitoring weapons in Iraq.

Bush pointed out the promises Hussein made, and has subsequently broken, after being defeated in the 1991 Persian Gulf War by a United Nations-sponsored, United States.-led international coalition. He also emphasized the threat Hussein poses to the international community, by allegedly working to acquire chemical, biological and nuclear weapons, and to his own people, against many of whom he has not hesitated to use poisonous gas.

The president acknowledged that he did not have proof of Hussein's possession of nuclear weapons, but he said that "the first time we may be completely certain he has a nuclear weapon is when, God forbid, he uses one." Bush challenged his audience to aid in ensuring that day never comes.

Although polls show about two-thirds of Americans support a regime change in Iraq, experts forecast that Bush may have a tough sell on his hands on Capitol Hill, especially in the Democratic-controlled Senate.

House Majority Leader Dick Armey, a staunchly conservative Republican from Texas, has questioned the president's approach, as has Sen. Chuck Hagel (R-Neb.), a Vietnam veteran. Bush has said that he will ask Congress for approval for action against Iraq, but how much authority he is given—if any—depends very much on how forcefully he makes his case in the coming days and weeks. As he said in his speech, the Iraqi dictator has "days and weeks," not years and months, to comply with U.N. resolutions and his own previous promises.

Executive compensation scrutinized

Recent financial scandals spark investigation of several U.S. corporations

By Jim Leahy
Senior Writer

When a person is installed as a major executive at a U.S. corporation, he or she is entitled to many privileges. As this summer's financial scandals and other business problems have illustrated, sometimes those may include large compensation packages, corporate loans that might be forgiven, gifts and often large severance packages. The list of executives that received such job benefits is very long and now includes General Electric's (GE) retired CEO Jack Welch.

Welch directed GE until last September, ending a run at the helm of the company that began in 1982 (and employment at the company for a total of 41 years). Well-known as one of history's best CEOs, Welch oversaw the growth of GE as it became a company with over 300,000 employees and yearly revenues over $120 billion. Despite all this, there has been much debate over his now-public retirement package.

When his wife Jane Welch filed for divorce, the papers included many details of his retirement benefits. According to The Washington Post on Sept. 7, they included floor-level tickets to New York Knicks home games; a box at the Metropolitan Opera; a skybox at Fenway Park; a box behind the dugout at Yankee Stadium; VIP seating for Wimbledon, the U.S. Open and the French Open; country club dues and initiation fees at Augusta National. In addition, Welch will be able to use the company jets and have other expenses paid by the company.

According to TheStreet.com, the Securities and Exchange Commission has launched an informal inquiry into the agreements between GE and Welch. The announcement came one day after the company decided to restructure the retirement contract. Now, Welch will only receive an office and administrative staff. This is on top of his retirement pay.

Nevertheless, Welch is taking the offensive in telling the public about his contract and the decision to change it. In a Sept. 16 letter to The Wall Street Journal, Welch defended the company's actions:

"The world has changed during the past year. Reports of corporate malfeasance fill the media, as several companies and executives stand accused of betraying their shareholders ... perception matters ... I will pay the costs for my use of all other facilities and services provided by GE such as planes and the company apartment. There will be no cost to GE or its shareholders for my use of these services."

Despite all of this commotion surrounding Welch, he is not the only CEO to come under fire for his use of company resources. The two standouts are the Rigas family, which owns a controlling interest in Adelphia Communications, and former Tyco International CEO Dennis Kozlowski.

The Rigas family, according to The Boston Globe, used Adelphia as their personal piggy bank, citing that, "they took $241 million to pay off personal loans." They also "used Adelphia funds to buy a $13 million golf course near the company's Coudersport, Pa., headquarters, a Pennsylvania lumber operation and luxury condominiums in New York, Colorado and Mexico."

John Rigas and his sons, Michael and Timothy, were arrested in July on charges that include bank fraud, securities fraud, wire fraud and conspiracy. Their company had its stock removed from the NASDAQ and has since filed for bankruptcy.

Dennis Kozlowski has the best story of the summer. In June, he was arrested and indicted on charges of evading income taxes. According to The New York Times, Kozlowski saved $1 million on a $13 million art purchase. Further accusations against Kozlowski include getting personal loans from Tyco that were never repaid, mingling personal and corporate donations and other real estate transactions that were beneficial to him.

A report on TheStreet.com said Tyco also had a lenient employee loan program that Kozlowski accepted. "Tyco employees tapped the loan program to pay taxes on stock purchases and relocate to homes near the company's offices in Manhattan. Kozlowski, who was also indicted on sales tax-evasion charges in June, then waived his staff's responsibility to repay the loan," the report said.

High-profile lawyer David Boies, known most recently for his prosecution of the Microsoft Corporation, is leading the investigation of Kozlowski for Tyco. The company is looking for its money and it is suing Kozlowski and several other executives in order to retrieve the money. On Sept. 17, the company filed an 8-K with the SEC to disclose the findings of the investigation.

The report, available at http://www.sec.gov, details unauthorized interest-free loans to and by Kozlowski from Tyco that totaled more than $61 million. There were also loan forgiveness payments to Kozlowski that totaled almost $33 million, other bonus payments and a $445 pincushion for his Fifth Avenue apartment in New York City. The company is alleging that Kozlowski and other key executives took hundreds of millions of dollars during their tenure.

Executive compensation has long remained behind closed doors at most U.S. corporations. However, recent financial scandals have shed some light on how companies take care of their executives, both while they are employed and after they retire. Welch is only the latest CEO to come under fire. It remains to be seen how his case will come out, but the nature of compensation is changing across the business landscape.

Conservative challenger dances to far right in final days of German campaign

By Gretchen Schrock
Business and Politics Editor

A few musical notes remain to be played in the national election waltz. Edmund Stoiber, one of the principal performers, has miscalculated the rhythmic beats of the German public and has taken one extra step in order to compensate for his less than captivating political dancing.

Behind in the opinion polls regarding the national elections on Sunday, Stoiber, the Bavarian conservative challenger to Gerhard Schröder's Social Democratic government, has momentarily dazzled his audience with some audacious movements towards the right. The most notable of these campaign leaps was the assertion that the policies of the Schröder government were undermining national security and the economic health of Germany by allowing too many immigrants into the country.

The infamous choreographers of recent Austrian and French political spectacles must have taught Stoiber that the anti-immigration routine will captivate the judges and lead only to victory in the campaign dance competition.

Stoiber wants to abolish recently passed government reform designed to open Germany to qualified immigrants with needed skills. Furthermore, Stoiber desires the deportation of any foreigner sentenced to prison for more than two years and limits on the residence permits of immigrants on welfare.

Guenther Beckstein, Stoiber's spokesman on interior affairs and partner in campaign dancing, explained in a Washington Post article that a conservative government under Stoiber's leadership would crack down on the abuse of asylum ensuring that new immigrants contribute to the cost of integration and language courses.

Why does Stoiber believe that this right-leaning campaign platform will save his uninspiring performance from low scores by the voting judges? The average voter, in his view, is concerned about the economic implications of having 7.3 million foreigners already living inside German borders and four million unemployed Germans desperately seeking work. In other words, the issue of unemployment is simply caused by immigrants stealing decent jobs from hard-working, intelligent Germans.

"When there are more than four million jobless," Stoiber said, "then it is irresponsible to open up the job market to everyone."

The conservative belief that immigration means economic catastrophe for Germany if it welcomes such an occurrence is significantly flawed. According to Deustche Bank statistics obtained by The New York Times, Germany's population could fall from 82 million to 65 million in 50 years with the workforce shrinking by 27 percent to 30 million by 2040. A large decrease in the workforce, and in the population as a whole, might result in lowering productivity, declining exports, a smaller internal market and decreased government tax revenue, as well as slowed economic growth. Deutsche Bank suggests that allowing more immigration (about 500,000 immigrants a year) would be needed to prevent a serious decline in the working-age population and maintain the current economic prosperity.

One might also explore the possibility that immigrants are not denying Germany's unemployed citizens well-paying and rewarding jobs, but are instead fulfilling tasks that are unwanted and perceived as menial, yet essential, to the successful functioning of the economy. The average German may be overeducated or unwilling to perform these supposedly degrading jobs, preferring to remain unemployed. This situation also exists in the United States, where immigrants are assuming relatively low-wage, but economically necessary, positions because most Americans refuse to take them.

When the discerning judges of political artistry demanded an intricate ballet that included plausible steps for economic progress, Stoiber produced a fumbling jig of sorts. Rather than propose innovative solutions to the problem of German unemployment, like attracting new business or increasing labor flexibility, that would have evolved into a smash hit, he retreated to the consistently running, boring show of anti-immigration politics.

"It is a desperate attempt to find a topic with which one can arouse emotions, but I think the public will see through it," Schrödersaid in his labeling of the conservative strategy as a combination of "helplessness and aggressiveness," according to a New York Times article.

Will Stoiber's nationalist and anti-immigration agenda be persuasive enough to fill the required seats in his auditorium of supporters? One can only hope that the many advertisements of his erratic dance to the right will not be so enticing to German voters on Sunday that they buy tickets to his unoriginal show.

Holy Cross tops Bison 1-0

The Bison dropped an overtime heartbreaker to division rival Holy Cross but rebounded to defeat No. 18 Pittsburgh 1-0

The men's soccer team, despite a valiant effort, fell to Holy Cross on Saturday, Sept. 14. The match against the Crusaders was Bucknell's first Patriot League game of the season.

"I was disappointed in the result, but not in our effort. We went on the road and played well enough to win, but it just was not our day," Head Coach Brendan Nash said. "All Patriot League games are close games. Sometimes when you feel like you deserved to win, you do not. Saturday was a case of us just not getting the win."

The Bison dominated the game, but failed to capitalize on all their scoring chances. The Orange and Blue thought that they had clinched the win with senior Nick Taylor's goal with 20 seconds left in the match. The referee, however, called it back due to a push by Taylor. At the end of 90 minutes the game remained scoreless, sending it into overtime. Just over three minutes into overtime, the Crusader's Matt Ney volleyed a cross past Bucknell's goalkeeper, Adam Edwards '06, to steal the win.

"We played and deserved to win, but unfortunately the score did not show that," Elliot Maruffi-Cowley '03 said.

"We will definitely use that loss to motivate us for the rest of the season," Greg Buzzell '05 said.

The motivation was evident as Bucknell bounced back from the devastating loss against Holy Cross to beat 18th-ranked University of Pittsburgh this past Monday. The win goes down in the history books as the soccer program's third defeat over a nationally-ranked team. The second defeat was recorded in the 2000 season, after the Bison upset eighth-ranked South Carolina.

Both teams displayed sheer talent and almost professional soccer in the first half. The Bison wove the ball in and out of the Panther's squad, only to have Pitt reciprocate the Bison efforts. The play of the two teams proved to be indistinguishable, as both squads produced an ample amount of shots. Neither team could find a way to surmount the other's efforts. As a result, the first half remained scoreless.

The second half, however, was a different story. The Orange and Blue exploded out onto the field to start the remaining 45 minutes. The burning desire to win was evident in their energetic play, as the Bison's offense attacked the goal with a rapid-fire round.

One of those shots, just two minutes into the second half of the game, smacked off a Pitt defender who was called for a hand ball on the goal line. John Hemmert '05 took the penalty kick. The Panther's goalkeeper barely moved, as Hemmert rifled the ball into the upper 90 of the goal.

For the remainder of the game, the Bison protected their lead with everything that they had. The men were sacrificing their bodies to prevent the ball from crossing the goal line. Alex Far '05 and the rest of the defense executed diving headers to clear the ball out of the box.

The offensive effort was identical to the defense, as they continued to charge the net. In the end, Bucknell's fervor shut out nationally-ranked Pittsburgh 1-0.

"Pitt was ranked second in our region and 18th nationally. It was a great feeling to beat a nationally-ranked program. We definitely deserved to win, but we still have more work to do to get ready for everyone else," Buzzell said.

The Bison match up with Colgate on Saturday, Sept. 21 for their second Patriot League game of the season. The game will be played at home on the West Fields at 2 p.m.

The victory over Pittsburgh is only the Bison's third victory over a nationally-ranked program since 1974.

Football squad travels to Calif.

By Cory Nadler
Senior Writer

The Bucknell football team lost its second straight game in a devastating 23-22 double overtime loss to St. Mary's in California on Saturday. This was the Gaels' first victory in four games against the Bison.

The Bison found themselves down early again this week. After both teams traded punts, the Gaels were able to put the ball in the end zone at the end of the first quarter. After a six-play, 49-yard drive, St. Mary's took a 7-0 lead with 3:21 remaining in the first period.

On their first possession of the second quarter, Bison quarterback Todd Wenrich '03, was sacked in the end zone for a safety. The Gaels held on to their 9-0 lead until the middle of the period. Following a fumble recovery by Peter Christathakis '03, the Bison moved the ball into St. Mary's territory, and Chris Lundberg '03 hit the first of his

Volleyball evens record at 5-5

Trapasso twins dominate, lead team at Bull Run Inn-vitational

After an impressive effort in the Bull Run Inn-vitational, the Bison women's volleyball team is poised to begin the Patriot League season with a solid record of 5-5.

The Bison reached the .500 mark in the tournament due to the exceptional play from Breean Trapasso '04, Jennifer Wrigley '03, Brandi Trapasso '04 and Chelsea Anderson '06.

Bucknell did not walk away with the tournament title, but the ladies is still quite proud of its showing.

"Overall I'm pleased with our efforts this weekend. We saw great leadership and aggressiveness from our upperclassmen and we feel that playing strong competition early in the season will better prepare us for our Patriot League opponents," Head Coach Cindy Opalski said.

In the first match, Bucknell fell to the University at Albany in four games. The Bison lost the first game 30-14 and came out strong in the second game, but they ultimately fell short, losing a close 30-28. The Bison were victorious in the third game with a 30-22 win, but were unable to win the fourth game of the evening.

On Saturday, the Bison started the day off with a 3-0 win over Quinnipiac. Bucknell won 30-24, 30-22 and 30-24. The Bison had outstanding play from Brandi Trapasso,

Bison defense dominates again

Sacred Heart fails to score and the Bison record fourth shutout, securing the Governor's Cup Tournament win

By Dave Cohen
Senior Writer

The Bucknell women's soccer team claimed first place at the Governor's Cup Tournament, which began on Sept. 14 at the University of Albany. It was the defense once again that proved to be a staple for the Bison, who did not allow a goal all weekend long. The team has tallied a total of four shutouts this season over a span of six games.

On Sept. 14, Bucknell attempted eight shots and connected on one, which was all the squad needed against Sacred Heart. Tara Utchel '03 proved to be the offensive hero for the day by scoring the lone goal, which was unassisted at the 48:22 mark of the second half. According to Utchel, the offense has been quite appreciative of the defense, allowing minimal offensive production to be sufficient. She also feels there are plenty of viable scoring options on the team and that the pressure does not lie on her.

Sacred Heart	0

"Our defense is solid, but we have a problem of scoring this year," Utchel said. "We have been practicing going to the net hard at practice, but it has been a struggle. It is nice to know that one goal can be enough though. I don't feel pressure to provide the offense, but I am responsible for pumping the team up and getting us ready to play. I am not the only person who can score. We don't rely on one person, we just create opportunities and people are stepping up."

Goalie Laurie Purse '03, who scored her first career goal last week against Howard, began her outstanding weekend by saving six for the game. She credits the team's defense and the defensive players' work ethic for her success.

"The defense was really strong and consistent this weekend," Purse said. "They never let down. I felt like this was one of my better weekends. When I see my teammates work really hard at the top, it inspires me to make sure that I do whatever it takes to stop the ball."

On Sept. 15, Purse led the Bison to victory once again with her third shutout of the week. It was the defense that again proved its prowess against Long Island, as it allowed Purse to face just eight shots from the opponent. Purse saved four of them, two of which were crucial.

> "[The defense] never let down. I felt like this was one of my better weekends. When I see my teammates work really hard at the top it inspires me to make sure that I do whatever it takes to stop the ball."
> —Laurie Purse '03

The only goal of the afternoon was unassisted and knocked in by Meaghan Ferris '06, 22 minutes into the game. She was amazed that she was able to provide the ultimate game winning goal, considering it was her first game playing midfield.

"I was really shocked," Ferris said. "It was really exciting. I played midfield for the first time Sunday and I didn't expect to score. I knew that I could play the position because I played it prior to college, but I never expected to play the position in college. I have more confidence now than I did before the game."

The Bison, who were victorious by the score of 1-0, captured the tournament title with the victory. The Orange and Blue have knocked off two 2001 conference champions so far this season, Sacred Heart last weekend and Marist on Sept. 8. The team improved to 5-1, 0-0 after capturing the weekend championship.

Matt Vanaskie —The Bucknellian

During last weeks game sophomore Alison Cooper helped control the tempo and kept Marist scoreless in their 1-0 victory.

NFL Predictions

This column is dedicated to SuperFan No. 5…yeah that's you Birds Fan!

St. Louis (0-2) at Tampa Bay (1-1)

The slow start by the Rams is probably the biggest surprise of this season and everyone's asking, "Have teams finally figured out how to stop the once-potent Rams offense?" Tampa Bay's defense is certainly strong, which does not look good for St. Louis. But Tampa Bay did not score an offensive touchdown last week, a luxury they won't be able to afford even against this Rams defense. The Rams offense is due for a breakout game, so I'm picking Faulk & Co.

Buffalo (1-1) at Denver (2-0)

Each of Buffalo's first two games have gone into overtime, while the Broncos have beaten two of last season's best offensive teams easily. The Broncos defense has been particularly strong, and best of all Griese seems to have settled down finally. The Bills defense will be severely tested … and ultimately beaten this week. The Broncos, without a doubt, have the best group of running backs in the league and that will be the major deciding factor in Denver's victory.

San Diego (2-0) at Arizona (1-1)

Granted the Chargers have been blessed with an easy early season schedule, but they have utterly dominated their opponents and are the only team to not give up a touchdown yet this season. Finally, San Diego has found some offensive power to compliment its strong defense. Brees is playing fantastic under Flutie's tutelage and Tomlinson has picked up where he left off. The Cardinals' offensive line needs to be ready for a Chargers defense that has racked up 13 sacks in two games. No matter what, Arizona is going to start 0-1 at home this season.

Green Bay (1-1) at Detroit (0-2)

Detroit is the worst team in every possible category, amassing a total of 379 yards on offense in two games. Drew Bledsoe passed for 460 against Minnesota this week. Furthermore, the defense has allowed an average of 40 points a game. This is great news for Favre and the Packers, considering their own lackluster defense. However, they still have one of the better offenses in the league. Cheese Heads should enjoy watching a rout as Detroit drops its third in a row.

Washington (1-1) at San Francisco (1-1)

This game pits two open air passing attack teams against one other. The 49ers look nothing like the Super Bowl contenders they were thought to be, although they have played two very tough defensive teams. The Redskins offense was dominated last Monday night. Maybe Washington's best offensive strategy would be to turn to Davis and the running game to lead them. Niners will win this one pretty easily.

Men place first at Army

Cecily Cairns—The Bucknellian

At the Penn State's Spiked Shoe Meet the men's team finished third out of a total of 20 teams, while the women came in second out of 17 teams.

By Ashley Hall
Writer

The Bison cross country teams competed in the Army Invitational at West Point, N.Y., on Sept.14 The men's team finished first ahead of Cornell and Patriot League foes Army. The women's team crossed the finish line in third place.

The men's team entered 22 members in the meet. Bucknell put four men in the top 10 by sweeping the top three positions and claiming the 10th. Greg Costello '03 finished first with a time of 26 minutes, 18 seconds followed by Bryan Johnston '03 and Nick Mousetis '04, who were within a second of each other at 26:25.00 and 26:26.00. Wes Reinhardt '04 finished 10th with a time of 27:00.00, with Stephen Schaefer '04 directly behind at 27:01.00.

"I was very pleased with the outcome of the meet at Army," Johnston said. "Anytime your team can take the top three places in a meet against good competition, you can't help but feel reassurance that your training is taking you to the level you need to be."

"I think beating Army on their home course gave our team a good confidence boost and showed us that we do have the talent to be the Patriot League Champions this year. However, Patriots are far away and we can't let up at all," Johnston said. "Army always has a solid team at the league meet and American University will also be thrown into the mix. We still have some work to do as a team, but I look forward to a very competitive race come Nov. 2."

"We're all real excited about the rest of the season. Most of our runners from last year have returned, so we have a lot more depth and experience," Reinhardt said. "Overall, I think we're a stronger, better team than at this point last season."

The women's team fell behind first-place Cornell and followed Army by only three points. Theresa Dennis '03 placed third overall with a time of 23:34.00 for the women's 6K course. Still in the top 10 was Kayla Halloran '06 who finished with a time of 24:04.00. Alison Cole '06 came in 11th with a time of 24:06.00. There were 18 runners for the Bison women.

"It's been a blast so far this season," Halloran said. "I think if we keep up the training we are doing then we can definitely beat Army come November."

In two weeks, both teams will split their squads to travel to the Great American Cross Country Classic on Sept.27 and the Messiah College Invitational on Sept. 28.

How the mighty have fallen

Warner and the Rams are off to a rough start, going 0-4 in the preseason and starting the regular season 0-2.

So you were studying for that chemistry test or pulling an all-nighter watching a movie with that special someone. You missed out on the week in sports and you don't know what to do! Fear not, I have the answers to your burning questions! I'll dig into some of the more interesting events of the past week in the world of sports. And ladies, especially, read my article, use some of these topics in conversation with an "interest" and watch your love life increase fourfold! Warning: Results may vary. Let's take a look back at what was the week in sports.

To the gridiron! A few weeks back, I predicted that the Rams would win the Super Bowl this year. I'm still sticking with my initial analysis, but have you seen the Rams of late? Starting off this season 0-2, many questions have been raised in St. Louis. Arguably the most explosive team in all of football, the current Rams on-the-field production should receive a "G" rating on the big screen thus far. Kurt Warner's game can best be described as the antithesis to the music group *NSync, say, Out Sync!

"[The Rams] have issues, but I don't expect them to last. Once they get it right, they will be explosive again. And they still have the best personnel in the NFL," said Sean Salisbury, a writer for ESPN.com.

Since the leader of a football team is a quarterback, if he is not pulling his weight the team will falter. Just look at the Dallas Cowboys and quarterback Quincy Carter. In the first game of the season, Quincy throws multiple interceptions and the 'Boys lose to an expansion team. The next week he follows with two touchdown passes to lead the Cowboys against a tough Titans team.

Bringing it back to St. Louis, I remind you that the Rams went 0-4 in the preseason, so they haven't seen a win since wintertime. The Rams need to get back to their bread and butter plays of handing the ball off to Marshall Faulk. Averaging only 22 carries a game when shades of the mid-30s were not inconceivable a year prior, Faulk needs a more prominent role.

You've all seen those Campbell's soups commercials with the pro-football players advertising, right? Well, last year Kurt Warner and Terrell Davis, running back for the Broncos, both had their own commercials. The former has looked shaky of late and the latter retired due to injuries. Which leads to the question, what exactly do "they" put in Campbell's soup anyway?

Let's turn our attention to a lady that has all the right moves on and off the tennis court! Anna Kournikova is a tennis player who gets newsprint even when she fails to win a tournament (as in last week's loss in the Shanghai Open). Just why is that? I have no idea, but for some reason she made it into another newspaper!

Penn State football is back! Last Saturday the Nittany Lions demolished a solid seventh-ranked Nebraska team 40-7. In front of a record crowd of 110,753, and more watching on television, Joe Paterno orchestrated a brilliant game plan that had the Cornhuskers dazed and confused all night. Leading the way was wide receiver Bryant Johnson, who had eight receptions for 147 yards.

"I'm not the smartest guy in the world, but I'm smart enough to know when you've got a kid like Robinson, you put him in the game," Paterno said.

I think Joe is underestimating his "know-how." With 329 career college football wins, Joe is No. 1 on the all-time wins list.

Moving right along! Zoom Zoom Zoom … 27 year-old American Tim Montgomery broke the world record in the 100-meter dash this past week with a chilling 9.78-second run. Montgomery's time was .001 faster than previous record holder Maurice Greene. With this latest achievement Tim has mentioned that he has his sights set on a new, more challenging goal of simulating being on time to an uphill class from downhill campus right here at the University! It's so good to be in Roberts.

On a somber note, hall-of-fame quarterback Johnny Unitas, who led the Baltimore Colts to three NFL championships in the 50s to 70s, has passed away at the age of 69.

"He was mythic," Paul Tagliabue, commissioner of football said. "He symbolizes football and, more importantly, he symbolizes leadership."

Unitas's resume included 22 NFL passing records, MVP honors three times and selection for the Pro Bowl 10 times.

As this article nears its conclusion, we retire with 40-year-old Patrick Ewing and his official announcement of to end his illustrious career in the NBA. Retiring after 17 seasons, 15 of which he stirred up the New York Knicks' crowd (Spike Lee included), Ewing might be best remembered by the one achievement that was too elusive to find—a championship ring. Alas, I don't buy into that "hoopla" and I, for one, will stick up for the guy. If I learned anything from sports it's that one person does not make a team. It hasn't before, won't be in my lifetime and beyond. Ewing can't be held accountable for a lackluster team. He accumulated 24,815 points and 11,606 rebounds, which should solidify his hall of fame position.

"It's time to move on. It was a great ride," Ewing said.

Move on he has, with Ewing now joining forces with longtime opponent Michael Jordan on with the Washington Wizards as an assistant coach.

Class dismissed, go out and play!

A tribute to a departed friend: Johnny Unitas

It didn't take me long to decide what I ought to write this week's column about. I knew it as soon as I saw the news emblazoned upon its little gray text box, snuggled in the upper right-hand corner of ESPN.com's front page, right below the vexatious flashing advertisement that graces the Web site in one form or another every day. Johnny Unitas had died of a heart attack. The 69-year-old legend had been working out at a physical therapy center near Baltimore and, just like that, he was gone.

Almost as fast as "Johnny U" had departed, the sportswriters saw to it that he was given a send-off befitting a king—he was, after all, a king. Wielding their most potent superlatives, their most eloquent goodbyes and their artillery of anecdotes, columnists from sports publications all around the nation penned off a daunting slew of personal eulogies for the gutsy quarterback.

By now it seems as though there is little I can say that hasn't already been said. After all, I don't really have the historical authority to express the significance of this star's departure.

The NFL and its enthusiasts are mourning the death of Johnny Unitas.

I wasn't around in 1955 when the Pittsburgh Steelers selected a scrawny quarterback from Louisville in the ninth round, or when they sent him packing before he even had a chance to throw a pass in exhibition play. I wasn't there to doubt the Baltimore Colts when they took a gamble on this kid, who everyone else had said was not big enough, not smart enough and not quick enough.

I can't sit back and chuckle about memories of his first two plays as a starting quarterback—an interception that came all the way back for a score and a bungled handoff that was recovered by the opponent.

I can't fairly reflect on his mindboggling streak of 47 straight games with a touchdown pass; I've never even seen anything close to it.

I wasn't parked in front of a little black-and-white television in 1958 when "Mr. Football" led his Colts on a two-minute, 73-yard journey that set up the NFL's first sudden-death overtime, or when he marched his gang downfield again to win that game, which would be anointed as "the greatest game ever played." Nor was I there in the twilight of his career, when he desperately conjured up the same magic—albeit futilely—as he subbed for Earl Morrell in the late minutes of Super Bowl III and led the Colts on their only scoring drive.

I never got to see the way he stoically neglected to heed the deluge of injuries and battle scars that constantly bestrode his accomplishments.

I thought at one point that it would be safe to assume that everything I know about Unitas, I know from other people's stories, from ESPN Classic or from NFL Films. But perhaps that isn't entirely true. I am fortunate enough to have one firsthand memory of Unitas—one miniscule, fleeting moment in his incredible lifetime.

It was at the 1999 Philadelphia SportsFest, a massive exposition for sports card dealers and memorabilia enthusiasts that the city used to host every year. Unitas headed an impressive roster of autograph guests and for $45, I bought an 8-by-10 and a ticket that would allow me to wait in line for an hour to get the chance to stand in front of a legend and watch him sign his name across the photo.

When my weary legs finally neared the front of the line, I could see Unitas above the heads of the grappling crowd in front of me. The table he was seated at was positioned way above the eye level of those standing below, like a pedestal. He'd take a jersey or a football, sign it and then pass it back to the proud ticket-holder below.

He wasn't really the "Johnny U" I had expected. I don't know why, but part of me thought I'd see the same guy that was pictured in my photo—same crew cut, black high tops and youthful athleticism. It never occurred to me that guys like that got old. But it was clear to me that time hadn't touched the great presence he had.

He smiled at me, reached down and took my photo, signed it and then handed it back. I was too awestruck to do anything but smile back meekly and say thank you. It was just one of the probably infinite number of thank yous that he heard in his 69 years, but perhaps it's just something that can't be said enough.

So I'll throw this memory, this tribute, into the vast compilation of eulogies and nostalgic laments of his passing. Maybe I'm not as wise, or as experienced, or as elegantly profound as the minions of writers who can boast a real historical appreciation of sports, but I can still say thank you.

Thank you for the autograph. Thank you for the smile. Thank you for the highlights I've seen on NFL Films, the stories I've read and the impact I know you've had on every football game I've ever watched and every quarterback I've ever loved.

Thanks, Johnny, for making this sport everything it is supposed to be.

Deconstructing "the fan"

To all of the baseball fans whose teams rarely have successful seasons, I say, "Let's go Yankees!" To all of the snobby fans who think people have to prove themselves deserving of fan status, I say, "Let's go Yankees!" Yes, that's right; I have the same retort for everyone who feels the need to squash enthusiasts of America's national pastime. My chorus will not change because, well, Yanks rule and Fanists, those elitist haters of bandwagon fans, drool.

Fanists think trivia determines fan status—know the ERA of your team's pitcher or be gone. If you don't know about trades before they happen, you need not apply. You're no Fanist unless you've missed a morning class because you were up late trading for your fantasy baseball team. Fanists bring an unparalleled fervor to Fandom, and Yankee fans are often the target of their pent-up aggression.

The Yankees and their fans are the epitome of everything Fanists hate, though you don't have to be a Fanist to dislike the Yanks. The argument goes that the Yankees buy World Series rings with the biggest payroll in the league. Yet the archrival Red Sox have the next highest payroll and can't seem to come in first. Ditto the Orioles, who have had two disastrous seasons in spite of an outrageously high-paid squad.

What critics overlook is that Yankee management has one of the best minor-league systems in baseball. They groom excellent players in their farm system who either eventually play for them or serve as trading chips. Success breeds high attendance, unless you live in Montreal, which means Yankee profits. Nonetheless, the Yanks' competitive advantage in the payroll race does not ensure wins. It takes more than money to create a World Series-caliber team, though that doesn't stop the Fanists from complaining. Know what I say? "Let's go Yankees!"

When the Patriots celebrated their Super Bowl win, one player chanted, "The Yankees suck," to the crowd's delight. Instead of screaming, "The Pats Rule," he incited fans with the anti-Yankee mantra of perennial losers. Get a life. Fanists target Yankee fans because their team wins. Fanists are a jealous group, easily annoyed by a population of mostly loud New Yorkers bragging about their team's standings. Many Fanists and fans cheered on Arizona during the 2001 World Series, bonding over a common Yankee hatred. America likes to root for the underdog.

The problem with Fanists criticizing bandwagon fans among us is that they're leeching some of baseball's fun. Baseball is a game; treat it as such. Sleep with pictures of Bob Costas under your pillows, Fanists, but don't complain when the average fan noshes on 6-dollar Cracker Jacks instead of calculating changes in batting averages between innings. Don't degrade or stifle the joy of the everyman fan. What's most important should be that there are people who care about watching professionals play ball. It takes all types of fans to support the game.

Rachel Laskow—The Bucknellian

Fanists think they top Fandom's social order, followed by fans and then the bandwagon fans, who cheer around September when the season is heating up and the World Series is in sight. Yankee fans are a Fandom subset just above these odious fair-weather fans, revered among their ranks, yet blacklisted by the other fan groups. Yankee fans can't help payroll inequity. Don't condemn Yankee fans because their team actually wins.

No one echelon of Fandom is wrong. Yearlong baseball addicts may look down upon bandwagon fans; however, without investment in any particular team, it can be fun to root for the winning team, the home team or the team with the snazziest uniform. Netted down, the sole requisite for being a fan is enthusiasm, of which Yankee fans have all degrees.

Don't get me wrong—I'm not an anti-Fanist. Relish in your place atop Fandom's hierarchical system of who's the biggest geek of arcane statistics. I'm saying that Fanists should acknowledge the legitimacy of other strata. Live merrily by your ridiculous Fanist Rules of Engagement and, by all means, root for the Yankees. Whatever you do, don't use your Fandom zeal to suppress those down below. There are more of us and we can be louder and more obnoxious, especially if we're New Yorkers.

There are larger problems in baseball than fan squabbling though. This year, the All-Star Game ended in a tie because both teams ran out of pitchers. Even Fanists would probably admit that baseball repeatedly proves it doesn't care about the everyday people who make its payroll possible. Constant fear of a World Series-threatening strike marred this season. The owners and players showed little respect for the game or the fans before their last-minute settlement. With the integral players of this drama so insensitive to fans' desires, perhaps we should band together in our love for the game.

Whereas strikes turn fans off baseball, the Yankees bring fans together. The famous pinstripes bind not only fans, but also the haters of all things Yankee. I respect the hatred factor in the life of a fan. In fact, defining the line between a bandwagon cheerleader and a true fan is hatred for the team that threatens your team's place in the standings. Perhaps in the face of such an unresponsive anti-fan force as the owners of major-league baseball, it's our duty as fans and Fanists alike to support everyone's right to cheer. Fanists, lighten up on the ranks—even bandwagon fans hate the Yankees. And fans, give Yankees fans a break—after all, we had a rough season last year. Until that baseball utopia comes to fruition, I say, "Let's go Yankees!"

Being "the fan"

This commentary goes out to all baseball fans whose teams rarely, if ever, have successful seasons. I say to you, "Let's go Mets!" To all of the snobby "baseball" fans out there who think people have to root for a winning team in order to be psychologically content or to feel like their sexual organs are massive, I say unto you, "Let's go Mets!"

Perhaps I've revealed too much, but I am unabashedly and unapologetically a diehard supporter of really, really crappy teams. I am a front-row fan of perennial losers like the Chicago Bulls, the New York Mets, major-league soccer and Dwayne Wayne from "A Different World" who never got his schwerve back after Lisa Bonet gave him the cold shoulder.

I stand on other people's shoulders and shout, "LET'S GO ROYALS!" I cite obscure statistics about my team to prove I am a true fan. I'm not just the one who breaks the news story about the latest trade to all my friends, I'm the one who breaks that story to ESPN analysts.

I am impressed by teams who defy expectations a la the Minnesota Twins, the 2001 Seattle Mariners, the New England Patriots and the Oakland A's. I am a fan of 1-0 pitcher duels. I am a fan of spectacular finishes, winning streaks and pennant races with no wildcard. I am a fan of dynasties such as the 49ers, the Lakers and the Yankees; it gives others something to shoot for (or at, during hunting season).

But it always shocks me how quickly victory can go to some people's heads. You're victorious and all of a sudden you feel everyone's gunning for you. Well what did you think was going to happen; an enchanted Shangri-La of sugar coated gumdrops and marmalade tributaries? No, your victory pissed off a lot of people who wanted their teams to win … enjoy the day and settle down, Mrs. Potts, because this argument is a two-way street.

As much as losers goad the winners, the reverse is true as well. You'll never see a Lakers/Yankees fan nod at the end of the game and walk silently to their car. And that's OK because it all balances out. One hoot and/or holler is the equivalent of a pathetic "well the ump was biased" snipe.

When you root for a crappy team, it's hard because all of a sudden you're not allowed to talk sports. If you dare to commit the social faux pas of commenting on someone else's team, you'll get the inevitable "yeah, well what's your team's record?" line like some Pavlovian insult-pellet dispenser.

These trained malcontent simians are pathetic in that they have neither real allegiance nor a modicum of integrity. They are content assaulting a person's character rather than his or her argument. They shoot first and don't care to ask questions because they're not going to listen anyway, because quite frankly, they can't understand.

And it's hard for fans of crappy teams because they've usually lived their whole lives rooting for that crappy team and will probably die rooting for that crappy team and they have yet to experience the unbridled orgasm of victory like the slack-jawed, addle-pated bandwagoneers who are inevitably the most vocal and malicious fans after a victory because they feel the need to overcompensate.

To those bandwagoneers I sound my barbaric yawp, "Let's go Mets!" I stand for something bigger. I stand for good baseball and healthy rivalries. I stand for intelligent commentary and informed opinions. What do you stand for? You are a commercialized, mass-marketed, cross-sectional subgroup. You are a statistical random sampling thunbtacked on the corkboard at Steinbrenner central. You are the poster-buying-child of corporate enterprise and a shill for the bobble-head industry.

I don't condemn the Yankees for their success. I don't condemn Yankee fans for the Yankees' success. I simply enjoy hopping on the eternal bandwagon of argumentation and fan-bashing. I will dig at you and you will dig at me. Do you think I don't see your face when I say I'm a Mets fan and you give me that queer, sidelong glance like I've just had a testicle removed or broke wind during an Opera's decrescendo? Just don't expect me to dance a jig and compliment your impeccable fashion sense when you come dressed like Spike Lee on amphetamines.

I'm not here to play the part of ombudsman, I have no qualms in relating my bias. I find people who jump on bandwagons to be inexpressive and droll. I understand that their existence is necessary for the perpetuation of the sport but that doesn't mean I have to respect them.

The simple fact of the matter is that competition doesn't end on the field. As much as some would say that this is just a sport, it's not. Many people have made it their life, if not invested their life's earnings to buy a vile of Derek Jeter chew spittle off eBay.

The joy of competition is its ability to inspire people, be it inspiring awe, argumentation, respect or passion. People who jump on bandwagons fundamentally lack this inspiration because the victory can't mean anything to them. They could just as well be rooting for a kindergarten Christmas pageant or a great deal on a new set of Goodyear Aquatreads.

For myself, every ninth inning rally, every come-from-behind pennant race, every victory by a team with no chance of winning and the fans that stay until the final out of the season inspires me. It makes my eyes larger and my dreams that much bigger.

Perhaps one day I'll inspire a bandwagon of my own and a boy with the courage to mock those who can't stay off.

three field goals on the day, this one from 45 yards out, making the score 9-3 St. Mary's.

With 4:11 remaining in the first half, Stephane Pluviose '04 recovered another Gaels fumble on the St. Mary's 28-yard line. Although the Bison could not turn the opportunity into a touchdown, they settled for another Lundberg field goal, from 37 yards out to make the score 9-6. On the ensuing drive, Bison linebacker Joe Massey '03, forced yet another Gaels fumble, which was recovered by Kevin Ransome '05 on the St. Mary's 38-yard line. Again, the Bison had to settle for a Lundberg field goal from 34 yards out to tie the score at 9 going into halftime.

"The offense was able to loosen up, and make some corrections in terms of execution. The biggest difference is in terms of preparation. We came out and played with intensity."
— Dave Kotulski, Asst. Coach

After each team was unable to come up with any points despite promising drives to begin the second half, the Gaels struck first. Following a missed field goal attempt by Lundberg, the Gaels took the ball 80 yards in eight plays, and scored on a 10-yard touchdown run to make the score 16-9.

The Bison were able to put together one more long drive. They moved the ball 80 yards in 13 plays, including a fourth down completion from Wenrich to running back Raphael Darrington '05 to keep the drive alive. On the next play, Blamah Sarnor '06 ran the ball in from eight yards out to tie the game at 16. The score remained tied at the end of regulation, and the game went to overtime.

"The best thing was that we took the ball 80 yards, and tied up the ball game," Assistant Coach Dave Kotulski said.

St. Mary's got the ball first in the extra period, but the Bison forced yet another fumble, which was recovered by Anthony Lewis '04, and the Gaels were unable to score. The Bison were unable to move the ball on their possession, and had to settle for a field goal attempt. Lundberg's attempt sailed just to the right of the goal post, and the game went to a second overtime.

The Bison got the first chance in the second extra period. On a third down play, Wenrich connected with Albert Marquardt '04 from 27 yards out. The extra point attempt failed, and the Bison took a 22-16 lead. The Gaels were able to move the ball 25 yards in eight plays to tie the game at 22. The extra point gave St. Mary's a 23-22 win in a heartbreaker for the Bison.

"It was a disappointment, no question about it," Kotulski said.

There are still plenty of positives for the Bison, even after a close loss like this one. The Bison outplayed the Gaels in terms of time of possession and total yards. But, the bottom line is the scoreboard.

"They were able to convert in the red zone, and we didn't," Kotulski said.

"We can't give up those kinds of opportunities," Pluviose said.

The Bison offense seemed much more alive this week than it did against Duquesne in the season opener.

"The offense was able to loosen up and make some corrections in terms of execution," Kotulski said. "The biggest difference is in terms of preparation. We came out and played with intensity."

Sarnor was the team's offensive player of the game, after scoring the game-tying touchdown, and proving that he can be a strong attribute in the backfield.

"We've got some quality running backs. I think that each of them brings his own unique style to the game," Kotulski said.

The Bison defense was strong for the second straight week. Massey was named the Patriot League defensive player of the week after recording 11 tackles, and forcing a key fumble.

"We are just starting to get confidence with the new guys, and build trust between one another," Pluviose said.

Even though the Bucknell defense has been its strongest attribute for the past two seasons, the team is not satisfied with the way it is playing.

"We think that we can get a lot better. There is always room for improvement. We just take it week by week, and try to do the little things in practice."
— Stephane Pluviose '04

"We just have to keep [our opponents] out of the end zone," Kotulski said.

"We think that we can get a lot better. There is always room for improvement," Pluviose said. "We just take it week by week, and try to do the little things in practice."

The Bison host Cornell University in their home opener this Saturday night at 7 p.m. at Christy Mathewson-Memorial Stadium.

Overtime has been a familiar situation for the Bison field hockey squad so far this season, as the team has already seen three of its six games go into extra sessions. The most recent of these contests came in a thrilling victory on Saturday, Sept. 14, as the Bison defeated Columbia in two overtimes by a final score of 2-1.

It was the Bison who struck first in the game, when Kirsten Nilson '06 netted an early goal off of an assist by Kelly O'Brien '06.

Although the Orange and Blue had eight penalty corners and fired off eight shots on goal throughout the rest of the half, Columbia allowed nothing to materialize and the score remained at 1-0.

It was Columbia who would strike next, as Dana Zullo scored on a rebound with 14:23 left in the second half of regulation play. Neither team could capitalize on its efforts again in the remainder of the half, and that trend continued throughout the first overtime.

After the 1-1 score drove the game into its second extra session, Meiko Boynton '05 put an end to the suspense when she drilled her own rebound past the Lions' goalie just three minutes, 19 seconds into the period to give her squad the hard-fought 2-1 victory. Boynton, who was named Patriot League Player of the Week after her first four games, has now amassed four goals for the Orange and Blue in just six games.

Although it was not evident in the tight score, the Bison dominated the Lions' in shots on goal and penalty corners all day, as they out gunned Columbia in those categories 26-5 and 23-11, respectively. The Orange and Blue were clearly dominant in the overtime sessions, where they outshot Columbia 9-1.

The Bison will take their 2-4 record to Holy Cross next week, as they face the Patriot League for on Saturday, Sept. 21 at 12 p.m.

Breean Trapasso, Anderson and Wrigley.

Brandi Trapasso led the Bison with 15 kills and Breean Trapasso led with 36 assists. Anderson and Wrigley combined for a total of 23 digs, which helped lead the Bison to victory.

The Bison concluded the tournament in a close game against LaSalle. Bucknell won the first game 30-28, only to be defeated in the next three consecutive games, 30-25, 30-19 and a heartbreaking 30-28 loss. Quinnipiac University, the team the Bison defeated in three games, was crowned tournament champion after beating the University of Albany in head-to-head competition.

After their impressive play in the tournament, Breean Trapasso and Anderson were named to the All-Tournament team. Both Breean Trapasso and Anderson were vital parts of the Bison offense.

"Bree has done an outstanding job of running the offense and controlling tempo over the last two weekends," Opalski said. "Chelsea's defensive play and composure on the court has afforded us the opportunity to run a much quicker offense, allowing us to catch our opponents off guard. It is fitting that these two are being recognized by the tournament staff."

In addition to this tournament recognition, Breean Trapasso was honored by the Patriot League by being named the Patriot League Player of the Week on Sept. 16.

In the Bison's 3-1 loss to LaSalle, Trapasso had her best outing of the week with 51 assists, 10 digs and three aces. She also posted a double-double with 28 assists and 10 digs in the game against Albany.

The Bison will return to Davis gym next weekend when they host Morgan State University and Central Connecticut University on Sept. 21.

Abroad perspective: Madrid, Spain

By Jolene Hart
Managing Editor

I stepped off the plane and was met with a blast of arid heat and a flourish of cigarette smoke, welcoming me to Madrid-Barajas. At my side were 40 students, the newest members of the Hamilton College Academic Year in Spain Program, anxious to begin a semester that would become indelible in our memories.

It was Sept. 5, and the oppressive August heat that drives the natives to the coast for the latter half of the summer had not yet begun to yield. Quite fortunately, we were on our way to the coast, too. There was only one night to spend in the city of Madrid before we would be whisked away for a 10-day orientation on Spain's northern shore.

Of all the thoughts that might have been racing through our heads as the plane touched down, there was one small matter that we were all questioning: the contract. We applied to Hamilton College's Spain program with the knowledge that it was regarded as a unique abroad experience. Reinforcing this fact was the language contract that we were all required to sign stipulating that, from the moment we landed in Spain until the day we left, we would restrict our language use to Spanish. The exceptions were few: phone calls home or essential e-mails, otherwise we were each expected to speak, write, read, think and maybe even dream in Spanish from that moment forward. Using a little foresight, we had tried our best to squeeze in some English introductions among the group during the eight-hour flight, just so we wouldn't be complete strangers if our Spanish language skills failed us at first.

As fate would have it, we transitioned into Spanish-only mode without problems. The high caliber of the students in the program was affirmed by the fact that we all took the contract seriously and helped each other adhere to our pledge for the rest of the semester. For the first few days, the entire experience felt all the more surreal given the fact that we were working hard just to communicate our most basic thoughts and emotions. But that was part of the adventure.

Every moment of that first day, endless as it was, remains fixed in my mind. All of the images of my new home that I conjured in my head over the summer were put to the test in those first dizzying hours in Madrid. My roommate and I were sent in a taxi to meet our new family on Calle Jorge Juan, in the eastern section of the city, known as Salamanca to the madrileños.

Although we had met only a few hours before, we instantly bonded the moment we stood outside the door of that apartment and pressed the doorbell, lacking even the slightest idea of who would be on the other side to greet us.

Jolene Hart—The Bucknellian

The smiling woman who welcomed us with a hug and kisses was Señora Maricarmen Hernan Cutando Soriano. She instantly took us under her wing and, although I struggled to process the meaning of her rapid-fire Spanish (I am quite sure that she was even speaking slowly for our sake), I felt somehow reassured. Thus began our four-month stay with Maricarmen and her two children, Margarita and Miguel.

During the first night in Madrid, I conversed only a little and slept even less. The knowledge that four unplanned months lie ahead at once excited and terrified me. I had already been awake for 36 hours, but sleep was the furthest thing from my mind. The next morning at 6 a.m., we would depart for orientation.

Setting a standard of royalty that would only intensify during the semester, Hamilton College gathered all 40 of us for an experience that would serve to polish our language skills, introduce us to rural Spain, build our friendships and prepare us for the weeks ahead. Our destination was the tiny coastal town of Comillas in the province of Cantabria, situated in northern Spain. Upon arrival at our hotel, where we came to know the staff by name, we understood that there could not exist a sharper contrast to the enormity of Madrid. Comillas served as our home base while we spent the orientation hiking through the Picos de Europa mountains, boating along the coast of Santander, exploring the neighboring towns and adjusting to life in Spain.

A few days later, we toured the cave of Altamira, which contains 15,000-year-old cave paintings (a number that I still cannot fathom). Altamira is a UNESCO world heritage site that is deserving of its nickname, "the Sistine Chapel of prehistoric art." The actual cave is now off limits to the public, with the exception of researchers and historians, but Hamilton College reserved our tour three years in advance. Before I understood the enormity of the opportunity, I was beneath the earth, inches from some of the world's oldest known art, of which I had only before seen in the pages of my high school textbooks.

An orientation that incredible was only the first of our excursions throughout Spain, every one more impressive and unique than the last. As a group, we traveled throughout Galicia and Catalonia and visited the cities of Barcelona, Toledo, Cuenca, Burgos and Leon. On the weekends, when we could pry ourselves from Madrid, our individual trips took us throughout the rest of Spain.

During our excursions, we also became familiar with the art of eating in Spain, intimated to us through the two-hour-long meals that we would greedily anticipate. Gone were our routines of hurried meals once we became accustomed to course after course of food and wine. Our program director loved fine, authentic Spanish food and he would seek out the most remote locations to find it. I recall dining along the Mediterranean coast in the village of Peñiscola, being ladled a flaming cup of queimada in Galicia and toasting in the Hotel San Marcos, a 16th century former monastery, in Leon.

The meals with our Spanish families naturally took on a more relaxed feel. Nearly all of our food was prepared by Maricarmen, reinforcing the Spanish tradition that banishes everyone else from the kitchen. It took me several weeks just to realize that our kitchen was not even equipped with an oven; all cooking was sagely executed on a small stovetop.

I left Spain with a cultivated affinity for my señora's tortilla española (Spanish omelette), paella (although it did take awhile to adjust to the sight of shrimp with their heads still intact), manchego cheese, Spanish olives and chocolate con churros (best eaten at 5 a.m. after being out all night).

The academic portion of our program consisted of courses taught entirely in Spanish at the International Institute in Madrid. My most treasured classroom experience, apart from the flamenco course that taught us to perform authentic sevillanas, was in "The History of Art and Architecture."

Jolene Hart—The Bucknellian

The Passion Facade is one of three faces on Antonio Gaudi's Sagrada Familia. Construction on the temple began in Barcelona in 1882 and continues to be worked on.

Our class met weekly at the Prado Museum as a supplement to our class time, allowing us to witness firsthand the artistic treasures that are held in Madrid. The Prado was easily transformed from a cavernous maze of corridors to a familiar home. As art students, we came to understand that little compares to the moment you first catch sight of Van der Weyden's El descendemiento de la cruz, or Bosch's Jardin de las delicias. To study for an exam, we only needed to stroll through the museum halls and live the art of Velazquez, el Greco, Murillo or Rubens. The architecture portion of the class prepped us for our program excursions, sending us out to view masterpieces like the Cathedral of Santiago de Compostela or Phillip II's Escorial with more than just the eye of the average passerby.

Perhaps the most telling images of life in Madrid are found in the annals of our daily lives. Standing in awe of a classical violinist or a Spanish guitarist on the Metro, watching the sun set from the Torre de Madrid or catching sight of the Cibeles statue at night were common occurrences that remain the best reflections of the semester. Madrid was never quiet; I remember arriving at a club with friends at 2:30 a.m. and realizing that the nighttime crowds had not yet arrived and seeing groups of students hanging out in the streets of Alonzo Martinez at any hour of the evening. These are my memories of Madrid.

In this same manner, conversing with a Spaniard in their native language is perhaps the most inspiring feeling that studying abroad afforded me. I will never forget conversations that I had with complete strangers: a friendly shop clerk or a passerby asking directions or a family in the park, who complemented my ability to speak their language. Receiving such a comment from a native evoked neither pride nor self-satisfaction; rather, it created a fundamental human connection that defied both cultural and national boundaries. Spain awakened my social conscience, my passion for humanity and revolutionized my outlook on the world. At a time when the nationalistic pride of the United States was growing exponentially, I was instilled with an entirely different feeling of solidarity.

I left Madrid in late December in the same manner that I came, a passenger in a taxi speeding through the city's labyrinth of streets. I took with me far more than what I brought. The thought that has been the hardest to internalize is that the city goes on; right now someone is walking down the Paseo del Prado for the first time or stopping for tapas and a glass of wine whether I am there to witness it or not. Though it seemed like I was ending the experience, I resolved that it was only the beginning of my connection to Spanish culture. Although I can't say exactly when or how I will return, I am confident that anyone who has glimpsed the warmth and vitality of Spain, as I did in those few months, will be unable to keep themselves away.

Bucknell Outing Club active indoors and out

By Ashley Maliken
Writer

At the far end of campus, in the bowels of the Tustin Building beneath the incessant tapping of dancing toes, is the Bucknell Outing Club, an organization for the most daring of students headed by Jim Hostetler.

These students, both current and alumni, plan a trip for almost every weekend of the school year, as well as a number of summer excursions. Activities include hiking, canoeing, climbing and camping.

Hostetler, who has been with the University since 1985 as the director of construction and design, has headed this group of over 200 individuals since 1992. He is also the founder of Buckwild, a pre-orientation program for first-year students.

In addition, Hostetler is responsible for the creation of the climbing wall at the University, which he constructed with the assistance of two colleagues.

Hostetler considers the Outing Club his passion, which is why he is willing to donate hours of time to the planning and execution of many trips and activities.

Despite its huge membership, it is often difficult for the Outing Club to get the word out to students on campus about upcoming trips and events. The club's advertising is done electronically via e-mail and its homepage(http://www.orgs.bucknell.edu/outing.clb/). Without other methods of popularizing, this information would remain locked away on the World Wide Web.

It is simple and cost efficient to become a member, with dues of $6 for the year or $25 for a lifetime. Once your dues are paid, your name is added to the e-mail list and information about every trip is right at your fingertips.

For the less adventurous type, the Outing Club sponsors a number of classes and speakers that span a wide variety of topics. Last year, for example, a CPR certification class was offered to all students, and they hosted speaker Clide Peeling of Reptiland, who brought with him an array of reptiles ranging in size and variety.

Possible subjects for classes this semester include the fundamentals of backpacking, basic knot tying and the fundamentals of winter camping. All meetings and classes are held in the club's room in Tustin, which is fondly referred to as "Base Camp."

Base Camp has regular hours, when you can stop by and check out the equipment available to rent, try out your climbing talents on the traverse wall or fill your cable quota in front of their big screen television.

Hostetler has some big plans for the Outing Club this year, the the first of which is a night hike during Parents Weekend. Any interested parties can meet at Base Camp between 6 - 6:30 p.m. on Friday, Oct. 4, and then depart for the hiking destination about 15 miles away. Upon arrival, students and families have the option of taking a flashlight-guided hike of the area, or simply enjoying a bonfire and fireside snacks.

A trip for Fall Break to hike in the White Mountains of New Hampshire or a camping, climbing and spelunking excursion in West Virginia is also on the planning board.

"I'm really looking forward to the Fall Break trip. Plans haven't been finalized yet, but I think it's going to be great," Outing Club Member Sam Rothstein '05 said.

In addition to those trips, there will be camping the weekend of Sept. 28, climbing on Oct.12, and hiking at State Run Trail on Oct. 26.

As excited as he is for the Outing Club this year, Hostetler is also very concerned with the future. His ultimate goal is to offer a credit class that deals with important life issues, such as leadership training and emergency survival skills.

Although the class would be taught with a focus on the outdoors, the lessons learned could easily be transferred to life in any arena.

As the Outing Club members are fond of saying, "Don't let your schoolwork get in the way of your college education." But if Hostetler is able to make his dream come true by getting a class off the ground, then perhaps schoolwork could really become a proper college education.

R.B. Winter State Park great for a scenic getaway

By Leah Cunningham
Writer

Ice fishing, camping, hunting, hiking, snowmobiling and mountain biking are just a few activities that R.B. Winter State Park has to offer families and students. Located within Bald Eagle State Forest, this 695-acre state park overlooking Halfway Lake is the uncommon getaway for students looking for a relaxing day or weekend off-campus.

"Students from Bucknell use the park especially in the spring and fall," Park Manager Bob Deffner said. "We have observed a number of students take advantage of the beach and picnic areas for volleyball games, Frisbees and a picnic lunch. R.B. Winter is a mountain bike trailhead also, and the hiking trails lead into the Bald Eagle State Forest."

Due to R.B. Winter's close proximity—only 18 miles west of Lewisburg along State Route 192—many students have already taken the opportunity to explore the park. Some decide to take a weekend camping trip while others cool off in the lake, mountain bike or participate in a day hike.

"I've probably been there about 15 times. I've gone camping and backpacking with friends on the weekends," Lauren Scott '04 said.

Scott said that she used R.B. Winter State Park as a training area prior to backpacking up the Appalachian Mountains.

Dan Fellon '04 first visited R.B. Winter Park with his grandparents when he was ten years old and has made a habit of returning to the park due to his interest in mountain biking.

"I like going in the fall and spring, especially this time of year because there's lots of tree color. The trails are nice because they are either for hiking, mountain biking or for horses, and you're not around any traffic," Fellon said.

Deffner said that students can visit the park any time of year, but should be prepared for the weather.

"Fall foliage season is weather - dependent. Weather conditions can affect when the peak leaf season occurs. It usually peaks during the beginning part of October. Mountain biking enthusiasts enjoy riding in September and the first half of October," Deffner said.

R.B. Winter is a close, inexpensive and unique getaway. If interested, Deffner said that students can find reasonable prices for camping, pavilion rental, camping cottages, organized group camping and cabins.

Dan Fellon—The Bucknellian

The lake at R.B. Winter is just one of its many features. The park provides for a variety of recreational activities, including ice fishing, hiking, hunting and snowmobiling. The park has been described as being "in the middle of everything and nothing at all."

Dan Fellon—The Bucknellian

The red, yellow and green fall foliage provides for a breathtaking view. R.B Winter State Park peaks during the beginning part of October.

Fellon describes the park as "in the middle of everything and nothing at all." After only a 20-minute trip, students feel like they are secluded, relaxed and awed by the R.B. Winter State Park surroundings.

"It's really a neat spot," Matt Vanaskie '04 said. He has gone to the park for both his weather and climate lab and occasional camping excursions.

"It's a neat spot situated well in the valley. If you're looking for a getaway, it's just something out of the ordinary to do."

Deffner has only one precaution for students visiting the park during hunting season.

"Students should wear orange in the woods during hunting and turkey season. This would be a good idea from early November until mid-December," Deffner said.

R.B. Winter State Park was originally named Halfway State Forest. In honor of Mr. Raymond B. Winter, a forester who started work in the park area and the surrounding state forest in 1910, the park was renamed.

Winter spent 45 years of his life dedicated to his works. In 1955, his work paid off and the park was officially known as R.B. Winter State Park.

"I would encourage students to go. The Park is really different than Lewisburg and you are away from people … It's really scenic with beautiful overlooks and vistas," Scott said.

"We've had a really good experience with Bucknell students. I encourage students to utilize the facilities at the Park and at least come check it out," Deffner said.

Anyone wishing to make reservations for pavilions or camping can call the R.B. Winter State Park Center at (570)727-2757 or (570)966-1455. Individual park information can be found at www.dcnr.state.pa.us.

Local bicycling and fall foliage routes for the fall

Bicycling Routes:

Hoffa Mill Loop—15 miles

This ride combines the best of town and country. Beautiful homes, old farms, a meandering creek and an 18th Century mill are some of the highlights of this ride. Leave Lewisburg from the University campus, go around the University golf course, over rolling hills and look for a great view down the valley from the last hill. Turn onto Hoffa Mill Road and ride by family farms. Meander along Buffalo Creek, and visit Grove's Mill, operating since 1788 and now the last of the water-powered grist mills in the county. Ride back toward town on Colonel John Kelly Road, named for an early Indian fighter. Look for the Federal Penitentiary up on the hill. Return through the outskirts of town on River Road, which winds its way past the Slifer House Museum and along the Susquehanna River into Lewisburg. Ride through Victorian Lewisburg where restaurants and shops await you.

Farms and River Ride—24 miles

This ride on lightly-traveled roads gives the cyclist a flavor of the scenic woods, creeks and farms which make up these rural counties. Leave Lewisburg north along the river, through the suburbs, and at the top of the last hill, view the valley and mountains spread before you. Ride across the valley, past the Lewisburg Federal Penitentiary and an emu farm, and follow a meandering shaded stream. There's a good rest stop at Mile 7, with a covered picnic area and drinking water. As the road turns right towards the river, the valley broadens out into farms and rolling hills before sloping down to the village of New Columbia, where there is a Mini-Mart. Ride along the scenic Susquehanna before crossing the river into the borough of Milton, an old industrial town with several family restaurants and McDonald's. Leave Milton on Shakespeare Road to wind around farms to U.S. Route 45, which takes you through the village of Montandon (two markets and a pizza place) on your return across the river into Lewisburg.

Country Road Ramble—18 miles

This is a shorter version of the Farms and River Ride. As the route slopes down towards the river, turn south towards town before reaching U.S. Route 15 and ride over a series of low ridges into the suburbs of Lewisburg. Return to the Susquehanna Valley Visitors Bureau where restrooms, water and other rides await you.

Spruce Run Reservoir—28 miles

This ride takes you past Spruce Run Reservoir through wooded areas, along cool creeks, by prosperous farms and up and down some challenging hills to a quaint village, old mills and a 19th Century schoolhouse. Leave Lewisburg north along the river, through the suburbs, and at the top of the last hill, view the valley and the mountains spread before you. Ride across the valley, past the Lewisburg Federal Penitentiary and an emu farm, and follow a meandering shaded stream. There's a good rest stop at Mile 7, with a covered picnic area and drinking water. Turn left on Miller's Bottom Road and begin to climb the winding shady road through the woods. At Mile 9, pass Nittany Mountain Campground where you can buy a cold drink or a snack. Arrive at Sunrise Church, with the hills behind you and beautiful views of the valleys and mountains ahead of you. Ride by the reservoir and start south on winding country roads to the village of Mazeppa. On one side, a school house built in 1885 and on the other, an old cemetery, welcome you to this peaceful, small village. At the other end of the village is Baumer's Repair Shop, where you can buy drinks and snacks. About a mile further is a shady, grassy place to rest or picnic beside Mazeppa Mills. Turn east and follow Buffalo Creek as it wanders its way towards the Susquehanna. At Mile 20.5, pass Grove's Mill, operating since 1788 and now the last of the water-powered grist mills in the county. Ride back towards town on Colonel John Kelly Road, named for an early Indian fighter, past more farms and the Federal Penitentiary up on the hill. Ride through the suburbs on River Road, which winds its way past the Slifer House Museum, along the Susquehanna River and across Buffalo Creek one last time, into the borough of Lewisburg where restaurants and shops await you.

A view from fall foliage routes. This is one of the many beautiful sites in central Pennsylvania.

Fall Foliage Routes:

Lewisburg to Laurelton Loop

Beginning in Lewisburg, travel west on U.S. Route 45 (about eight miles) to Mifflinburg, continuing on through the borough toward Hartleton (about 4 miles) and on another 4 miles or so then turn left onto U.S. Route 235 (south), through the village of Laurelton and over the mountain into Troxelville. Turn left at stop sign onto Troxelville Road and continue east to the village of Penns Creek. When you arrive at the stop sign in Penns Creek, turn left onto U.S. Route 104 North and follow U.S. Route 104 back to Mifflinburg. At the stop sign where U.S. Route 104 ends, turn right and follow U.S. Route 45 East back to Lewisburg.

Lewisburg—New Berlin Loop

From Lewisburg, travel south on U.S. Route 15 (five miles) to Winfield. Turn right (west) onto Route 304 and follow about 8 miles to New Berlin. At intersection of U.S. Routes 304 and 204, turn right onto U.S. Route 204 (New Berlin Mountain Road) and follow up and over the mountain. At first stop sign, turn right onto Furnace Road and follow three-and-a-half miles, then turn left onto Stein Lane. Follow Stein Lane about three miles back to Lewisburg (you'll come in on the back side of the University Golf Course). Turn right onto Curtin Avenue to bring you back out to U.S.Route 15 just north of the University.

Perspective: summer in Hollywood

By Melissa Farrar
Staff Writer

Seen any good movies lately?

We live in an age in which movies are cranked out in record numbers, with, the critics say, little focus on quality. Nothing besides the box office seems to control movie-making decisions. Originality has given way to predictability of success and to formula. Whether, the critics are right or wrong, movies are a main ingredient of American and international popular culture. They both influence and reflect who we are. And I, for one, like them.

I have always wanted to be involved in making movies and this summer I got the chance to do just that. As an intern at Tall Tree Productions in Hollywood, I had a firsthand opportunity to learn about movie making and what a large-scale and complex business it is. Any illusions I had concerning glitz and glamour evaporated quickly. Although it was still a lot of fun.

Owned by director Betty Thomas ("Private Parts," "Dr. Doolittle") and producer Jenno Topping, Tall Tree is a division of Columbia/Sony Pictures. Two additional producers and a team of assistants, script advisors and office staff make up the core of the company. I was impressed that many of the people I met held advanced degrees in various areas of study.

Tall Trees focuses on turning out midrange (in terms of budget) films such as "Charlie's Angels" and "Can't Hardly Wait." Its production headquarters are located in an ordinary looking house on Sunset Boulevard in Calif. The area is loaded with production companies, recording businesses, movie industry contractors and clubs. The casual, entertaining atmosphere of the office was a pleasant surprise. The producer's three dogs and baby were regular visitors and occupied favorite spots on the reception area couches.

Despite the relaxed atmosphere, the sheer volume of work was mind-numbing. The balancing act of developing, producing, shooting and editing a film is a tough, time-consuming challenge. Anything and everything can go wrong, and delays are common.

Kristen Hughes—The Bucknellian

Farrar's summer internship at Tall Tree Productions taught her that the film industry is fast-paced and exciting.

Every day, dozens of scripts and books submitted by hopeful screenwriters arrived at the office. Before a producer read a script, it had to be logged into a computer database. One of my jobs was to prepare a summary and critique of the script and/or writer. If it passed muster, a producer might take a look at it. However, very few pieces ever received consideration to become projects.

Even when a script is selected, it takes time before it reaches its final form. The company's script library contained numerous rewrites and showed the months—and even years —of work that go into completing a final draft. After a film starts production, major changes are still likely to happen. Such changes were occurring on a Tall Trees project when I arrived.

Throughout the summer, cast and production crew flooded the office for post-production meetings on Tall Trees latest film, "I Spy," starring Eddie Murphy and Owen Wilson. This comedy, based loosely on the 1960s TV show, focuses on a CIA agent who teams up with an egotistical boxing star to prevent an international arms deal from going through.

There were numerous chances to learn how movies are put together. For example, I observed the storyboard artists sketch and model the final sequences of the film. They loved to share stories about movies they had worked on, and even asked for my opinion at times. During visits to the set, I witnessed the tremendous amount of work that goes into a single day of filming. The staff and crew list for "I Spy" is 14 pages long. It covers such duties as production, art, accounting, stunts, costumes, locations, lighting, first aid, props, transportation and so on. Workers diverse as writers, caterers, carpenters, extras casting, special effects and many more are listed on the roster.

On the final day of the shoot, the crew built a water set in an industrial lot near Los Angeles. The cast and film crew call was at 8 p.m., and shooting went until dawn. The night was frigidly cold, yet Murphy and Wilson made everyone on the set forget this. They ad-libbed and joked, despite being immersed in the ice-cold water, and everyone on the set burst out laughing between takes.

I noted that about 80 percent of the crew was male, as is typical on most films, yet Betty Thomas, a female director, was in complete control. The lengthy, tedious nature of shooting a film surprised me, but everyone involved seemed to genuinely enjoy what he/she was doing. Once the shoot wrapped, we had fun watching the previews on television at the office. By then, the focus on "I Spy" had shifted, and it was time to shoot "Charlie's Angels 2: Halo" and prepare for Ben Affleck's next film, "Surviving Christmas."

The film industry is fast-paced and exciting, and my four months in Hollywood were a great learning experience. Now, I watch all movies with an appreciation for how much work goes on behind the scenes. Whether or not I choose a career in film, I'll certainly be keeping an eye out for the next Tall Trees release to hit the screen.

Brynwood concert series returns

By Julianna Pietak
Senior Writer

Being located in a small central Pennsylvanian town has its ups and downs for student life on and off campus. If the quaint, quiet and rural appeals to you, then this could be your paradise. However, if your tastes run more towards the cultural life of the city, you may feel like you're missing out.

This is an issue Dave Ritchotte of New Wave Productions kept in mind when planning the new "Live at the Brynwood" performance series in downtown Lewisburg. Ritchotte said that the purpose of these events is to "bring an entertainment option to downtown Lewisburg." Specifically, he said, "the series was created to give students the ability to relax and listen to music in a casual environment and in a purely over-21 crowd."

These concerts take place on a weekly basis at the Brynwood Room, the banquet room attached to the Bull Run Inn. The formality of a banquet room is a connotation Ritchotte would like to avoid, preferring to describe it as an intimate and relaxing performance venue. The performances are open to students and community members, but are exclusively for the over-21 crowd, as alcohol is served.

The names featured in the series are national "up-and-coming" bands, playing both covers and original music. The artists have their own CDs, their own styles and promising talent for the future. These are not simply local acts, but performers who Ritchotte views as tomorrow's stars.

Next on the agenda are Pete Palladino and Jeff Feltenberger of The Badlees, who will be performing on Wednesday, Sept. 25 at 9 p.m. As members of The Badlees, both shared concert stages with the likes of Bob Seger, Gregg Allman, the Goo Goo Dolls, Edwin McCain, Robert Plant and Jimmy Page. Their songs have also been featured on VH1 and in multiple TV and film soundtracks.

The latest album released by Palladino, "Sweet Siren of the Reconnected," is described on his Web site (http://www.petepalladino.com/html/bio.html) as "filled with up-tempo rockers anchored by pop sensibility, mid-paced breezy gems and an occasional ballad ... 'Sweet Siren' also boasts smart and savvy lyrics and a strong sense of musical integrity. For every moment fueled by pure adrenaline, there is another simply inspired by the heart."

The duo's influences are listed as modern rock, pop and even root/folk type sounds. This blend of style, coupled with its prominence, should present an entertaining mix of quality music played in a casual style and presented in an informal atmosphere.

The Brynwood Room Series' combination of nationally renowned performers in a small and intimate Lewisburg venue is one unique to the University and the local community. Such an opportunity provides just what Ritchotte wished to accomplish, new entertainment option for students and community in downtown Lewisburg.

Top 10 central Pa. dates

By Melinda Kummer
Senior Writer

Some astute readers may remember a Bucknell World article describing the distinct and troubling lack of students that date on campus. After reading the following article, however, the lame excuse of "But there's nothing to do here!" will certainly not satisfy anyone. Liberty was taken to gather information about local events, which consequently led to the "Top Ten Places to Take a Date in the Susquehanna Valley." Get your dialing fingers ready—you'll want to call that crush as soon as one of the proposed dates grabs your attention.

1. Original Italian Pizza (OIPs) is close, reasonably priced and offers a great selection of food. The grilled chicken salad and bread come highly recommended by Renee Orzechowski '04. My lone dining experience at OIPs consisted of a takeout calzone—the small calzone is so big that it could easily feed two people. OIPs is located on U.S. Route 15 in Plaza 15 by Ames. To order in, call (570) 523-6610.

2. Good Wil's Restaurant has been described as a "small, run-down barn," but remains a favorite of University students for serving breakfast all day. Prices are cheap and the quantities large—Good Wil's is everything a Pennsylvania diner should be. Only a 10-minute drive, Good Wil's sits on the right side of U.S. Route 45 after crossing the Market Street Bridge, traveling through Montandon and going under the U.S. Route 147 overpass.

3. Café Latte is one of the best-kept downtown secrets. A small coffee shop, Café Latte boasts friendly service, short lines and great seating. Some tables have Scrabble and Monopoly game boards laminated into them, making Café Latte a great option for a double date. Home-baked desserts, including deliciously thick slices of banana bread, lay in a mouth-watering array on the counter. It also offers the usual selection of lattes, cappuccinos, etc. Located at 21 North Third St. (behind CVS), Café Latte is open Monday through Thursday, 7 a.m. to 6 p.m., Friday, 7 a.m. to 9:30 p.m. and Saturday and Sunday, 8 a.m. to 6 p.m.

4. American Idol Concert will feature the top 10 finalists from the hit summer reality series on Nov. 1 at 7:30 p.m., at the First Union Arena at Casey Plaza in Wilkes-Barre. Just take Interstate 81 to Exit 168, then make a right turn at the traffic light - the arena will be directly in front of you. Parking is $4 and tickets for the concert run between $26.50 and $46.50. They can be charged by phone at (570) 693-4100 or ordered at www.ticketmaster.com. Tickets can be bought in groups of eight.

5. Cliff jumping is a favorite pastime of Lewisburg locals. Travel north on U.S. Route 15, then west on U.S. Route 192, then north on Airport Road. Take the first left and travel two miles—the cliffs are on the right. Graduate student Justin Neuman said: "It's a 25-foot cliff where some of the locals go. We go there every now and then to cool off." The Bucknell Outing Club sponsors trips to the cliffs, but with the autumn chill soon upon us, you might want to consider other trips that they offer, including hiking, caving and skiing. Check out their Web page for up-to-date trip information at http://www.orgs.bucknell.edu/outing.clb/. The best thing about cliff jumping is that it's free fun!

A & E Commentary

6. The Bloomsburg Fair runs from Sept. 21 to Sept. 28. Open from 7 a.m. to 9 p.m. daily, admission is only $4. Apple dumplings, pierogies and soup in bread bowls are special features of the menu. In addition, a new band called Jars of Clay will be making an appearance on Sept. 22. The fairgrounds are located off of Exit 34 of U.S. Route 80. More information can be found at www.bloomsburgfair.com.

7. Oktoberfest celebrations will take place on Oct. 12 and 13 in Williamsport. The Pub, Old Corner, 33 East, Franco's Lounge, The Cell Block, Kelly's Grill, Peter Herdic House, Legends at the Genetti Hotel and the Bullfrog Brewery will be hosting German-inspired meals, complete with wait staff in traditional German garb. The menu will consist of items such as bratwurst and beer. Check out http://www.mywol.net/theweekender/lifestyles/p011011.htm for more information.

8. The Yankees/Orioles game on Sept. 27 in Baltimore is a great deal. A mere $20 for the bus ticket and $15 to see some great baseball is a small price to pay for a beautiful autumn day at the Inner Harbor. A fascinating aquarium, the Babe Ruth Museum, paddleboats and delicious seafood (something you just don't get in the middle of Pennsylvania) is right at your fingertips. Rusty's, located just a short walk from Camden Yards, boasts the best crab cakes the Chesapeake Bay has to offer. The Hard Rock Café, ESPN Zone and numerous restaurants in Little Italy are also fabulous dining options for the non-seafood lover. The trip is sponsored by Activities and Campus Events and tickets can be bought in the Cap Center (LC 306).

9. Front Street Station in Northumberland is a bit of a hike, but it is well worth the extra travel time. A train station-turned-restaurant, Front Street Station is not lacking for atmosphere. Beautiful views of the Susquehanna River and railroad tracks are visible from nearly all tables. A little pricier than the other options presented, Front Street Station is a good choice for a special occasion. If it seems to be a slow night, request an upper-level table overlooking the bar, and whether they're busy or not, order pecan pie! Located at 2 Front St., Northumberland, Front Street Station takes reservations—call (570) 473-3626.

10. The christening of the University's football field under the stadium's new lights will occur on Sept. 21 at 7 p.m. The first night game since 1986 will be played against Cornell. Not only is admission free for students with University IDs, but it's rumored that Sept. 21 also happens to be Free T-Shirt Day!

Now that you've been given a plan for the next 10 Saturday nights, don't let yourself sit in your room and play computer games. Don't think that you necessarily need a date to participate in ahy of these activities—just grab a friend and go. Spontaneity, chilling at cool spots with cool people, exploring new places—isn't that what student life is about?

Yezek's full life is inspiring

By Campbell Gerrish
Senior Writer

Have you ever felt as though you might not be getting as much as you'd like to out of your campus experience? Ever wish you were more involved but were too lazy to explore the University's options—or thought you just couldn't fit more into your schedule? As an integral member of the Bucknell Dance Company (BDC), a motivated English major, an athlete and a community service participant, Stephanie Yezek '03 balances a day-to-day schedule that would send many into a fit of stress. If you are curious as to how to live life at the University to the fullest, read on for some inspiration.

Yezek's greatest passion in life is dance. Beginning with gymnastics in grade school and four years in her high school dance company, Yezek made the cut for the University's dance program in her sophomore year. Having served as secretary last year, she now holds the position of vice president of the BDC and is also a teaching assistant for the dance department.

Although she arrived at the University with a background in jazz, Yezek now focuses on modern dance styles and is currently choreographing this semester's main stage dance event. She plans to go to graduate school for dance, would like to find herself dancing professionally in New York City or Chicago in the next few years and can definitely see herself teaching dance at some point.

In addition to being an accomplished dancer, Yezek is a dedicated English major. Her interest in English began in high school, where she gained a solid background in the subject from many teachers. When asked what she likes the most about the major, Yezek said, "I'm more into the analytical side of things, not so much creative writing. I think it would be cool to be a literary critic."

Tyler Kidder—The Bucknellian

Yezek has a full life at the University. Her activities range from dance to volunteering.

One course in particular that made a significant impact on Yezek was Gothic Literature with Assistant Professor of English Ghislaine McDayter.

"Class with Professor McDayter was inspiring," Yezek said. "The course was influential in that it changed my literary perspective. It was kind of weird because I would talk about the course all the time with my friends and family. I began to look at things from a gender angle, something interesting and new for me."

Yezek is interested in the collaborative literary analysis that goes along with publishing. She was one of two students selected this semester to work as an intern for the West Branch Literary Magazine, a University publication based in Bucknell Hall, and has been enjoying her experience thoroughly. If she were able to move up the ranks at a publishing company after college, she could see herself working in the field.

On top of eight hours of work per week for West Branch and regular classwork, Yezek finds time to serve as a writing tutor and to organize her senior thesis. Working with Professor of English Michael Payne, her thesis will focus on Lewis Carroll's "Through the Looking Glass." Fascinated by the gender issues present in Carroll's story, Yezek plans to look at it from a feminist perspective and to investigate the "sense within the nonsense of children's literature."

Yezek has also been a varsity athlete, a member of the Alpha Phi Omega service fraternity, and served on a panel to interview prospective professors. She played varsity lacrosse her first and sophomore years and very much enjoyed the experience. After trying to balance both dance and sports practice, Yezek decided that she wanted to use the time spent practicing on the field to further her abilities on the stage and resigned from the lacrosse squad. For one semester, Yezek really enjoyed working the Alpha Phi Omega service fraternity.

"It was great to get away from campus and to help people in the community," she said. Her favorite service project was helping locals with an annual day of apple butter churning. Yezek was also selected as one of six students to serve on a panel to interview the new Victorian literature professor, as well as the new scenery designer/professor for the Theatre and Dance Department.

For Yezek, "everything just fits." When asked about how she does it and how she feels about her University experience, Yezek said, "I need to be busy and I really enjoy everything that I'm doing. I feel like I've made a lot of good choices, focused on the right things, and, so far, have done everything I wanted to do."

"Don't take your education or time here for granted. Live and learn. Those are the two most important things I have gained from my time here," Yezek said.

Scholars gather for race conference

By Michelle Dombeck
Arts & Entertainment Editor

More than 60 scholars from all over the United States are gathering at the University to participate in a race conference. Sponsored by the Race/Gender Resource Center, "Color, Hair and Bone—The Persistence of Race into the 21st Century" is a series of lectures, panels and discussions that runs from Sept. 26-28.

One of the conference's main purposes is to raise awareness of racial issues.

"Through this conference, the Race/Gender Resource Center brings to the attention of the Bucknell campus and the community at large the many ways in which race and racism are significant today, in our individual lives, as a nation and as citizens of the world," said Elisabeth Crespo, assistant professor of sociology and co-director of the Race/Gender Center.

Norlisha Crawford, assistant professor of English, is one of the lecturers at the conference. She also believes that the conference will bring attention to racial issues.

"I think the purpose of the conference is to keep questions, ideas and perspectives related to the persistent nature of race, racism and racist ideology alive in the academic world," Crawford said. "Too often, too many scholars, students and others involved with universities, including Bucknell, think themselves above or removed from the direct effects of race and racism. That imagined distance is not only not the case, it is not possible."

> "Problems regarding race were well publicized last year here at Bucknell, and rather than retreat from conversations about race, we should be engaging in more of them."
> —Pawan Dhingra*, assistant professor of sociology and anthropology*

Last year's blackface incident, when two white students dressed up as Venus and Serena Williams for Halloween, is just one example of how racial misunderstandings can affect the University.

"Problems regarding race were well publicized last year here at Bucknell, and rather than retreat from conversations about race, we should be engaging in more of them," said Pawan Dhingra, assistant professor of sociology and anthropology, who is also lecturing at the conference. "In a very homogeneous environment, where both white and non-white students complain about the lack of racial diversity, this conference gives the community an opportunity to hear what others have to say about race."

Professors and scholars are not the only people who notice racial issues.

"Even in today's society, there is still racism. Programs like this race conference will help people recognize and stop it," Kate Stiteler '05 said.

Last night, keynote speaker Wahneema Lubiano, associate professor of literature at Duke University, gave the first lecture of the conference.

"Lubiano's lecture, 'Race and Theoretical Hubris: Narrative Utility, Political Discomfort,' addressed the political climate that makes talking about race difficult, in spite of the persistence of racial inequalities," Crespo said.

Columbia University Professor of Law Kendall Thomas will give another keynote lecture today at 1 p.m. in the Langone Center Forum. His lecture, "AIDS, Race and Sexual Democracy," will address the ways in which racial inequalities are reproduced in relation to the AIDS epidemic.

Another highlight of the conference includes University Poet-in-Residence Sonia Sanchez's reading of "Poems on Peace and Justice" tonight at 8 p.m. in Bucknell Hall.

People are free to attend any of these events. The entire schedule of events is available on the Race/Gender Resource Center's Web site at http://www.departments.bucknell.edu/rgrc/Schedule.htm.

NYC FIRE CHIEF SPEAKS TO CAMPUS

Eric Graham—The Bucknellian

Richard Picciotto, Chief of Battalion 11 in the New York City Fire Department, spoke last week in the Weis Center about his experiences in the south tower of the World Trade Center on Sept. 11. After 29 years on the force, Picciotto will retire at the end of this year.

Sojka receives honorary Doctor of Science

By Alyson Walker
Features Editor

Gary Sojka, professor of biology and former president of the University, recently received an honorary Doctor of Science from Purdue University. The doctorate was presented to recognize and celebrate Sojka's work throughout different facets of higher education, including his role as a teacher, research scholar, faculty mentor and administration member.

Sojka attended Coe College as an undergraduate and did his master's and doctorate studies at Purdue University. He holds a master's degree in microbiology and a doctorate in genetics.

"I was quite pleased with the recognition. Purdue is a major, nationally prominent research-intensive university, and to receive what they consider to be their 'highest honor' brings a certain level of satisfaction," Sojka said.

Prior to his work at the University, Sojka was a professor and chairperson of the biology department at Indiana University. He then became a dean of the College of Arts and Sciences there and was awarded the Senior Class Teaching Award and the Frederic B. Lieber Award for distinguished teaching.

Sojka then came to Lewisburg, becoming the University's 13th president in 1984. He served as president for 11 years, during which the University capital building campaign was funded. The campaign raised $90 million, which was used in the construction of almost half of the current square footage of facility space on campus.

During Sojka's presidency, the University endowment went from $52 million to $142 million and new curriculum plans were formulated for both the College of Arts and Sciences and the College of Engineering.

He was also the interim president of the Pennsylvania Association of Colleges and Universities from 1997-1998.

Sojka is not only happy with the personal tribute, but also with the honor that reflects onto the University.

"I was also very pleased to receive the degree while still active at Bucknell, since that might help in some small way to raise our university's visibility in a part of the world where we may not be as well known as we should be," Sojka said.

Sojka returned to his teaching roots in 1995, joining the University's biology department. He currently serves as the University's academic representative to the NCAA and has been a member of the NCAA

Stechschulte preparing to run for State Congress

By Meghan Fox
Staff Writer

Donald Stechschulte, medical director of Student Health Services (SHS), has recently announced his candidacy for Pennsylvania State Congress.

Stechschulte is competing against Don Sherwood for Pennsylvania's 10th Congressional District. Stechschulte is a registered Democrat running without the endorsement of any political party, but with the hope to rekindle the democratic spirit of the nation.

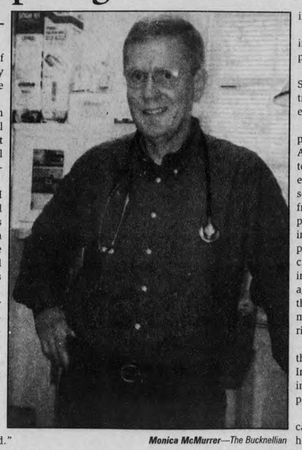
"I think I am honest and forthright and I would serve very well the common, individual American, and I would always put their needs and wants above corporate America. I care a great deal about this country, your generation, the future that my children and grandchildren will live in and I think there are significant changes that need to be brought about," Stechschulte said.

Stechschulte declared that he was running for three reasons. The first was due to his disheartenment with the conduction of the 2000 presidential election.

"Only half of registered voters even bothered to exercise their right to vote, millions of votes were not even counted and the candidate who got the most votes lost," Stechschulte said. "This basically corrupt system perpetuates itself; 99 percent of congressional incumbents were re-elected, less than 5 percent were even seriously challenged."

His second reason for running is rooted in his deep concern for the future of his children and grandchildren.

Finally, he was unimpressed with what the incumbent, Don Sherwood, had to offer.



Monica McMurrer—The Bucknellian

Medical Director Donald Stechschulte plans to leave his post at Student Health Services to run for State Congress. A registered Democrat, Stechschulte will be running against incumbent Don Sherwood.

"At some point you just get tired of writing letters to your congressmen and to the president," Stechschulte said.

The five areas of utmost concern to Stechschulte include health insurance, educational reform, campaign reform, defense and economic policy.

Stechshulte's platform supports "single payer health insurance that guarantees every American total medical care from the womb to the tomb; true educational reform where every American is given the opportunity to seek his or her maximum level of schooling from pre-school through college; true campaign reform that works toward public funding of political campaigns to eliminate both political fund raising and donations by special interests; a rational defense policy focusing on the defense of our nation, not on aggressive unilateral warmongering around the globe" and "an economic policy that maintains the rights of real people against the rights of corporations."

Stechschulte observed that the needs of the average Americans are not being met. Instead, he feels that the individual is becoming less important, and that corporations take precedence over the individual.

"It's unfortunate that the average guy can't get his needs met to the degree I think he should," Stechschulte said. "I think government should be there to help and remember the individual person."

His experience in medicine has also influ-

Public Safety Log

Wednesday, Sept. 18

INFORMATION/SMALL FIRE—Public Safety responded to a fire alarm at McDonnell Hall that was caused by a metal cup being heated in a microwave. A student had used a fire extinguisher to extinguish the fire. The damage was confined to the microwave.

Thursday, Sept. 19

INFORMATION/OFF CAMPUS FIRE—Public Safety responded to St. Catherine Street for the report of a fire in a student's off-campus residence. William Cameron Engine Co. responded and extinguished the fire. Lewisburg Police responded. The students were offered alternate housing. The cause of the fire is under investigation.

THEFT—An employee reported to Public Safety that unknown person(s) had removed an empty personalized oxygen tank from her unlocked vehicle while it was parked in the parking lot at McDonnell Hall. The employee located the tank at her home.

HARASSMENT BY COMMUNICATION—An employee and student reported to Public Safety that a male had been sending offensive photographs of a female student by e-mail to other students/staff. The incident is under investigation.

MEDICAL TRANSPORT—A student contacted Public Safety and requested transportation to Evangelical Hospital Emergency room for treatment of a stomach virus. The Student Health Services driver responded and transported the student to the hospital. The individual later returned to campus.

INFORMATION/SUSPICIOUS MAIL—Public Safety responded to the Langone Center for the report of a suspicious envelope. While investigating, the officer determined the envelope was a University guest housing key envelope. The envelope was removed for disposal.

Friday, Sept. 20

REQUEST FOR IDENTIFICATION—A University official contacted Public Safety and requested to verify the identity of a student providing false identification to gain access to Uptown. The individual, under the age of 21, was cited for providing false information.

Saturday, Sept. 21

UNDERAGE DRINKING/PUBLIC DRUNKENNESS—While on routine foot patrol at the rear of Leiser House, Public Safety observed a group of 10 males talking loudly in the alley. Lewisburg Police responded. One student continued to behave in a disorderly manner while being questioned by the officers. The male was transported to Lewisburg's police station and cited for underage drinking and public intoxication.

UNDERAGE DRINKING/DISORDERLY CONDUCT/FAILURE TO COMPLY/PUBLIC DRUNKENNESS—Public Safety responded to the front of the Langone Center for the report of a fight in progress. After investigating, the officer determined that the person who started the fight was an intoxicated student under the age of 21. East Buffalo Township Police responded. The student was cited for underage drinking, disorderly conduct, public drunkenness and failure to comply.

INFORMATION/FIRE—Public Safety responded to the Academic Quad for the report of a fire. Unknown individuals had made a hut of tree branches, leaves and dry grass. Public Safety used fire extinguishers to extinguish the fire. No witnesses could be located in a search of the area.

INDECENT ASSAULT—A student reported to Public Safety that she was awakened when an unknown male entered her unlocked Roberts Hall room and touched her breast. No witnesses or suspects could be located in a search of the building. A Public Safety alert was issued. The incident is under investigation.

Sunday, Sept. 22

OPEN CONTAINER/DISORDERLY CONDUCT—While on foot patrol in the area of the Special Interest Houses, Public Safety cited a 21-year-old male student who was drinking and carrying a can of beer in his pocket. The male tried to resist arrest. The student was cited by the police and Public Safety with two counts of disorderly conduct.

MEDICAL TRANSPORT/ALCOHOL OVERDOSE—Public Safety responded to Gateway Vidinghoff for the report of a student suffering an alcohol overdose. The individual was transported by ambulance to Evangelical Community Hospital Emergency room for treatment and later returned to campus. The student was charged with underage drinking and public drunkenness.

UNREGISTERED PARTY—Public Safety responded to Phi Kappa Psi Fraternity for a fire alarm activation. Upon arrival, many people were leaving the fraternity. While investigating the alarm, officers discovered beer in a garbage can on the third floor and two fire detectors in the third floor hallway covered with plastic wrap. The fraternity was charged with tampering with fire equipment and University alcohol policy violations relating to student organizations/unregistered party.

CRIMINAL MISCHIEF—A student reported to Public Safety that unknown person(s) carved letters in the driver's side door of his vehicle while it was parked in front of Phi Kappa Psi Fraternity. The incident is under investigation.

ASSIST POLICE/NOISE COMPLAINT—Public Safety responded to Phi Gamma Delta Fraternity to assist Lewisburg Police with a noise complaint. The fraternity officers complied to turning off the music. A citation was issued for loud noise.

INFORMATION/VEHICLE DAMAGE—Public Safety responded to Larison Hall for the report of tree limbs that had fallen on vehicles. The vehicles were not damaged and Physical Plant removed the debris.

Monday, Sept. 23

INFORMATION/GRAFFITI—Public Safety responded to Swartz Hall for the report of graffiti that had been drawn on posters in the hallway two days earlier. A witness reported seeing three unknown males on the hall near the time the graffiti was discovered.

Tau Kappa Epsilon fraternity returning to Greek community

By Andrew Burr
News Editor

With a devoted group of University students leading the way, groundwork has been laid for the recolonization of the Tau Kappa Epsilon (TKE) Fraternity on campus.

"Everybody's coming together for a common cause; it's really going to something incredible," said Chaplain John Siwicki '05, one of the students involved in the recolonization process. "Recolonizing TKE is a passion, so it really doesn't even feel like work."

Establishing a chapter at the University in 1947, TKE was shut down in 1998 following University conduct violations. A movement to reestablish TKE on campus occurred two years ago, although the effort was unsuccessful. Hood Johnston '72, a TKE brother who currently sits on the TKE alumni board, remembers the failed effort.

"We had some solid young men a few years ago ready to recolonize TKE, but they did not get support from the national fraternity the way this program is working," he said.

During rush, the TKE national organization sent two representatives to the University to recruit potential members for a recolonization effort. Remaining on campus, the representatives are currently providing support for the individuals involved in the process.

"In my estimation, the difference [between this effort and the effort two years ago] is entirely in the TKE international approach. This is a brand new program and it seems to be working really well," Johnston said.

According to Assistant Director of Greek Affairs Shauna Irwin, bringing TKE back to campus will "bring more continuity back to the fraternal system," as well as reestablish a Greek presence at the west end of Fraternity Road, where Theta Chi Fraternity and TKE used to be. Irwin described the University's responsibility in the recolonization process as one of support, but not necessarily leadership.

"I can't tell you how excited [the alumni board] is to have this group of men—we are behind them 100 percent. Our function, though, is to stay in the background. We want to the support them, but we also want to let the new members determine the course of the chapter," Johnston said.

The new TKE brothers realize the hardships of recolonizing a fraternity, but President Jeff Puro said he and the other members aren't shying away from the challenge.

"Considering the long, difficult road ahead, I feel morale couldn't be higher. As our brothers come together for event after event we continue to build such a strong sense of brotherhood that we would do anything for each other. We know that this is a challenge, but that only leads us to focus at the task at hand. We know that we will each have the support of our brothers and we are committed to making this thing work," he said.

TKE

"It will take the dedication of these men to make it work, although the University will support them as we would any other organization in the campus community," Irwin said. "I don't see any obstacles to TKE regaining Tower House for fall semester next year."

Johnston also stresses the importance of the ability of the new TKE members to take charge and control the process.

The current members of the TKE recolonization effort are Tom Bitting '05, Vice President David Caribardi '05, Treasurer Jay Del Moore '05, Sergeant at Arms Nick Gallo '05, Eric Graham '05, Mike Grube '05, Aaron Hanlon '04, Rich Karcher '05, New Member Educator and Secretary Stephen Keiluhn '05, Rush Chairman Christopher Mack '05, Thomas Maslin '05, Kevin Powers '05, Puro, Briant Raves '05, Siwicki and Historian Duff Weber '05.

Expo brings job hunt to campus

By Jennifer Jenchura
Senior Writer

The annual Employer Expo, sponsored by the Career Development Center (CDC), was held last Friday in the Fieldhouse. The Expo exhibited 72 different organizations, nine more than last year, and 20 first-time organizations. With approximately 600 students registering for the event, including about 300 seniors, total student attendance was consistent with last year's numbers.

"We were able to bring more new organizations to campus than in the past," CDC Manager of Networking Events Diane Honey said.

From 11 a.m. to 3 p.m., the Fieldhouse enjoyed high participation, as students continuously stopped by, looking to learn more about possible job opportunities.

"We aggressively went after new businesses to bring new employers to the Expo. Despite the economy, there are still good opportunities out there. However, we only wanted organizations that had meaningful opportunities to offer students," CDC Director Laura Denbow said.

Employers had positive comments about the students who attended.

"Many organizations commented on how students were well prepared and well researched about the companies in attendance," Denbow said.

Organizations recruiting on campus brought back over 100 University alumni to participate in the expo.

For the second year in a row, the CDC distributed University pins to alumni recruiters returning to campus. Shaped like the school crest, recruiters easily stood out.

"The pins help to facilitate conversation in what can be an intimidating situation for students," Denbow said.

"We were surprised by how many people brought their pins back from last year. Seeing the pin and knowing that a recruiter is a Bucknell alum is an easy way to break the ice," Honey said.

Matt Hawley '03 spent the summer working for General Electric (GE) and will work full-time for GE after graduation. Although he is not currently an employee, he worked at the GE booth during the Expo.

"It was a little strange to be a company representative standing behind the tables last week, particularly since I'm still an undergraduate. Instead of walking from table to table trying to make the best first impression I could, I was the recruiter. The Expo is a great way for students to get to learn about employers, and for employers to get interested in Bucknell students," Hawley said. "The CDC does a fantastic job at bringing recruiters to Bucknell for the campus community."

Many companies brought back senior employees as well as recent graduates to talk about their organization. Bringing back alumni is purposeful not only for students, but for organizations as well.

"Bringing someone who has organizational history is important. In a tight job market, more alums are becoming apart of the decision-making process. Recent graduates know Bucknell and know about the Bucknell activities students have on their resumes. Recent graduates can give insight to senior decision makers on whom to hire," Denbow said.

"Recent graduates are not in the same shoes as students anymore, but they can give insight into the working world for current students and, at the same time, help their organization hire quality students," Honey said.

Companies such as GE employ this strategy.

"There are a lot of high-caliber, high-talent students on this campus and as a company representative, it's exciting to see the people that will be working for us someday. As the GE Campus Ambassador, I was representing my company and was looking for Bucknellians that would have the 'GE fit,'" Hawley said.

The CDC also hosted several events to help students prepare for the Expo, including resume critiques and mock interview sessions with employers participating at the Expo.

"With so many employers coming to campus we wanted to introduce venues beyond Expo," Denbow said.

The night prior to the Expo, the CDC sponsored a preparation session that included Eli Lilly District Manager Dale Lindsay talking about "The World of Work" and what specific traits he looks for in students who apply to his organization.

"With over 100 students in attendance, it was the biggest prep session for a networking event," Honey said.

The CDC realizes the importance of prep sessions. Before the upcoming New York City Finance Career Fair, several students who obtained internships as a result of last year's fair will be on hand at the prep session for that event.

In addition to employers collecting hard copy resumes at the Expo, many companies in attendance also requested that serious candidates apply online through the Bridge, the CDC's recruiting software. Most companies tell students to apply through the Internet because it has the recruiting interview schedule.

"The Expo is a chance to exchange a resume for a business card. It gets the student's name out there and employers may jot down notes on the back about the candidate's enthusiasm or other notes about the contact. When the resume is submitted again online, employers may prioritize students to interview based on the comments made on the resume received at the Expo. There is a matching process," Denbow said. "The resume posted on the Bridge should not be the students' first interaction with the employer. I imagine lots of students writing thank-you notes to employers they talked with to again let the company know they are very interested."

Even if a student needs to resubmit a resume online, the Expo is a way to start a relationship.

"By the time the employer reads the interview online, the relationship has already started," Honey said.

Collecting paper resumes is also a way for organizations to gauge their competition.

"When companies see resumes online for a position they are offering, they have no idea how many resumes were posted for similar positions with different firms. Companies that gauge their competition with a physical stack of paper are more apt to act harder to recruit students if they don't feel they have collected as many resumes as their competition," Denbow said.

The CDC stresses the importance of finding out when your industry's hiring campaign begins.

"The Expo is the beginning of the job hunt season. Some industries will not hire until later, but it is a good idea to being preparations now," Denbow said.

Industries not fully represented at the Expo, such as the communication and arts industries, have later hiring dates.

"We have so many fairs, such as the Finance Fair in New York City in October and the Communication Fair in the spring, because that is when that particular industry typically hires. Many companies, especially non-profit organizations, do not have resources to come to campus and do not have the money for large training and recruiting programs," Denbow said.

Next month, the second annual Parent to Student Networking Event will be held the Friday of Parents Weekend. Industries such as advertising, consulting and finance will be represented.

Future networking events include Career Panels on Nov. 7, with 10 different career panels composed of alumni in several different industries including law, nonprofit, engineering and health.

Special career nights exclusively for University students will be held in certain cities over winter break. There will be a University presence at each event.

University students are not surprised that Sojka is being honored for teaching excellence because they get to experience it first-hand.

"He's got a good personality and is really easy to get along with," Nick Purdy '03 said. "He really knows how to initiate a good class discussion."

"Sojka was a great professor to have as a first-year student due to his ability to motivate," Jess Kerper '03 said. "He made the foundation seminar enjoyable by adding his entertaining personal anecdotes."

Sojka's biological interests also pervade his home life. He and his wife, Sandy, raise the rare Tunis breed of domestic sheep. The Tunis sheep are an endangered breed and were first introduced to America in Colonial times, and were raised by other great presidents like George Washington and Thomas Jefferson.

U.S. children rescued in Ivory Coast

ABIDJAN, Ivory Coast—French troops secured a school in a rebel-held Ivory Coast city on Wednesday, evacuating some 100 American children and others trapped amid the West African nation's deadliest uprising. The mission came as U.S. troops, deployed to protect or evacuate Americans, arrived Wednesday in the capital, Yamossoukro, and in neighboring Ghana.

NATO prepares military overhaul

WARSAW, Poland—NATO must quickly refocus its military muscle so it can "root out and destroy" threats from terrorists or renegade states, the head of the alliance told defense ministers Tuesday at the start of talks to overhaul the 53-year-old alliance. "NATO played a key role in defeating the threats of the Cold War," Secretary-General George Robertson said. "We must now transform our alliance so that it can play an equally pivotal part in the war against terrorism and the dangers of weapons of mass destruction."As part of that transformation, Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld was to present plans for a rapid response force of about 20,000 U.S., European and Canadian troops capable of mobilizing for combat within a week to 30 days.

Spanish lawmakers debate current tax on diapers

MADRID, Spain—Opposition lawmakers called on Spain's government Wednesday to stop taxing diapers at 16 percent, the same rate as cigarettes and alcohol. Prime Minister Jose Maria Aznar's conservative government used to tax feminine hygiene products at 16 percent, but recently agreed to lower the rate to 7 percent under pressure from the Socialist Party.

Israel unmoved by U.S. criticism

JERUSALEM—Israel stood defiant on Wednesday against pressure from Washington to lift a siege of Yasser Arafat's compound that could hurt U.S. efforts to contain Middle East tensions ahead of possible war with Iraq. Prime Minister Ariel Sharon's government did not respond publicly to a U.S. request to abide by a U.N. resolution calling for an immediate end to the six-day-old siege of the Palestinian leader's headquarters. But Israeli diplomatic sources said Israel had no intention of complying.

India fears more Hindu-Muslim riots

GANDHINAGAR, India—India deployed thousands of troops to prevent an eruption of Hindu-Muslim rioting Wednesday after attackers besieged a major Hindu temple complex in a raid that left 32 people dead, most of them worshippers. India blamed its bitter rival Pakistan for the attack, which lasted 14 hours until Indian commandos stormed the temple at dawn Wednesday and killed the two gunmen. Pakistan denied the accusation, which hiked up tensions between the nuclear-armed neighbors.

Australian Aborigines win back huge area of desert

SYDNEY, Australia—An Australian state has agreed to hand back a slice of desert more than four times the size of Belgium to its traditional Aboriginal owners 50 years after they were driven out. The sprawling state of Western Australia expected a court to ratify this week a deal to return 136,000 square km (53,000 square miles) of land to the 2,000-strong Martu people, a representative for deputy state premier Eric Ripper said on Wednesday.

Myanmar says to reopen Thai border in a few weeks

Fall Fest yields to dreary weather

Over 700 students turn out to enjoy free concert and food before rain begins

By Elisabeth Salemme
Staff Writer

The first Fall Fest was held at the University, uphill behind the Langone Center, on Saturday. The event, which included music, games and food, ended early due to rain.

Fall Fest featured singer-songwriter Howie Day, lead singer Pete Francis of Dispatch and disc jockey Gary Thaniel (DJGT) '04. The And Band was scheduled to perform but was unable to due to rain, but opened for Francis Saturday night at Uptown instead.

"The feedback thus far has all been great. Students loved both Pete Francis and Howie Day," Dean of Campus Activities and Programs Kari Conrad said.

Other activities at the event included tables set up by the sophomore, junior and senior classes. The sophomore table held a pie throwing contest, a ring toss and twister games and provided candy. The junior class provided pizza and the senior class gave away candy.

According to Bucknell Student Government (BSG) President Amir Sadaghiani '03, more than 750 students attended the event.

"Although the weather didn't cooperate towards the end, I think it was a good event and the students who attended really seemed to enjoy it," Conrad said. "It was a laid-back event and both Howie Day and Pete Francis were more than willing to chat with students, give autographs and take pictures. I definitely think we are ready, willing and excited to make this an annual event."

According to Conrad, Fall Fest was an idea that arose in BSG last spring when students indicated they wanted to see more outdoor concert events at the University.

In the past, Sadaghiani said, non-University members accounted for more than 50 percent of the audience at campus concerts. He said that the BSG and students expressed concern about this and suggested a large event in the fall be held as an enjoyable activity for students to attend.

Class of 2004 President Francisco Sanchez organized Fall Fest. He secured the funding from BSG, especially from the sophomore class, and gained support from BSG, including the four class governance groups, the Concert Committee and Activities and Campus Events (ACE).

"I thought it was a really good turnout for an event that has not been done before. I look forward for next year's, for which the planning will start next semester," Sanchez said.

Conrad handled the administrative aspects associated with Fall Fest. She made contracts, coordinated schedules, organized the sound and lighting and helped organize production.

"Basically students discussed what they wanted the event to be and I worked with them to make it happen," Conrad said.

According to Britz, the sophomore class contributed more than $700 to the event. The junior and senior classes also provided funding.

"I think it was a success even with the rain. People who came had a wonderful time. As long as the weather holds out, Fall Fest could become a fall tradition," Britz said. "It could be better if each class could have taken on more. We had a temporary committee for the event this year, but I would like to see a permanent committee with fundraising."

"We are working to make [Fall Fest] a permanent event and we are trying to get some permanent funding. Some improvements that we will try to make are to put a full tent over the stage in case of rain, and we will try to get more campus clubs and organizations involved."
—BSG President Amir Sadaghiani '03

Sadaghiani also indicated that Fall Fest is likely to become an annual University event.

"We are working to make [Fall Fest] a permanent event and we are trying to get some permanent funding," Sadaghiani said. "Some improvements that we will try to make are to put a full tent over the stage in case of rain, and we will try to get more campus clubs and organizations involved. This year's Fall Fest only had four booths, but with more than 120 clubs on campus, we would like to have 30 or 40 booths to show what they are about."

"I want to thank everyone for coming. It was great how people stayed, even when it was raining, to help clean up," Sanchez said.

Fire Chief speaks about Sept. 11

By Jim Leahy
Senior Writer

Speaking at the Weis Center, New York Fire Chief Richard Picciotto recalled the morning of Sept. 11 at his firehouse on Manhattan's Upper West Side. As part of a lecture series and promotional tour for his new book, "Last Man Down," Picciotto brought his story, along with powerful pictures of the morning of Sept. 11, to the University Tuesday night.

In his new book, Picciotto recounts the harrowing details of his trip into and up the World Trade Center, the ride down and the escape from the rubble. The account has been widely acclaimed. The Washington Times said the book "grabs the reader by the collar as the north tower collapses. So gut wrenching is the telling, one is tempted to hope that the rumble of American B-52s over Afghanistan sounds as terrifying to the enemy as the 'sick, black noise' that enveloped Chief Picciotto and his men that day."

As a 28-year veteran of the force and Chief of Battalion 11, Picciotto was an experienced member of the force and a dedicated firefighter. Sitting around and enjoying the company of his fellow firefighters, the call came to turn on the television. Knowing the consequences of what he saw more than most—Picciotto was one of the first on the scene when the World Trade Center was bombed in 1993—he asked for permission to go downtown. He also knew that Sept. 11 "was going to be the worst day of my life."

Picciotto arrived on the scene after both planes had hit and entered the north tower. He knew there were people above the fire—he saw many of them jumping from as many as 110 stories up—and he wanted to get to them. Knowing that rescue was his main mission, Picciotto led his group up the narrow stairwells. The firefighters were carrying 60-100 pounds of equipment up the 42-inch wide stairwells. The building had three of these stairwells and over 40 elevator shafts where more than 90 elevators worked to get the more than 25,000 people that worked inside each tower to their offices. But the elevators were useless at that point.

As he reached the 35th floor, the south tower of the complex began to collapse. He explained that from above, the amazing noise of collapse began to get closer. The noise was as loud as anyone could imagine multiplied by 100. With the collapse passing the floor he was on, he could feel the noise inside him and then seconds later everything was quiet.

As the top official in the tower, he made an instant decision to evacuate any firefighters inside and get as many people as possible out. Picciotto was on his way down when his crew came across a group of disabled workers on the 12th floor. While he and his group mobilized the disabled workers, the noise and wind began again—however, this time it was his building going down. As the noise got louder, Picciotto remembers seeing his wife and kids flash in front of him, praying very loudly and asking, "Please God, make it quick."

When the noise and motion finally stopped, he realized that he was alive. Calling around him, there were other voices. In all, Picciotto found that there were 12 firefighters, one Port Authority Police Officer and Josephine, one of the disabled workers, alive in the stairwell.

Keeping as calm as he could, Picciotto attempted to contact the outside world. About five hours later, the entire group was rescued alive. When he emerged, he surveyed the eerie scene. "I thought it was a nuclear bomb—there was utter devastation, twisted metal and buildings on fire," he said.

Picciotto realizes that the events of that day have changed the country. He said that the best in America was realized, new values were instilled and there is a greater emphasis on friends and family now. He also realizes that there is a need to support the firefighters in the country because "they are on the front lines in the war against terror."

Picciotto will retire at the end of this year, but his son will be taking the test to become a New York City firefighter and to carry on a family legacy.

The Student Lectureship Committee sponsored Picciotto's appearance in the Weis Center. Committee Chair Merisa Levine '05 said Picciotto was chosen because the committee thought that "this would be an excellent way for the Bucknell community to continue to reflect on the events of Sept. 11."

"[I] was really impressed by his account of Sept. 11. I think that he gave the Bucknell community a personal account of the events of Sept. 11 that will leave a mark on their lives. His account truly moved me and I was impressed with the poise and grace that he delivered his speech," Levine said.

"Even though it has been a year, I feel that Picciotto brought the reality of Sept. 11 home to Bucknell. He told the straight story as seen through the eyes of a survivor and firefighter," Nora Samuelson '05 said. "Merisa Levine deserves many thanks for her hard work to make the event happen."

Although the events of Sept. 11 have been covered over and over again, this is the first time I have heard a firsthand account. I, and most of the students and members of the community that I spoke with after the talk, felt that having Chief Picciotto here to give us his experience would help bring closure to that day of infamy," Kang Tchou '05 said.

Art takes a new form

Sandi-Jo Galati—The Bucknellian

Taking a little over a week to complete, seven students in Professor of Art William Lasansky's Elementary Sculpture class constructed the monuments seen last week in the Academic Quad. Required only to build a "dwelling" out of sticks and branches found near the Art Barn, the students decided to build an array of inhabitants as well.

enced his platform and was a factor in his decision to run for public office.

"I'm a physician and I've spent half my life in medicine. I know the system, the good things and the bad things, and I am most familiar with the medical issues. I've always been involved in education and I feel that I know about those issues, too," Stechschulte said.

Stechschulte served on the Lewisburg School Board for 18 months and has worked at the University as the Medical Director for the past 10 years.

Born and raised in Pittsburgh, Stechschulte proceeded to earn a B.A. at Denison University, a Master of Divinity at Princeton Theological Seminary and an M.D. from the Universidad Central del Este in the Dominican Republic.

> "To say I support the war on drugs isn't enough. It isn't helping central Pennsylvania."
> —Donald Stechschulte, medical director of Student Health Services*

Stechschulte describe his time in the Dominican Republic as "an incredible new experience," and has since been involved in the Bucknell Brigade.

"Dr. Stechschulte is a man of the greatest integrity and concern for the welfare of others," said Charles Pollock '70, vice president of student affairs. "He has demonstrated this in innumerable ways over time, from his local community service to his pivotal role with the Bucknell Brigade, to his dedication to the university's students. He would make a wonderful public servant of any kind."

For Stechschulte, the bottom line is "we can do better!" These words echo throughout his announcement for candidacy and his Web site (www.electastech.org).

With regard to national defense, Stechschulte asked, "Having us involved as a military presence around the world, is that necessary? We are supposed to be the most advanced democracy ... I think we can do better."

Stechschulte also claims the war on drugs is not working.

"To say I support the war on drugs isn't enough. It isn't helping central Pennsylvania," Stechschulte said.

After citing Pennsylvania as the location with the highest opium overdoses in the nation, he proposed putting our money to better use and trying new options.

"I think what I would like to bring to the position is looking at problems from the same perspective that one looks at medical problems," Stechschulte said. "One of the downsides to being a physician is that you have to tell people bad news, but you tell them the truth. I think very few are willing to stand up and say that we have a problem today."

Director of Financial Aid Laszewski leaves

By Jaclyn Carr
Writer

After 23 years of service, Ronald T. Laszewski has left his position at the University as Director of Financial Aid.

Laszewski will be working with the Pennsylvania Higher Education Assistance Agency in Harrisburg, managing state grants and handling loans for Pennsylvania citizens.

"It is always difficult to lose people with that number of years at the University," Vice President for Enrollment Management Kurt Thiede said.

Laszewski has always been very involved with financial aid organizations. Before his career at the University, he was president of the Pennsylvania Association of Student Financial Aid Administrators.

"The job of replacing 23 years of experience at Bucknell will definitely be a challenging one; the search committee has its work cut out for it," Thiede said.

The search committee is already reviewing applicants for the position and two to three candidates will be invited back to the campus sometime in mid-October.

"The search is well in place in moving forward to set leadership for the future," Thiede said. "We are working closely with staff iduring this time of transition."

Dennis Hopple, who is working with the search committee, hopes to secure a new head of financial aid before the admissions process for the Class of 2007 begins.

"The financial aid department can now focus on looking for a new director since the admissions process has come to a close and won't start up again until November and December when early decision applications begin to arrive," Hopple said.

The director of financial aid is a significant position, since the University loans out $45 million in financial aid to students. Presently, a little less than half of University students are on financial aid. These numbers are slowly evening out as the years progress as changes occur in economics and student demographics.

At the Open House this past weekend for the fall class of 2007, about 75-100 people sat in on the financial aid session that was held.

The position also stresses a public relations aspect. Families and students go through a lengthy process that may include meeting with the financial aid director to discuss the amount of the loan being given.

"The Director of Financial Aid is a very important position in many ways, but particularly in terms of balancing a tremendous financial responsibility to the University with the need to treat each individual student's situation carefully," Thiede said.

Weekend filled with fun and unique activities

Last weekend, the University provided three successful events. Friday's Pub Night at Uptown, Saturday afternoon's Fall Fest and Saturday night's football game proved to bring University students together and gave students a variety of options for the weekend.

Approximately 170 people showed up at Uptown throughout the night, despite the fact that the Lewisburg Pub Crawl was the same night. Also, the weekend was the first that fraternities could have registered parties. According to Manager of Uptown Tasha Henderson, people generally stayed at Uptown for one to two hours. Staying for that amount of time illustrates that students were not merely stopping at Uptown before going somewhere else. Instead, students used the venue to spend time with friends.

Students at Uptown were given a bracelet with three tabs that could be traded for wine, beer or soda. According to Henderson, many students left Uptown with tabs still on their bracelets. This again shows that students were not necessarily going to Uptown to get all free drinks.

Even though most of the comments about the night were positive, students suggested that instead of a disc jockey, background music be played. This change would make it easier for students to have conversations without having to shout over the music.

Despite Saturday's rain, Fall Fest was a fun activity for students and other members of the University community. More than 750 people attended the event. Like Pub Night, Fall Fest gave students and others an opportunity to enjoy the festivities in a laid back atmosphere. Both Howie Day and Dispatch's Pete Francis signed autographs after the show.

The idea for Fall Fest came about last year when students expressed interest in having more outdoor concerts. Although well attended, Fall Fest would have been more of a success had it not prematurely ended due to rain. The And Band delayed its show until later that evening because of rain.

A third unique and well-attended event of the weekend was Saturday night's football game. The attendance at this game showed that the University community has school spirit. The University should have more night football games. Not only do more people attend night games than day games, but the night games also provide another activity to fill a weekend night.

The Bucknellian praises the University for its efforts for holding three successful events last weekend. Many times, students complain about the lack of things going on at the University. Last weekend's Pub Night, Fall Fest and night football game gave students many fun and unique options.

Bush has plans for next empire

By Mike Niebauer
Senior Writer

Two articles in recent issues of The New Yorker clearly illustrate the intellectual groundwork the Bush administration is following concerning the situation in Iraq.

It is no accident that this White House has articulated such an organized opposition to Iraq. Vice President Richard Cheney, at the end of the first Bush presidency, formed a team from the Defense and State Departments and academia to plan the next quarter century in world politics.

National Security Advisor Condoleezza Rice, Deputy Secretary of Defense Paul Wolfowitz, former National Security Council Director for Near East and South Asian Affairs Richard Haass and other notables are known by one former Pentagon official as "the resistance is futile crowd," which describes their fixated obsession on their developed worldview. Their effort is admirable; they have been working on it since 1991. The sad fact is that it will keep the United States the prime target of hostilities for the foreseeable future.

Within three years, if the military expenditures already in the legislative pipeline are fully funded, the United States will be spending more than the entire defense and military budgets of the rest of the world combined. If the ideas developed over the last decade or so "happen," we will need all of those funds.

Think of an overwhelming international force that can enforce its will in every sphere of influence. The Cheney policy group is working toward and honestly proposing a "no compromise stance" against all powers that disagree with our foreign policy and economic issues.

If this sounds like the power grab of an empire, you are paying proper attention.

The world has not seen anything like this situation since the end of the Roman Empire. The Chinese press has called this new idea, perhaps properly describing it as, "offensive realism" that declares a strategy of preemptive policies military and otherwise against any power that may oppose U.S. policy.

What does this say about the future? Perhaps what is worked out in this policy group during a decade-long idea exchange needs a rethink:

How can we operate in an interconnected, global economy as if people on one side of one border have preeminence over everyone else? This whole U.S. exclusivity concept is not sustainable economically since without "those other people" buying our exports, our economy deteriorates.

The "offensive" nature of the Cheney group's ideas will continually need reassessment since it will generate opposition from other powers (China, India, European Union, etc.) as natural resources run out and the policy goes into a mode of foreign policy for strategic minerals and energy supplies.

Are we to believe that the rest of the world will quietly stand by while the United States is grabbing for the last of the world's highly prized commodities like oil and fresh water resources? Rome did not begin as an empire, it became one over time. Are we sure we want to take a similar route in the 21st century?

Bush has not asked the American people to change our wasteful economic lifestyles one bit. The marketplace fundamentalism of his policy believes that any bad news will harm markets so we will not address them domestically, foreign policy will take care of resource shortages or politically embarrassing corporate scandals.

To have us obsessively seek foreign natural resources through foreign policy is obviously morally suspect. This "might is right" attitude combined with a denial about the realities of limited resources in a world fossil fuel-based economy is unsustainable and will ultimately fail. We will need that military advantage, or to rethink this new American policy attitude or prepare to be a perpetual target.

United States wants to start war in order to stop war

By Kevin Brown
Writer

Last week President George W. Bush went before the United Nations asking for support in a war against Iraq. Stating that the integrity of the United Nations would be ruined if it did not act, Bush warned that the United States would be ready to fight a war with or without U.N. support. But even at home, many people, including members of Bush's staff, are skeptical about the need to go back to the Persian Gulf.

Brent Scowcroft, National Security adviser to Bush's father said, "An attack on Iraq would seriously jeopardize, if not destroy, the global counterterrorist campaign we have undertaken." Saddam Hussein is a problem, that is clear, it was clear in 1995, it was clear in 1998 also, but what isn't clear is why our president is hastily trying to go to war.

Attacking Iraq is like trying to squeeze an extra helping onto an already full plate of problems.

Many will argue that because of Sept. 11 we should preemptively strike our enemies. Get them today so they won't get us tomorrow. Using that same logic, we know who our enemy is (al-Qaida), and we have removed them from power in Afghanistan. Iraq was not involved on Sept. 11 and has even kept a relatively low profile of late, considering its track record. If everything in the world was fun and games, and Saddam and Iraq were the last stronghold of "evil" (if we want to hedonistically categorize things), then maybe an attack on Iraq would seem justified, but there are other problems that require our immediate attention.

We should be following up with our ventures in Afghanistan, training U.S. military and attempting to establish a legitimate and accepted government. We should also be doing more to aid our sagging economy at home. Attacking Iraq is like trying to squeeze an extra helping onto an already full plate of problems. After defeating Iraq in a war, our country would be forced to station troops there in the future to ensure peace. Any war in Iraq will become a long-term commitment.

The most important thing to keep in mind when we look at this issue "What will happen if we invade Iraq?" The operation will likely start from the air, and after superiority has been gained, ground forces will be moved in, which is what Saddam would hope for. If the United States is caught in an urban jungle war all of our superior technology and information will be useless. The results could be an asphalt Vietnam. In a mock-up of an urban combat site, 22 of the 27 Marines involved were "killed" in an enhanced game of lazer tag.

Perhaps a more recognizable example of this would be from the 1993 campaign in Somalia, as illustrated by the recent film "Black Hawk Down." In the film, 18 Marines were killed in brutal street fighting in under 24 hours. U.S. military sources said that fatality rates could be in the neighborhood of 30 percent. That figure combined with the threat of chemical weapons of which Saddam is rumored to have built up a large supply, could produce horrible effects for our troops and civilians.

Aside from the direct effects of a potentially drawn out urban war, there are other things to worry about. The Gulf War helped foster the hatred of al-Qaida terrorist group, so the possibility exists that we could create new enemies by trying to stamp out an old enemy. Also, assuming that the United Nations refuses to participate in the invasion, what will the other countries hanging delicately in the balance of Middle Eastern peace, think of our actions? Another minor consideration (in comparison to the loss of human life) is what a war in the Mid East will do for oil prices in America. These are only some of the question marks that come to mind.

I leave you with this: From 1945-1990, America had the U.S.S.R. as an enemy, which posed a threat in a way that Saddam can not even dream of, yet not one shot was fired. We won that war through the patience of many long years. We waited and watched as system of government was abandoned and a new one, similar to ours, was adopted. If we can live with that threat for that long, then I think our only course of action is to show patience. War should be the ultimate last alternative; all diplomatic solutions should be tried and tried again before war is ever considered.

Possible to be homosexual and Christian

By Phil Martoma
Senior Writer

I was browsing the Web yesterday and happened to visit a site called godhatesfags.com. I must say that I found it to be a laugh at first, reading and pointing to the many fallacies of logic that the great Rev. Fred Phelps has to say on the issue of homosexuality and religion. Normally, I have a relatively thick skin when it comes to this particular issue and will not be easily moved by the common criticisms some Christians make against homosexuals. This is most probably because when I find myself in the midst of an argument between Christians and homosexuals, I realize that I always end up in the middle being both a Christian and a homosexual. Yes, that's right! Don't look back and reread that last sentence! I am a Christian AND a homosexual.

Being a member of both groups tends to cause friends from both sides to razz me about both issues. Yes, I used the word razz, so I'm gay and not that hip. Nevertheless, I found it interesting when one student told me that she felt completely disenchanted with Christianity in general because of all the groups it oppresses (including homosexuals), and couldn't wait for its eventual extinction as an opiate to the masses. Yes, she used the word opiate to the masses … I have weird friends. In any event, I have never recognized any contradiction between my sexual orientation and my belief in God. However, many people do, and don't hesitate to tell me so.

More often than not, people who are disenchanted with Christianity like to point to its flaws in trying reach out to all people while leaving so many disempowered and oppressed. You see examples of this when mainstream churches (which rarely agree on anything) can always agree to deny the sanctification of gay marriages. Also, it will be a big theological jump before we see true equality, and women are allowed to be priests or other church leaders in all mainstream denominations. I understand the church is ages away from being an equal opportunity employer. Yet, I do not think this should be equated with disenchantment with God, which is a separate issue.

Still, when I talk to other Christians, it does seem there is a lack of urgency or immediacy to the cause of helping historically disempowered groups see that their claims and desires are met. I think most people feel this way and they do not agree with those Christians like the Phelps who take the spotlight most often. Sometimes, though, I admit, the deeds and actions of other Christians can make me truly disgusted with being a Christian. I was emotionally, and spiritually hurt today when I saw that godhatesfags.com's picture of Matthew Shepard burning in hell complete with his dire screams saying, "For God's sake! Listen to Phelps!" Phelps' message that homosexuals will burn in hell is old and provincial at best and sensationalistic at worst. I say this because people who claim to be men of God should not simply use arguments full of fallacies to gain attention which more credence to those who would say our religion is only about hate-speech.

What I think is interesting is that the Bucknell Conservatives Club has published articles in past issues of their "Counterweight" claiming that the rights of those who believe homosexuality is a sin are stifled because of the acts of the University's policies to promote tolerance. However, such articles were written by Christians. In one of their initial e-mails to the campus, they included a statement saying that students should join if they felt that Christians have just as much a right to speak as homosexuals. How they presume such a dichotomy is beyond me. My only response to them is that the Christians who write such statements are forgetting that the Lord certainly made more than one commandment and they (as Christians) seem to be choosing selectively which ones should be shouted the loudest. They forget that the Bible also says that we (Christians) are endeavoring to keep the unity of the Spirit.

If the Conservatives Club is at all powered by Christians, then I would challenge anyone one of them to come to the Friends of Lesbians and Gays, Bisexual and Transgender (LGBT) meetings in order seek to ally spiritually with those who are different from them rather than simply saying that LGBT folk are immoral. I would challenge any one of them to make a bond with me as a fellow Christian, before ignoring me as a gay rights activist. If they can only do the latter, then they prove here and now that one group is truly more accepting than the other. If that is the case then it would appear that my non-Christian friends are acting in more of a Christian manner than many of these Christians. I personally would be split in half if I believed that had to be the case. I do believe it is possible to be both a Christian and a homosexual, despite the objections of those who would disagree with me.

Taboos should not enter everyday life

By Katie Parker
Senior Writer

There's nothing taboo about actually being a woman. I'm a woman, maybe you are, and we all know lots of them … no problems, right?

The fact remains that many aspects of femininity remain cultural taboos, despite the fact that we make up half of the population. In some cases, these taboos are remnants of patriarchal society; in other cases, they are the result of social pressures inflicted on women by women themselves. In no way am I suggesting that everybody plays into these cultural stereotypes, but if you are a woman, you have at one time been a victim of one of these misattributions; therefore, I feel they are important to address in some type of public forum.

The major taboos still present in our culture are sexual. One, the anatomically correct term for a woman's genitalia, "vagina," still sends our culture into an uproar, as evidenced by the hotly contested debate surrounding "The Vagina Monologues" on campus and across the nation. Many people have argued that it's not the word that really matters, but rather the "negative" messages being conveyed about the word, and the lack of positive male representation within the play itself.

But come on. It's not really the messages being conveyed about the vagina, because we see and hear those types of messages all the time. Our culture's increasing tolerance of pornography suggests that open images of female masturbation and sexual pleasure are socially acceptable, provided that they are displayed as deviant and disconnected. These images are no longer exclusive to the underworld of pornography, as they now crop up on cable television and in music videos.

Our society's comfort with female sexuality even extends to the Susquehanna Valley Mall, where vibrators and lubricants are available in Spencer Gifts, suggesting that autonomous female sexuality is fine as long as you're willing to pay for (and subject yourself to) the cute consumerist version.

So the issue with Eve Ensler's play is probably not a virtuous knee-jerk reaction to the lack of positive sexual messages, but rather the implications of reclaiming the cold and clinical word "vagina" as a proud and positive term—the idea that it can be spoken and heard without a sense of deviance or shame, the idea that it doesn't have to be hidden behind a million negative colloquialisms to be acceptable.

Another sexual taboo in our culture is that of menstruation (yes, boys and girls, I went there). Of course I'm not suggesting that anybody be absolutely in-your-face with her period, because, as most bodily functions should be, it's a fairly private thing. However, most women are taught from a very young age to be especially private about menstruation to avoid ridicule from classmates, and, as we get older, to avoid having our menstrual cycle be considered as some sort of character flaw. How many times are women accused of having PMS because they are angry, tired or snappy? How many times do women themselves attribute their feelings to PMS in order to downplay the response to their true emotions?

There are two reasons that this type of misattribution is dangerous: 1) because it forces women to justify and account for any emotions that they feel are not culturally acceptable, and 2) because it reinforces a stereotype that menstruating women are angry and bitter creatures, in turn reinforcing the belief that menstruation itself is corrupt and dissolute. This silence is dangerous because menstruation is a health issue in a long line of hushed women's health concerns (rape, abortion, eating disorders) that will never be fully addressed unless women feel safe and comfortable enough in our society to address them.

A final cultural taboo that is particularly relevant to our campus is the taboo on "feminism." A woman who proclaims herself a feminist will immediately be met in most circles with resistance and sometimes ridicule. This taboo is based on a stereotype of "radical feminism," which makes up a tiny portion of feminism. By definition, a feminist is someone who supports organized activity on the behalf of women's rights and interests, and someone who supports theories of political, economic and social equality of the sexes (which means that even guys can be feminists, and there are several male feminists on this campus). "Feminist" should not be equated with "dyke" or "man-hater," and it certainly shouldn't produce the type of narrow-minded defensive response that it frequently does from both men and women. Yet it does, because culturally there remains something inherently subversive about a group of women congregating to combat cultural norms and standards relating to their sex.

The only way to fight these cultural taboos is to stop allowing them to filter through our day-to-day discourse. By allowing them to continue, you are not only hindering the development and recognition of women as equal citizens of the world, but you are reinforcing the stereotype that femininity and feminine sexuality are subversive and wrong.

Letter to the editor

Ceremony provides chance for self examination

To the Editor,

I write to disagree about a particular point in your Sept. 13 editorial. While I agree that the program, "Remembrance, Reflection and Renewal" was important for the community to mark Sept. 11, and I share your sentiments that the event was carefully planned and served a useful purpose, I disagree with the negative perceptions of Rabbi Serena Fujita's remarks.

As an educator at an institution of higher learning, the rabbi called on us to reflect on the long-lasting effects of that tragic day. Drawing on the traditions of her faith, she asked us to consider what had transpired in the last year and to reflect on our individual and collective responses. While praising the United States as "a great society," one whose citizens rallied to show support in the days and weeks after our nation was attacked, Fujita pointed out that in the estimation of many and in the eyes of the international community, there are ways in which we as a nation, and indeed the global community, fell short of a transformative response to suffering and loss. She asked that as we move through our grief and dismay, we contemplate the question "how can we internalize what were true acts of kindness and continue to perform them without the stimulus of a tragic event?" How can we transform this monumental experience, take pride in the heroes, unite as a people, show strength and support to make the world a better place?

To me the request was entirely appropriate; rather than interpret it as a negative outlook on humanity, I believe the speaker was calling us to look deeper into our individual behavior and national actions, to reach farther across the divides of history, wealth, religion and culture, and to strive toward the best of what we can be, through truly united acts of compassion and duty to humanity.

The word rabbi means teacher. Sometimes the most effective teachers are those that move us from our comfort zone, challenge us to think about alternatives to the way things are, and push us toward solving problems that seem impossible. I personally Rabbi Fujita for being willing to say what might make some uncomfortable and for calling us to be our best selves.

Sincerely,
Janice Butler

Off campus living coming to an end

By Aaron Hanlon
Staff Writer

Apparently, soured town-gown relations and a few incidences of public urination have ruined it for all of us. The University wants to eliminate the option of off-campus living and bring us all under its "protective" umbrella of mass regulation. In all likelihood, some Lewisburg residents are also ready to kick University students back onto campus as well. And who could blame them? How would you feel about stumbling over passed-out partygoers in your front yard and on your sidewalk on the way to your car in the morning?

But off-campus living provides students with a combination of freedoms and responsibilities that cannot be enjoyed while living on campus. Freedoms and responsibilities from which the students, the University, and the town can benefit.

This is not to say that on-campus conditions are completely unsatisfactory. With the exception of (as it in 2000 in Swartz Hall) water fountains filled with vomit and radiators circulating mold spores that caused a perpetual state of illness, on-campus living is more than adequate.

Furniture and room sizes are, for the most part accommodating, and are kept relatively clean. Regardless of how pristine your bathrooms are, those who live on campus can almost never rid themselves of one particular antigen: I have nothing against Resident Assistants (R.A), but they are all aware of their unpopularity when duty calls and they have to bust someone.

The unfortunate truth is that the University considers the standard collegiate social function to be illegal. All who wish to partake in alcohol need to get away from R.A.s to do so. Off-campus living provides an opportunity for those of us who are not fraternity members (though you may have read otherwise) and who are roughly 21 (give or take a year or so), to play drinking … rather … card and pingpong ball games; to do what college students have been doing since either college or booze was invented.

Contrary to popular belief, student benefits of off-campus living extend far beyond the facilitation of parties in the absence of R.A.s. Those who live off-campus have the responsibility of being not a only resident in, but also a citizen of a real, live municipality.

This includes paying rent and bills on time and properly maintaining the property. There is not a custodial staff to do your cleaning, to shovel your snowy walkway or to mow your lawn (if you have one). Being part of a municipality entails respecting your neighbors and following municipal guidelines. Eventually, we will all have to learn to not be loud and obnoxious all the time, to maintain a household, to use the toilet and not the back yard. These are all extraordinarily important experiences and responsibilities to have, particularly for those moving out into the real world in the next year few years.

Off-campus living can also be beneficial to the University and to Lewisburg. By allowing a number of students to live off-campus, the University has more room for other students and, as a result, fewer students cramped in small rooms with one or more roommates.

Keeping off campus housing will also decrease confrontation with students who party and drink. Though "less confrontation" may be a bad excuse for relaxing the University crackdown on drinking, the vast majority of students seem to drink responsibly. Regardless of where students live, there will always be a few who cannot adequately regulate their alcohol intake and stay out of trouble. Though those few will be a burden on Lewisburg's residents, having students and residents live among each other can ultimately be a positive experience for both, if for no other reason than that sharing conversations, meals and camaraderie with neighbors are experiences.

By keeping students on campus, there will be less interaction between Lewisburg and the University. As they become more segregated, relations are bound to deteriorate. Even the ideal of a peaceful but separate coexistence is a depressing one when compared to a potentially harmonious mixture of students and residents. If the University were to take away the option of off-campus living, all of these things would be taken away with it. Let us prove ourselves and be on our best behavior downtown. And let us stand up to the University and let them know that they can take our tuition, but they can never take our room and board fees.

Former Vice President's speech criticizes President's war on Iraq

By Michael Dudzinski
Staff Writer

Former Vice President Al Gore spoke in California on Monday, addressing the current relationship between the United States and Iraq. Gore is among many who question Bush's eagerness for war.

Former Vice President Al Gore whipped up his first major public speech in San Francisco on Monday, criticizing President George W. Bush for instigating unnecessary conflict with Iraq.

According to the Associated Press, the former presidential candidate expressed concern that the war on terror is losing its focus. He supported this assertion by stating that the American people have become more concerned about the actions of the U.S. government than those of terrorists.

Gore also warned that the United States has not resolved the issues surrounding Sept. 11, allowing support for the war to rapidly diminish. CNN noted that a prime concern among the public is that the perpetrators of the war have not been brought to justice.

Gore advocates that military action should not be used against Iraq because it would threaten the integrity of the war on terror.

Bush's disregard for peace and international law drew much criticism from Gore. The former vice president asserted that the issue with Iraq could be addressed through diplomatic rather than military means.

Gore argued that the United States, the United Nations and American allies should work together to eliminate any threat from Iraqi President Saddam Hussein. He stressed that military action may pose a great threat to global security and perpetuate anti-American sentiment around the globe.

Bush has proposed that Congress allow him to use all means necessary to oust Hussein. In Gore's view, the implications of Bush's demands are troublesome because they are vague and do not outline any specific course of action.

On Monday, former President Jimmy Carter cautioned Bush of the dangers that America could face if he does not comply with the United Nations on Iraq. Carter further mentioned that the issue has prompted a radical transformation in U.S. policy that could damage foreign relations.

Gore's position caused a rift among congressional Democrats. While some agree with Gore's stance, Sen. Lieberman, D-Conn., openly supports Bush's intent to use all force necessary against Iraq. According to CNN, Lieberman and House Minority Leader Dick Gephardt both feel that Bush has made his case against Iraq with great effectiveness. Lieberman urged the need for the United States to create an international coalition against Iraq, although such action has not proven successful.

According to MSNBC, Gore also acknowledged that the multi-billion dollar military initiative would be funded from the pocket of every American taxpayer. He urged Bush to go all the way if he decides to use force on Iraq, an action mistakenly not taken by his father in 1991.

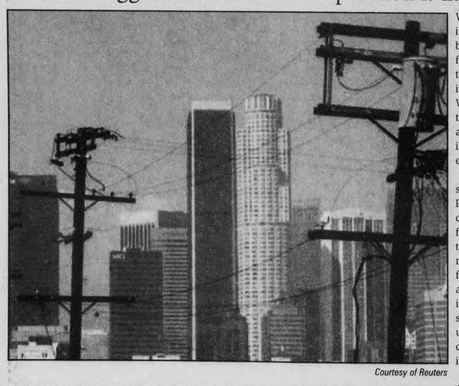
Gore implied that the government's failure to deal effectively with the Gulf War has perpetuated another conflict and the taxpayers are forced to pay the consequences. The former vice president warned of the problems that the United States may face if Bush plans to end the war in Iraq in the same manner as he did in Afghanistan.

He argued the Bush administration's stance would only prompt further foreign aggression against the United States. Gore particularly emphasized that Bush should not allow anything to distract us from the mission of avenging the murder of 3,000 Americans on Sept. 11, according to MSNBC.

Meanwhile, those who favor military action were quick to denounce Gore's statements as irrelevant and lacking credibility.

Energy corporation added to list of U.S. companies under legal investigation

Evidence suggests that El Paso Corporation is liable for energy crisis in California



Courtesy of Reuters

During the California energy crisis, rolling blackouts were instituted due to severe energy shortages. Energy companies in the region are currently facing charges for withholding valuable energy resources in order to maximize profit.

By Jim Leahy
Senior Writer

The summer of financial scandals created some interesting market conditions and some tough times. We had WorldCom, Enron and Adelphia; the list seems endless. On top of all this, new allegations and new scandals appear every week.

This week, the El Paso Corporation hit the front pages. During the past few months, the Federal Energy Regulatory Commission (FERC) has been conducting an investigation into the company and its possible role in the California power crisis.

On Monday, FERC dealt an early blow to El Paso over the company's dealings. In a case brought by the Public Utilities Commission of the State of California, Chief Administrative Law Judge for FERC Curtis L. Wagner ruled that the company was indeed liable for the problems in California.

During 2000 and 2001, when energy prices in California skyrocketed, El Paso apparently withheld some of its gas*in an effort to force the utilities to pay more. The New York Times reported on Monday that "El Paso Natural Gas held back at least 10 percent of the capacity on its pipeline delivering gas from its Southwest gas fields to California from November 2000 to March 2001.

"El Paso used its dominance of the southern California market to inflate the price of gas sold there by $3.7 billion. Southern California Edison, a large investor-owned utility, said high natural gas prices added $1 billion to the cost of energy produced at its gas-fired power plants." Wagner's ruling said that in addition to holding back capacity, El Paso failed to report to regulators how much capacity it had in its pipelines. Wagner also asked FERC to institute penalties against El Paso for violating pipeline rules and for exercising market power.

There could be some serious outcomes for El Paso. The Houston-based company has been under fire since California went through its tough summer. The company now faces numerous lawsuits and will have to defend itself against the four-person commission. If FERC upholds the decision, the case will probably make its way to federal court.

Late Monday, El Paso disputed the results. According to The Wall Street Journal, "The company, in a written statement, said the judge's ruling was 'unsupported by the evidence' and that 'the evidence demonstrates that the pipeline was full to the extent permitted by safety and operational considerations and, therefore, El Paso Natural Gas could not have exercised market power.'"

Others are happy about the decision. Sen. Dianne Feinstein, D-Calif., said in The New York Times that El Paso made the financial pinch on the utilities worse. "Because so much of California's electricity supply is fueled by natural gas, this meant that electricity prices went through the roof, causing hardship to the publicly-owned utilities and to the state, neither of which could pass on these high prices to California consumers."

"We view this as a very significant victory," said Kevin J. Lipson, an attorney for Edison International, in The Washington Post. Edison is the owner of one of California's largest utilities and a major opponent of El Paso. "This is the first time the federal government has spoken on the issue of who is responsible for the California energy crisis."

Paul Patterson, a New York-based independent energy analyst, said that if FERC upholds the judge's decision, it could bring substantial litigation against El Paso related to the higher power prices and electricity blackouts, The Wall Street Journal reported. "That's what worries people about this," he said, "and that's why everybody's just freaking out."

A commentator on TheStreet.com's subscriber site, RealMoney.com, added to the debate with his view on the trouble that El Paso could be facing. Chris Edmonds said, "The opinion does suggest that El Paso may not have been as close to a universal settlement with the state of California as once thought. Clearly, Wagner's ruling could be interpreted as a signal that negotiations need to heat up again or additional rulings could come."

"It's hard to read into this what impact this ruling will have on generators. Wagner has been much more skeptical of California's large claims against the power generators than he has regarding natural gas flow into the state," Edmonds said. "Hence, while this is clearly an incremental negative, it is hard to extrapolate this into direct bad news for generators with claims pending from the state."

Whatever finally happens to the El Paso Corporation, there will be changes in the system.

This latest issue among American public companies is yet another one that will change the way companies do business. In addition, it only adds to the mistrust with which Wall Street views the companies whose stock it trades.

A difference in opinion, or a serious division?

By Gretchen Schrock
Business and Politics Editor

Two best friends are in the midst of an unprecedented argument. The United States and Germany, always together in agreement on issues of foreign policy since the end of World War II, have recently discovered differences of opinion that have the potential to seriously damage, if not destroy, their decades-long friendship.

It all began with the vicious campaign between Social Democrat Gerhard Schöder and conservative Edmund Stoiber for the post of chancellor and control of the German Parliament. One of the major pillars of Schöder's campaign, which eventually led to his triumph, was his complete resistance to a war with Iraq.

B & P Commentary

President George W. Bush and his advisers were not pleased with this obstacle to their plan for the eventual ousting of evil Iraqi President Saddam Hussein and secretly hoped that Schöder's rhetoric would soften after his electoral conquest.

Unfortunately, the Bush administration seriously miscalculated. The Schöder government has no intention of reversing its opposition to military action against Iraq, citing that such a maneuver could bring political and social chaos to the Middle East and could split the global coalition against terrorism. Furthermore, Schöder considered the domestic political environment in which he will have to operate. Dissident Greens nearly toppled his last government coalition when he sent troops to Afghanistan to show his support for the war on terror following Sept. 11.

Why would Schöder voluntarily entertain the possibility of committing political suicide by sending more soldiers abroad to fight a war initiated by a hawkish ally?

"I have formulated a German position, and I have nothing to retract on that count," Schöder said in a New York Times article.

The reaction in Washington to this firm stance has been undoubtedly harsh, from refusing to meet with German counterparts at a NATO meeting in Poland, to associating the Schöder government with the likes of Osama bin Laden and Hussein.

"I made it clear to the world that either you're with us or you're with the enemy and that doctrine still stands," Bush said at a rally in Trenton, N.J., according to The New York Times.

In other words, the Bush view of the current world situation involves two separate and heterogeneous groups: those who wholeheartedly support the United States in its effort to combat every threat to international security and peace and those who completely align themselves with ruthless dictators and terror-hungry radicals. Since Germany is voicing a few statements of dissension to the American battle strategies, it is temporarily categorized under the foe heading, regardless of how absurd it appears.

To avoid a permanent classification as an American enemy, the German government has taken meager steps at reconciliation. After German Justice Minister Herta Däubler-Gmelin compared Bush to Hitler, in that he used the talk of war to divert attention from domestic concerns, Schöder denied her a cabinet post in his new government. According to The Washington Post, Ludwig Stiegler, head of Schöder's Social Democratic party in the Parliament, was forced to resign after he said, "Bush is acting as if he's Caesar Augustus and Germany is the province of Germania."

In addition to these political resignations, Germany is expected to offer more troops for the Balkans and to lead the international security force in Afghanistan. Not even the personal letter from Schöder to Bush last week was enough to persuade the American president that Germany is not conspiring with the enemy and remains a close friend.

Germany and the United States have differed on numerous issues in the past, such as global warming, farm subsidies and U.S. steel tariffs. What makes the current dispute more pivotal to the future development of the German-American political relationship than the former topics?

The Iraqi question has far greater implications for the entire world, specifically in the areas of international security, Middle East stability and oil production. Whether the United States decides to invade Iraq and remove Hussein from power will tremendously affect the course of international political and economic events.

If the United States deems German support crucial to the success of any military operation against Iraq, it must provide a more convincing argument with definitive statistics and figures as evidence. However, if the method of persuasion is lacking and Germany fails to fully back any Iraqi invasion, the Bush administration must accept this difference of opinion and realize that it cannot shape the alliance system to fit its exact preferences. It should also recognize that even though the Iraq issue is an important one, it is not worth the potentially disastrous alienation of a longtime ally.

As Schöder pointed out in a New York Times article, "I always said that the meaning of friendship can only be that one sometimes differs on specific issues. How else can it be?"

Bison get first win of season

In the first night game in years, the Bison rebounded from an 0-2 start to win a critical game against Cornell 14-3

By Cory Nadler
Senior Writer

In a must-win situation, the Bucknell football team stepped up to the challenge and defeated Cornell University 14-3 in front of 6,299 fans at Christy Mathewson-Memorial Stadium on Saturday night.

After losing their first two games on the road, the Bison needed to win their home opener in order to keep their confidence up for the Patriot League season.

"When you are 0-2, you really don't want to go 0-3," wide receiver Albert Marquardt '04 said.

The Bison got on the board early in the game, something they had not been able to do in their previous two games. On their second possession, the Bison took the ball 49 yards in six plays. The scoring drive was capped off by a 21-yard touchdown run by Blamah Sarnor '06, to give the Bison an early 7-0 lead. Sarnor got his first collegiate start on Saturday night, and ended the game with 100 yards on 21 carries.

"Blamah breaks tackles, and runs north and south," quarterback Todd Wenrich '03 said.

On the ensuing Cornell drive, Anthony Lewis '04 intercepted a Mick Razzano pass and returned it 22 yards to the Cornell 12-yard line. The Bison decided to go for it on fourth down and two from the Cornell 5-yard line, but they did not make it.

The Big Red drove the ball down the field on the next drive, and looked as though they were heading in for a score. The Bucknell defense held in the red zone. On

After losing six seniors to graduation last year, the women's volleyball team was a little hesitant heading into this year, but after a quality preseason the women's squad looks poised to take on the Patriot League.

This week the Bison begin Patriot League play after a long preseason in which they have maintained a solid .500 record against difficult competition.

"We are all really excited about the start of Patriot League play. Our team had an outstanding preseason and I feel we are playing consistently better each match. Personally I can't wait to begin Patriot League games; we have played some tough non-league teams which I think will definitely help us prepare for league play," Breean Trapasso '04 said. "Our main goal is to take one game at a time and concentrate on what we have to do to be successful."

Bucknell has competed against some tough opponents that have truly tested their ability. The preseason is

The men's soccer team increased its winning streak to three this past week. The Orange and Blue defeated Colgate and Niagara University, improving to 7-1, the program's best start since the 1983 season.

Bucknell earned its first Patriot League win Saturday, Sept. 21 with a 1-0 defeat over Colgate. Both teams had equal opportunities during the first half of play. The Bison's offense managed to get six shots on goal—four more than Colgate. Bucknell's thirst for a goal was evident throughout the half, but the game remained scoreless at the end of 45 minutes of play.

A heavy downpour commenced during the second half of the game and continued to saturate the game field for the rest of the match. The Bison confronted the rain with increased intensity and pressure on Colgate's defensive third.

"Our strategy on Saturday was to play our game and outwork Colgate," Nick Taylor '03 said. "Even when it started raining, the skill and tough play by our team was too much for the Colgate defense, and we put away a goal to win the game."

The Orange and Blue's persistence weakened the opposing defensive wall and broke the line at the 73rd minute. Scott Visnic '06 ricocheted a shot off Colgate's goalkeeper, Will Martin, which was redirected to Taylor's feet. Taylor one-touched the ball into the back of the net to give the Bison a 1-0 lead.

"Having two goals this season is great, especially with one goal in a Patriot League game, but the overall goal is to win games, not tally up individual statistics," Taylor said.

"Nick Taylor played an outstanding game. When he is on, the rest of the midfield flows with him," Head Coach Brendan Nash said.

Bucknell's defense, led by Adam Edwards '06, continued to strengthen its reputation as indefatigable warriors. The defensive squad only allowed eight shots and tallied the team's fifth shutout of the year.

"We are doing a great job on the defensive end. Once we lose the ball everyone is working as a unit to get the ball back," Nash said. "Our team defensive shape has been great and prevented very few goal-scoring chances in our last few games."

Deservedly, the Bison held their heads high entering the game against Niagara on Tuesday, Sept. 24. The men proved to the region that they are the team to beat with a 5-1 win over the Purple Eagles.

The first half was not Bucknell's most impressive soccer, but Elliott Maruffi-Cowley '03 put the Orange and Blue on the board with a header from sophomore John Hemmert's corner kick 10 minutes into the game. Niagara managed to slip one past Edwards, ending 30 minutes of scoreless soccer, and tied the game at one apiece. Mike Lookingland '05 and Greg Buzzell '05 connected a pass and Buzzell then found Scott Visnic '06 in front of the goal. Visnic put the Bison back on top, heading into the second half with a score of 2-1.

"Coming into my first season I didn't know what to expect. I didn't know what role I would be playing, or if I'd be playing at all," Visnic said. "It seems like I've been able to create some good chances lately and the team has responded pretty well."

Bucknell surmounted its mid-week sluggishness and lit Niagara's goal on fire in the second half. Tom Ryan started the scoring festivities with a rebound goal off of Visnic's original shot.

Nearly 16 minutes later, Pat Glennon '04 received a pass from Hemmert and converted a breakaway into his first goal of the game. At the 85th minute, Glennon threw the last log into the fire with a goal generated by another Lookingland-Buzzell combination.

"We are getting strong minutes from many different people. Our team goes 18-19 [players] deep each game," Nash said. "Some of the guys are not showing up on the stat sheet, but they are vital to our success for their hard work on the field. Guys like Chris Beekman '04, Greg Buzzell , Tim Fancek '06, Brian Johnson '03 and Otto Tancraitor '05. They have all shown that they will accept their roles and work as hard as they can to get the job done."

The Bison will continue to play as a team and rely on every single player's efforts as they face Monmouth University on Sunday, Sept. 29. Game time is at 2 p.m. and will be played at home on the West Fields.

Big Red fall to mighty Bison

Top: Runningback Blamah Sarnor '06, #23, got his first collegiate start and ended the night with 100 yards on 21 carries.

third down and five, Joe Massey '03 sacked Razzano for an 11-yard loss. Cornell opted to go for it on fourth down and 16, and did not make it.

On their next possession, the Big Red marched down the field yet again. The Bison defense held again in the red zone, forcing a 25-yard Cornell field goal attempt. The kick was blocked by Lewis coming off the end, and the Bison took over on their own 14-yard line.

"Coach told me to be disciplined, and that is what I was doing," Lewis said regarding the blocked field goal.

After Wenrich scrambled for a first down, he connected with Marquardt on a quick out. Marquardt broke up the sideline, and scampered 70 yards for the touchdown to give the Bison a 14-0 lead. According to Marquardt, Wenrich changed the play at the line of scrimmage, which led to the long touchdown pass. Marquardt received player of the game honors, finishing the night with six receptions for 135 yards.

On the first drive of the second half, the Big Red moved the ball down the field again. The Bison defense came up big, yet again in the red zone, forcing a Cornell field goal from 35 yards out, to make the score 14-3 in favor of the Bison.

Defense ruled for the remainder of the game. The Big Red threatened twice more, but the Bison defense forced them to turn the ball over on downs both times. Bucknell held on for a final score of 14-3.

The difference in this game was execution. "We were able to make the plays when we needed to," Head Coach Dave Kotulski said. "Competing for four quarters is the key to a good game."

On the offensive side of the ball, the Bison were able to move the ball from the onset, which was a problem the past two weekends.

"We are getting more comfortable, and the running game is opening up the passing game," Marquardt said.

"I thought the offense played as well as they have yet this season. They eliminated the mistakes they had been making," Kotulski said.

Even though the Bison seemingly came away with an easy win, the Big Red put up a good fight.

"I knew they were going to be a physical football team. I anticipated a dogfight," Kotulski said.

The Bison now look to keep their momentum, as they host Delaware State in Christy Mathewson-Memorial Stadium on Saturday.

Bison fall in second half, 2-0

The Bison had difficulty maintaining possession against Holy Cross, losing 2-0 on Sept. 21.

By Ashley Hall

Bucknell field hockey fell to the Holy Cross Crusaders, 2-0, on Sept. 21. The two teams held for a scoreless first half, then the two-time defending Patriot League champion Crusaders scored twice in the second half.

The contest remained scoreless throughout the first half, as the two teams engaged in a defensive battle. Holy Cross ended the scoring drought just 1 minute, 19 seconds in to the second half, but was stymied by the Bison defense until the final 40 seconds of the game, when the Crusaders netted another goal to seal the victory.

Bison goalie Sonja Wettergreen '03 recorded five saves, while Holy Cross keeper Jennifer Corsilli stopped four. The loss to Colgate dropped the Bison to 1-1 in Patriot League play this season.

On Sept. 24, the Orange and Blue were back in action, with a more satisfying outcome, as they overpowered LaSalle, handing them a 2-1 loss in sudden death overtime. Midfielder Carli Cataldo '06 started the scoring with 1:43 remaining in the first half, after putting one past LaSalle goalie Colleen Bolger. LaSalle got back in the game when Katie O'Connell put one past the keeper at 5:16 into the second half tying the score at 1-1, setting up an eventual overtime.

In overtime, the gritty Bison squad recorded four shots and five penalty corners. It wasn't until Meiko Boynton '05—who recovered from a shot to the head earlier in the game and made a timely return in overtime—lofted a shot past Bolger, that the Bison team sealed the win.

"What I keep focusing on and this team is focusing on is it doesn't matter where we start," Head Coach Heather Lewis said. "It's where we finish in November. I think the work ethic and attitude have been outstanding for this team, and I'm very proud of what they bring to the field every day. I look forward to working with this group and watching them mature as a team and only get better and better."

The LaSalle Explorers were coached by Bucknell graduate Sara Catlin '98, who played under Lewis during her time here.

"I am very happy with the way the season is going," forward Amy Marvel '03. "We have a lot of youth and new people playing in all positions, which is exciting and very fresh. I think the teamwork is amazing and we are all in it together. There are no 'stars' on our team, we all respect one another and play well as a team."

"There is a great amount of positive energy and enjoyment as well. We approach each game not only to win, but as another opportunity to get better. I believe that we already have and will continue to surprise ourselves, as well as the Patriot League," she said.

The Bison are back in action against Patriot League foe Lafeyette on Saturday at 7 p.m., when they hope to push their league record above .500 for the season.

Anemic offense costs Bison game

The Bison women's soccer team dropped its first league matchup of the season on Sept. 21 to Colgate by the score of 2-0. Although Laurie Purse '03 saved seven of nine shots, the Bison failed to score a goal in their second consecutive game. Despite the minimal offensive production, Purse is adamant that the squad is doing its best to turn things around.

"Numbers don't tell the story of the game," Purse said. "The offense worked really hard up top. We hit a wall this game and we aren't playing the way that we have in the past. We are trying to find out what we need to do to put the ball in the net and I think we'll get back on track. We don't want to feel like we did yesterday ever again and I think the team knows what we have to do to get it going. We are the defending champion and true champions bounce back when the odds are against them."

Both teams struggled to get things rolling offensively in the first half and it wasn't until the 69th minute of the game that the Raiders scored goal number one. Abbey Seaboyer '04 believes that the team will come around. She also thinks the team had just as good of an opportunity as Colgate to come out victorious, but the Bison just haven't been able to catch a break.

If you ask any sports fan on the street to list the most dominating athletes of all time, you'll probably get the same grindingly monotonous stream of names from each aficionado you encounter. You'll hear the words "Michael Jordon" enough times to gradually desensitize certain regions of your auditory system to the phonetic tones and frequencies used in the pronunciation of his name. You're sure to hear Wayne Gretzky a few times, along with Tiger Woods, Muhammed Ali, Babe Ruth and perhaps Red Grange. The more creative sports fan might spit out names like Babe Didrikson, Man O'War or Satchel Paige.

Most of what you'll hear will be a perfunctory recitation of ESPN's "Top 100 Athletes of the Century" list that was released in 2000. Chances are, you won't hear the words "Willie Hoppe" jumbled into anyone's comprehensive list. In fact, you'd be hard-pressed to find anyone who wouldn't greet his name with a raised eyebrow and a befuddled utterance of "who?"

Unless, of course, you happen to be conducting this survey in a pool hall. Any seasoned shark could probably tell you a bit about Hoppe. They could tell you that this guy you've never even heard of had a career with such profound longevity that it made Nolan Ryan's exploits look like the life span of a mayfly. They could tell you Hoppe's domination made Secretariat's Belmont Stakes victory look like a lucky headbob.

Forty-six years, 51 championships in total. That's the line on Hoppe. So why is his legend muffled by obscurity? Well, he happened to be the master of a sport that, in contemporary times, is lucky if it can find airtime during early-a.m. broadcasts on ESPN2. Heck, a lot of people don't even consider it a sport.

This hasn't always been the case, however. Billiards, in its various forms, styles and social contexts, was a staple of the great American sporting culture that spanned a century. And Hoppe was to billiards what Ruth was to baseball. He just did it twice as long.

Hoppe exploded onto the billiards scene in 1906 when, at the age of 18, he set forth a brazen challenge to the reigning world champion, Frenchman Maurice Vignaux. For a $1,000 purse, young Hoppe dethroned Vignaux at 18.2 balkline carom billiards, and thus was born a one-man dynasty that lasted nearly half a century.

Carom billiards, which has long since been unseated in popularity by pocket billiards, consists of a battle waged on a pocketless table with three balls, wherein the goal is to hit both of the object balls with the cue ball. The balkline was introduced to keep players from nursing their shots, or keeping the balls near a cushion so they could string together an absurd scoring spree.

Over the ensuing span of years, the balkline was subjected to a battery of makeovers, a la baseball's pitching mound and home plate. Introduced at 8 inches, the distance grew to 14 and eventually 18 inches. One or two billiards could be scored behind that line before one of the balls had to leave that balk area.

By the time Hoppe began his epic career, the balkline was set at 18 inches. He held the 18.2 (the "2" denotes the number of billiards allowed in a given balk area; in 18.1, only one billiard can be scored) crown almost continually through 1927, totaling 15 titles in that arena.

He stretched his win total even farther in 18.1 competitions, amassing 18 championships over his career. And if that weren't enough, he won another 12 titles in the vastly popular field of three-cushion billiards, a version in which the cue ball has to hit at least three cushions before striking the second object ball. At one point in 1940, he tore through 20 games without losing a single one, leaving in his dust such formidable opponents as Jake Schaefer and Welker Cochran.

It wasn't until 1952, at the age of 65, that he laid down his cue for the last time; true to the form he'd maintained for 46 years, he finished his career as the world champion in three-cushion. He had reigned over the world of billiards at age 18, age 65 and everything in between, an accomplishment that no other athlete can really boast.

That's not to say that he didn't have his moments of humility—every decade or so a Schaefer or a Ralph Greenleaf would hand him a rare defeat, and it would appear that the era of Hoppe was ticking to a close.

Year after year, decade after decade, new legends would light up the table, but only for a brief flicker in time. It was always the case that after they had faded and the smoke had dissipated, Hoppe was still there—as dependable, as constant and as durable as an athlete can be.

Causing trouble

I don't know about you, but is anyone else tired of hearing about professional athletes having run-ins with the law? Every week it's something else: drug abuse, wife abuse, drive-bys, really really bad music .... These athletes appear in court with the regularity of a de Maelzel metronome.

I'm sick of these Darryl Strawberry and Lawrence Taylor-types who feel the world owes them something or that they should be enshrined in the Hall of Fame. The Hall of Fame is for role models; athletes that children can respect and admire both for their accomplishments on the field, as well as off. I'm not saying they have to be priests, as if that would clear up their image, but I AM saying that violent offenders and the pitifully stupid should not be heralded.

The same holds true for our personal lives. Everybody talks about their grandfather who invented street signs or great, great grandniece who met Zarathustra at a small patisserie in the village. Nobody wants to remember Uncle Mortimer who got high, strangled his terrier, painted obscenities on the Williamsburg Bridge, then fell down a flight of stairs and snapped his neck. That's just not a comforting story to share over biscuits and crumpets, or even Bisquick and Apple Jacks.

These athletes feel they're owed something. Well yes, we DID owe you something but you already collected it when you cashed in your check so let's pull the bitch-bus over to the side of the accountability turnpike and talk like responsible adults. You want a second chance? We've given you your second chance. You're not in jail, isn't that enough?

I am the first one to say that I care extremely little about what happens to professional athletes and entertainers in their own homes. I don't care about Michael Jordan's marriage problems nor what Ronde and Tiki Barber had for breakfast in the eighth grade. I find E! to be the most ghastly waste of station programming in the history of cable, save maybe TNN.

What I DO demand from athletes is a modicum of respect, both for myself and for the other million people watching you. Whether you're put on a pedestal or not, be fair to us. Just because you're on television doesn't give you the excuse to push people out of the way with your brand new 2002 Lexus (ahem! Randy Moss).

Let's go over Moss's latest ordeal. In the process of making an illegal turn, a traffic officer stepped out in front of his car. He proceeded to push the officer with his car until she fell. A couple of questions come to mind.

1) Why is Moss making illegal turns? 2) Why is a traffic cop stepping out in front of a moving car rather than just taking down the license plate number and writing a ticket? 3) How exactly does one "push" a person with a car down an entire city block? 4) Why would the traffic cop not just get out of the way of the now-moving car? Obviously this person subscribed to the Wile E. Coyote school of escape artistry. Word of advice, two steps to the left and you'd be out of danger's way. Well .. 2002 Lexus? Three steps.

Moss's comment after he was released from his overnight stay in jail was "they treated me bad." Moss, I'm going to say this slowly. It's jail! Did you expect free massages and maple syrup with your 8 a.m. flapjacks? No, we're talking men named Bubba and Cletus and their homoerotic adventures, not Jeeves carrying a tray of brie and saltines.

And, of course, Moss is merely the most recent in this long hit-parade of violent abusers. Let's not forget Allen Iverson, Ray Lewis, Mark Corey, Tony Tarasco, Houdini Bison Dele and the inimitable and timeless Orenthal James Simpson. That doesn't even include the ever-growing list of athletes who lied about their ages to sign contracts or those who abuse steroid and dietary supplements. America is a veritable cornucopia of miscreants and system-cheaters. What are we turning in to here, the Russian figure skating mafia?

I suppose the crime rate of professional athletes is not as high as one would think, considering they are some of the most visible people in the public eye, and therefore their every act is documented with the frivolity of a 19th-century Victorian novelist.

Let's be honest here, violent crimes occur most often among the marginalized of society. But when we talk about crimes by athletes, we're not talking about marginalized social welfare victims in line for food stamps, we're talking about $20 million signing bonuses and eight-figure salaries here people. The only stamps these people have ever used is the one with their autograph emblazoned on it so that they don't develop carpal tunnel signing the enormous balls they must have for being so ridiculously egotistical.

Let's put the ball in the law enforcement's court now, no pun intended. Let's finally hold these "professionals" accountable for their actions. What is the general length of jailtime that a person must serve between the time he is arrested and when he goes to trial? Moss stayed in jail overnight.

Although much to the delight of Hennipen County Jail officers, he did perform a little song and dance rendition of Fahrenheit 451 for his fellow inmates, citing he was trying to "give a little back to the community." Thank you Moss. Now where did O.J. get off to?

Webster defines "growing up" as, "arriving at physical or mental maturity in terms of intellectual, social and physical means." First, let's get one thing straight — I'm a kid! Sure, I have my responsibilities in college; I do my homework, attend classes, keep in touch with my family, all while participating in clubs. I don't dread any of it. In fact I smile. I constantly get told that I have the energy of a 5-year-old kid brought to a candy store! And, yes, girls sometimes still have "cooties."

You see, I feel I hold the best of both worlds, seeing the good in things like when we were toddlers and being able to maturely handle my responsibilities in the "real world." OK, that's grand, but where am I going? Simple fact, athletes nowadays constantly feel they can do or say whatever they want because they are stars. This childish behavior is expected and special treatment should be given because of the talents and skills they posses. In this feature, I'd like to dissect Randy Moss and his latest run-in with the law.

While pursuing some articles on this subject, I came across a piece by Len Pasquarelli of ESPN.com that I'd like to paraphrase for you to get my point across. Take, for instance, that you are dating the prettiest girl in school. A gal so beautiful, men of all walks of life immediately lose their ability to speak and begin to salivate. A woman with whom you could spend the rest of your life. That is, until you bring her home to meet the parents.

Over your initial sit-down dinner in mom's dining room, she cuts loose a string of explicitives so rancid, you wonder if she worked with Brad Pitt in "Fight Club." To add insult to injury, she denounces your mom's handed-down turkey recipe, and asks dad if Rogaine is right for him.

You are at the crossroads of the relationship. Do you ignore her social inadequacies and take her to a friend's house next time, or do you ask to leave the table and have her fetch a taxi home?

Welcome to the Minnesota Viking's world with pro-bowl wide-receiver Moss. Moss, a stud between the white lines, yet sour grape outside, finds himself faced with yet another impediment in his quest for social complacency.

The Skinny: Tuesday night, Moss was charged with careless driving and failure to obey a traffic officer. Witnesses told police he used his car to push the officer, who was trying to prevent him from making an illegal turn, a half-block before she fell to the ground.

"I saw a really decked-out Lexus pushing the traffic person along," Jerry Hullerman, an observer of the incident, said according to ESPN.com. "It was really surreal. She fell flat on her face." What was he thinking? Surely nothing is important enough to harm another human being. But if you dig deeper you find out that this behavior is not all that foreign to Moss.

In 1999, he squirted a referee with a water bottle, which resulted in a $25,000 fine from the NFL. Then there's the time he verbally abused corporate sponsors on the team bus in 2001, which resulted in the team fining him $15,000 and forcing him to attend anger management classes.

Randy Moss, yet to shake his childhood ways, needs to grow up before he can become a true NFL star.

Moss initially attended Florida State University, where he red-shirted his first season, but was kicked off the team for violating probation by smoking marijuana. That got him a one-year jail sentence, which was reduced to about one month of time served. But his skills ensured another college would be begging and Marshall made the call. Now an NFL playmaker, Moss has yet to shake his childhood ways.

The question becomes what should a team like the Minnesota Vikings do? Should they stand by Moss and hope that he matures into a good boy, or cut him loose and free themselves of his constant failures?

The verdict: Moss set an NFL record with 5,396 yards receiving in his first four seasons as a pro and is the only wide receiver with more than 1,000 yards receiving in each of his first four seasons. But is any statistic strong enough to warrant teammate support in such a horrific display of childishness? Sure he is only 25 years old and is expected to go through growing pains, but doesn't the doctor say if the pain persists over a week, check into a hospital?

You cannot take away the fact that he is a playmaker and the ball seems to find him in the end zone, much like his predecessor Chris Carter, but Moss' frequent lack of playing hard on every down, such as when the play is designed to go to "the other side," holds firm with his teammates and critics alike. How can a team unite when one player feels he is above his team and apparently above the law? Randy needs to go back to school and must realize that by the strength of the leader's commitment, the power of the team is unleashed.

NFL Predictions

Who would have thought last week, going into their bye week, the Steelers would be reassessing their defense? Though their rushing defense is still strong, their pass-defense has been beaten badly. This may mean trouble for the Steel Curtain considering the Browns offense is pass-heavy. The Browns are the only team in the AFC Central with a win at this point, but look for this to change as the "Stillers" break out of their funk. (They better because I already have two wrong picks because of them.)

Minnesota (0-3) at Seattle (0-3)

At least one of these winless teams will finally put up a W. Both offenses struggled last week, with Seattle netting a mere 145 yards and Minnesota giving up four interceptions and four sacks. The Seahawks need to revitalize their rushing attack, Alexander has a miniscule 110 yards in three games, he averaged that total for each game he started last season. The Vikings need to hope that Culpepper and Moss can rebound. Minnesota.

Denver (3-0) at Baltimore (0-2)

The Ravens defense has only given up one TD this season, yet their offense has managed to score only a meager seven points. Baltimore has an anemic offense, which won't be helped by Denver's top-ranked rushing defense. The best thing about the Broncos attack is that they possess such an equal balance between the pass and the rush, netting almost identical totals. The real questions about this game don't revolve around who will win; but rather by how much Denver will win and whether or not the Ravens will even score.

Carolina (3-0) at Green Bay (2-1)

Carolina has already tripled their win total from last season. Who are these guys? The NFC South was supposed to be one of the weakest divisions. Unfortunately for the Panthers, they are led by Rodney Peete, who is not starter material. Look for the Panthers to come back to earth. Green Bay is Carolina's first real test of the season and look for them to lose it with a big L, even with a weakened Packers defense. Traditionally, Favre has been supported by a great defense, now he is forced to score points since the defense has given up over 30 points in every game so far; luckily the Packers have the top rated offense in the NFC.

Chicago (2-1) at Buffalo (1-2)

The Bills defense continues to struggle this season, as does their rushing attack. The only highlight of this Bills team is Bledsoe, which isn't a surprise at all. He is the only QB with over a 1,000 passing yards at this point, which explains why Peerless Price is leading the NFL in receiving yardage. The Bears need to exploit Buffalo's poor defense. Urlacher, who leads the league in tackles, needs to pressure Bledsoe and not enable him to hit his targets. Ultimately, the Bears defense will decide this game. If they can contain Bledsoe, they will win, and I think they'll get the job done.

Cleveland (2-1) at Pittsburgh (0-2)

Eric Junge '99 earns first major-league victory for Phillies

Eric Junge '99 is the first Bison in the majors since 1958. He holds a 1.13 ERA in 8 innings.

Former Bucknellian Eric Junge '99 accomplished what many aspiring athletes can only dream. On Tuesday, Sept. 10, Junge was called up by the Philadelphia Phillies, and became the first Bison to play in the majors since Andy Keegan's six-year stint with the White Sox in 1958.

Junge made his major-league debut in relief on Wednesday, Sept. 11, allowing a run on two hits against the Florida Marlins. He also recorded a strike-out and induced a double-play in a 9-2 victory.

Only three days after his debut appearance, Junge earned his first major-league victory, replacing injured starter Brandon Duckworth in a Saturday game, pitching five strong innings in a 4-1 win over the Pittsburgh Pirates. He holds a 1.13 ERA in eight innings of work with eight strikeouts.

Junge allowed only a single unearned run while striking out five in the win. Phillies manager Larry Bowa intends to use him as a relief role for the remainder of its season.

Recognition of Junge's baseball talent started early in his Bison career. Originally from new York, Junge helped lead Bucknell to a Patriot League championship as a first-year in 1996.

As a sophomore, he recorded six saves, hitting the Bucknell single-season mark. He left Bucknell in 1999 with a record of 16-15 and a school record of 12 saves.

After graduating, Junge headed for the minor leagues. Junge was the first Bison baseball player to be drafted by a major-league team since Andy Nezelek was picked by the Atlanta Braves in 1986. Drafted in the 11th round by the Los Angeles Dodgers, Junge was traded along with another minor leaguer to the Phillies for lefthander Omar Daal in November 2001.

He spent his 2001 season with the AA Jacksonville Suns, finishing ninth in the Southern League with a 3.46 ERA while limiting opponents to a .237 batting average. He helped the Suns with the Southern Division co-championship while leading Jacksonville in wins, games started (27), complete games (one), shutouts (one) and innings pitched. He also became the first Bucknell alum to play for a major--league organization since Joe Markulike played for Idaho Falls in the Braves organization in 1990.

After moving up to AAA Scranton/Wilkes-Barre, he posted a 12-6 record with a 3.54 ERA in 29 starts. The Red Barons finished their season last week with a loss to Buffalo in the International League playoffs.

Junge joins a Phillies team that lies in fourth place in the NL East with a 75-78 record. The Bison community has been supportive in each step that Junge has made, and many look forward to watching him as he matures into an outstanding major-league player.

"We have a lot of time before Lafayette [to prepare]," Seaboyer said. "We have tried to move people around at practice. In our scrimmages, we have tried different people at different positions lately. We haven't played poorly, we just haven't put the ball in the net. We could have won the game just as easily as Colgate. I think with a week of preparation we will be fine. Losing to Colgate wasn't fun but we lost our first league game last year and we did just fine."

It was only a matter of two minutes before Colgate knocked in an insurance goal to take a two-goal lead. Offensive production has been the primary concern of the Bison this season and they were only able to muster up two shots on goal all afternoon. Megan Farrell '05 is confident that the team is not playing poorly, and she is optimistic about a productive Bison offense down the road.

"It's just a matter of time before we get the ball in the net," Farrell said. "It's not like we're struggling right now. We have had productive scoring games this season, so we know we can do it, we just need to be patient. We have great forwards up top with a lot of skill and they'll definitely be able to put it away for us."

Bucknell dropped to 5-3, 0-1 following the loss.

Walters heads cheerleading squad

Former Redskins cheerleader hopes to bring enthusiasm to the squad

By Brian Klotz
Senior Writer

Head Cheerleading Coach Heather Walters remembers the day when she found out that Bucknell had an opening for a coaching position.

"My boyfriend, who lives in Milton, got the paper and called me at midnight to tell me about it," Walters said. "It's what I have wanted to do all my life."

Walters' obvious enthusiasm is what her athletes comment on most when they speak of her.

"I think Heather is a great addition to the squad," Adam Hargus '03 said. "She is amazingly enthusiastic and very work oriented, which is a great addition to a squad that already works hard."

After the interview process had been completed in the beginning of September, Athletic Director John Hardt knew she was the woman for the job.

"We had a very fine group of qualified candidates for the Bison cheerleading coach position, but Heather Walters' qualifications and experience immediately stood out from the rest," he said. "As a former college cheerleader and a cheerleader with the National Football League's Washington Redskins, Heather presented a much higher level of quality cheerleading experience than any of the other candidates."

To say that Walter's is experienced in the sport of cheerleading is no understatement. Looking up to her older sister who cheered, Heather got involved in the Pop Warner group in Jersey Shore, Pa when she was only 8 years old. From there on, cheerleading became her primary focus all the way through junior high and high school, eventually giving her the opportunity to perform in both the Florida Citrus Bowl and the Aloha Bowl.

The chance to cheer for the Redskins came when she was in her first semester of college at Lock Haven. After going through a rigorous and very competitive tryout procedure, Walters didn't hesitate over the decision to go. Three years later, she decided to leave the NFL to move back to Milton and further her education which, it just so happened, coincided with the coaching job opening at Bucknell.

Walters has many goals and ideas for the direction of the cheerleading squad. First and foremost is to get the squad visible to Bucknell and the community in general. Getting noticed, by going to a competition and doing well, in addition to implementing community work such as Christmas events, top her list.

"To get recognized, we have to go out there and show that we can succeed," Walters said. "We need to do more than just go to games and show that there is more to cheerleading than just being on the sidelines."

Her squad members agree that competitions are the way to go.

"In the future, I would like to have the cheerleading squad get involved in competitions where we get to prove ourselves to other college cheerleaders," Trisha Yordy '04 said.

Better recognition is something that Walters and the team realize won't come easy.

"Since we aren't classified as a sport, the cheerleading squad isn't usually mentioned very often," Walter's said. "I want to change that and I want only positive things to be said, nothing negative."

Varsity status is something that Walters thinks would continue to improve the situation of the team.

"I would love to see cheerleading become a sport because I think they put in as much hard work and dedication as an other sport," Walters said. "You can letter in it, but when it comes to getting some of the things that the squad wants, they have to do fundraising."

"We were finally given a budget this year, and that has enabled us to get new uniforms and start thinking about training camps," Hargus said. "To me, the varsity/non-varsity thing isn't much of an issue because, while it would be nice to have the full recognition that we deserve, we are functioning more or less like a varsity squad. In the future I would like for the budget to grow."

Hardt thinks that Bucknell's commitment to the program continues to grow, but that becoming a varsity sport is a ways off.

"While the Bison cheerleading squad has become a much more organized program in recent years at Bucknell, I do not see it becoming a varsity sport anytime in the near future because it is not not recognized as a varsity sport by either the Patriot League or the NCAA," said Hardt. "Overall, we are very pleased with the current cheerleading situation at Bucknell and we believe that Heather's hire as the program's new coach will provide the program with outstanding leadership and support."

Walters has been very impressed with the squad during the first part of her tenure and sees a bright future. "They work really well together as a team and they want to look good," said Walters. "In general, though, I want the squad to go out there and have fun and I think that we have the support to really give the cheerleading squad that chance."

the last chance to fine-tune the offensive play and defensive play before the regular season begins.

"I am very pleased with the competition we have faced so far because it is preparing us to face the tougher teams of the Patriot League," Breean Trapasso said.

On Saturday, Sept. 21 the Bison competed in the Bucknell University ' Volleyball Classic. Bucknell started the day with a tough five-game loss to Morgan State, but were able to pull out the victory later in the day against Central Connecticut.

The Bison were victorious in their first game of the day against Morgan State, 30-27 but fell in the second game. In the third game, Bucknell won a close 31-29 victory, but they failed to pull out the overall victory by losing the next two games.

For Bucknell, twin superstars Breean and Brandi Trapasso '04 each had double doubles during the Morgan State match. Breean led the team with 46 assists and by completing 14 digs, while Brandi grabbed 14 kills and 30 digs. Jennifer Wrigley '03 and Chelsea Anderson '06 also claimed double digits in the dig column, and Melanie Ghiz '04 produced 15 kills.

During the second match of the day for Bucknell, the Bison claimed a 3-0 victory over Central Connecticut. The Bison quickly defeated the Blue Devils in consecutive 30-27, 30-28 and a 30-22 victories. Brandi Trapasso completed the match with 17 digs and 14 kills, while Ghiz tallied 14 kills for the Bison.

The Lady Bison fell in their first Patriot League match against Lehigh on Wednesday Sept. 25. The Bison were defeated by the Mountain Hawks in four games. The Bison came out strong in the first game of the evening with a 30-27 victory over the Mountain Hawks, but fell in the next three games 30-22, 30-28 and 30-26.

"Jennifer Wrigley had outstanding offensive effort," head coach Cindy Opalski said. "We played hard, but had a hard time finishing. We had been up [in score] in every game we played, but now need some of the younger team members to step up and help finish."

Wrigley led the team with 16 kills and 12 digs for the Bison. Anderson led the team with 21 defensive digs for the evening and Brandi Trapasso produced 11 kills along with 14 digs. Breean Trapasso had 38 assists for Bucknell in the losing effort.

The Bison now hold a 6-7 overall record and are 0-1 in the Patriot League. Bucknell will face Patriot League Conference foe Lafayette on Saturday, Sept. 28 in Easton, Pa. in hopes of returning to a .500 record.

Knoebels: Family fun since 1926

Knoebels is home to roller coasters, mini golf, a grand carousel and much more

Knoebels' grand carousel is fun for kids of all ages. A steam powered carousel was the first ride at the park when it opened in 1926.

Knoebels Amusement Resort, located on U.S. Route 487 in Elysburg, Pa., is America's largest free admission amusement park. With over 50 rides, Knoebels is open to all ages.

Knoebels offers free parking, shows and picnic facilities, and has been in business since July 4, 1926. It is privately owned and operated by the Knoebel family.

Rather than a park admission fee, Knoebels sells tickets for individual rides, which range in costs.

"Knoebels is an unexpected good time. It is a small Pennsylvania park, which should say enough as is, but you get there and it's just fun," Matt Baker '05 said. "The roller coasters are some of the best I have been on and they definitely make the park. Having to buy a ticket ride by ride gets a little annoying, but it's refreshing to walk into a park and not pay immediately."

"Lots of fun, loved the roller coasters ... basically it was bundles of fun!" Caitlin Geissler '04 said.

Knoebels first began with "tally-hos," 25-cent Sunday afternoon hayrides to the farm of Reverend Henry Hartman Knoebel, with stops along the way for picnics and swimming.

Soon an enterprise was born. With the simple addition of a few picnic tables, convenience stands and lifeguards, Knoebels Amusement Resort was well on its way.

Knoebels soon opened its first restaurant, started some games, constructed a pool and launched its first ride—a steam powered carousel.

Knoebels also rented out cottages that were somewhat out of the ordinary, including structures built to look like a covered wagon, a trolley car, a schoolhouse and a boat. Unfortunately, many of these houses were destroyed in the flood of 1972. Others were used for beneficial purposes, such as the Caldwell Cottage, which became the Old Mill ice cream stand.

Covered bridges connected the land above the Roaring Creek and Mugser's Run. In 1972, Hurricane Agnes tore through the park. Water damaged 24 out of 25 of the park rides, 200 electric motors and most of the cottages, destroying six permanently.

Everything in the park was covered in mud. After 11,000 hours of manual labor, 210 truckloads of debris and 3,600 tons of fill distributed, Knoebels was back in business, without any help from governmental loans.

In 1973, the Haunted Mansion was designed to attract more visitors after the great loss caused by the hurricane. The Jet Star Roller Coaster was next to arrive, and it was only replaced in 1993 by The Whirlwind. The park continued to grow, allowing no obstacles to stand in its way.

The addition of the once-hailed "largest roller coaster in the world," the Phoenix Roller Coaster served as a culmination of years of dedication by the Knoebel family and staff.

It measured 3,200 feet, with an initial hill of 78 feet, and was transferred to Knoebels from Playland Park in San Antonio, Texas. The Giant Flume opened in 1990 and is said to be the most expensive project in Knoebels' history.

On Oct. 5, Knoebels will be hosting its 17th Annual "Phoenix Phall Phunfest." Registration will begin at 1 p.m.

Events include a costume contest, rides through the Haunted Mansion, laser runner, mini golf, private ride sessions offered on the Phoenix and the Twister, bumper cars and the grand carousel, concluding with a bonfire at 10:15 p.m.

National Young Women's Day of Action

V-Day Bucknell and Sirens work together to educate campus on female issues

By Caitlin McKee
Writer

Valerie Lam '04, president of V-Day Bucknell, says the National Young Women's Day of Action (NYWDA) is about education.

"The day is about education on women's issues. We want to help make female issues that are taboo talked about and public," Lam said. "We want to get them out in the open."

NYWDA is a national event held every year on Oct. 24. Its goal is to call attention to feminist issues. Feminist groups on campuses across the nation support the day by holding educational programs.

"The day is about education on women's issues. We want to help make female issues that are taboo talked about and public. We want to get them out in the open."

—Valerie Lam '04, president of V-Day Bucknell

This year the Sirens and V-Day Bucknell are planning to hold an exhibition on feminine products. V-Day Bucknell is currently deciding what issues it will address in the exhibition.

Some possibilities include the history of the tampon and the maxi pad, alternative feminine products and alternative contraceptives, as well as President George W. Bush's policy on birth control and different cultural ideas about menstruation.

The members of V-Day Bucknell feel that educating the campus on feminine products is important.

"There is not a lot of information on female products anywhere. People aren't aware of how serious TSS [Toxic Shock Syndrome] is and how much money girls spend on products monthly. Girls need to know what risks they are taking with the products they buy," Vice President of V-Day Bucknell Daisy Buranasombhop '04 said.

The exhibit will be held in Arches Lounge on Oct. 24, from 3-5 p.m.

"The exhibit will be comparable to the WRC's [Women's Resource Center] 'A Room With a View,' but differ in subject and content," Lam said.

V-Day Bucknell's main project is putting on the "Vagina Monologues." Producing this racy play leads many on campus to consider the club a radical feminist group.

"People make the assumption that we are militant feminists. Once they come to understand us, they realize that all we want to do is stop the victimization of women," Vice President of Operations for V-Day Bucknell Katie Parker '03 said.

"You don't have to be a feminist to want violence against women to stop because that benefits all man/womankind," treasurer of V-Day Bucknell Katie Breitenbach '05 said.

By supporting NYWDA, V-Day Bucknell hopes to show the campus what it is really about.

"Because we are labeled with the feminist stigma, many people lose sight of V-Day Bucknell's goal, which is to end violence against women and girls. I think that this is an objective that most people can agree upon," Lam said. "I appreciate the amount of attention we get from the 'Monologues' because the production is the centerpiece of our work. However, I would like to see our other projects, such as NYWDA, get the same amount of participation."

V-Day Bucknell hopes supporting NYWDA will educate the campus on female issues, and that it will educate the campus on the real mission of V-day Bucknell.

"Our goal is to get our name out as a group whose mission is to stop the violence against women, not to just put on a play," Parker said.

Laundry online

Thanks to e-Suds, students say good-bye to all the hassles of doing laundry—finding quarters, buying detergent and waiting for a machine

By Alyson Walker
Features Editor

Lugging sacks of dirty clothes down four flights of stairs to the laundry room to find all the washers occupied is enough to make anyone consider wearing the same underwear twice. Some students don't have this problem anymore thanks to e-Suds, a new innovation in laundry machines.

IBM and USA Technology announced on Aug. 30 that 9,000 washers and dryers, which have been made Web-enabled and accessible, will be available to students at colleges and universities.

The e-Suds system will make collecting quarters obsolete for college students. This system replaces coin-operated machines with swipe cards and the ability to use cell phones to charge laundry costs.

"The swipe card system sounds awesome. I hate carrying around quarters to do my laundry," Jessica Orsulak '05 said.

The system includes a Web site that shows available machines, saving the hassle of running up and down the stairs six times before being able to actually load laundry.

It also features choices like dispensing detergent or fabric softener directly from the machine. This is a benefit to students who lack either the time or transportation to shop for washing supplies.

When the laundry is completed, the system can either send the student an e-mail, page on a beeper or send a text message to a cell phone, according to USA Today Online. This feature nearly eliminates waiting for the person who forgot to pick up his or her laundry or finding clean clothes piled on the laundry room floor.

The e-Suds system can be found this semester in certain colleges and universities in Indiana, Kentucky, Michigan and Ohio, such as Cedarville College, Ohio, according to USA Today Online.

Prices might vary, but the e-Suds machines will typically cost "a fraction" more than typical laundromat washers and dryers, which range from $700 to $2,500 per machine depending on size, said USA Technologies' Steve Hurburt according to USA Today Online.

Along with providing students with a more hassle-free laundry experience, e-Suds makes laundry owners' jobs simpler. Mechanical errors are reported online automatically, decreasing repair times.

Universities, as well as laundry owners, value the swipe cards which allow students to charge laundry fees to their student accounts. It negates the need for often-vandalized change machines, which require money collection and have coin jams.

"IBM's data integration and hosting expertise and USA Technology's point-of-sales systems and services are positioned to help drive the wireless vending industry forward," said Dean Douglas, vice president of the telecommunications industry of IBM Global Services in a statement by IBM Press. "IBM and USA Technology are making vending systems smarter as well as easier for the consumer and more secure from vandalism."

Some questions arise, such as is whether the cost is worth the convenience and if this convenience is necessary. Students also question whether or not it will really save time.

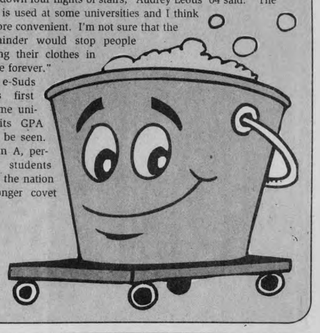
"It sounds like a great way to over-complicate a simple, though annoying, task," Rob Weger '03 said.

Orsulak is also skeptical about the efficiency and need for e-Suds.

"Since our buildings each have their own laundry facilities, you really don't have to carry clothes that far, and if you did, the machines could be taken by the time you got down there. I don't think I would check online before I carried my clothes to the laundry room," Orsulak said.

Other students feel that e-Suds could be a wonderful asset to their busy lives.

"It would eliminate the hassle of getting quarters and needlessly walking up and down four flights of stairs," Audrey Leous '04 said. "The swipe card is used at some universities and I think it's a lot more convenient. I'm not sure that the e-mail reminder would stop people from leaving their clothes in the machine forever."



As e-Suds begins its first year in some universities, its GPA remains to be seen. If it gets an A, perhaps students throughout the nation will no longer covet quarters.

Book depicts life of a low-wage worker

By Stacey Gawronski
Writer

Barbara Ehrenreich's book "Nickel and Dimed: On (Not) Getting By in America" has created a stir among its readers. The book, published in 2001, is Ehrenreich's account of life as a low-wage worker in America.

Ehrenreich's interest in low-wage workers and survival inspired her to embark on this rather odd journey. The author wanted to see if, as welfare rhetoric claimed, any job was the way to a better, more prosperous life. Instead of simply believing that, or interviewing others working for poverty-level wages, Ehrenreich decided to experience this lifestyle for herself.

Dropping almost everything in her comfortable life, Ehrenreich discovered that making ends meet on poverty-level wages was nearly impossible. She allowed herself a rental car, and admits that put her ahead of the game to start.

In the book's introduction, she wrote, "In addition to being mobile and unencumbered, I am probably in a lot better health than most members of the long-term low-wage workforce. I had everything going for me."

Book Review

Despite her advantages, Ehrenreich found it extremely difficult to survive, let alone prosper. She found that these "unskilled" jobs were not unskilled at all. Also, one job was often not enough to make ends meet, for "jobs are so cheap—as measured by the pay—that a worker is encouraged to take on as many of them as she possibly can."

"Nickel and Dimed" is a fascinating book, one that people should read to get a better understanding of poverty in the United States. Ehrenreich reveals the reality behind working for low wages. Taking the first job available to her and for the highest pay possible, Ehrenreich worked as a waitress and then a hotel maid in Key West, Fla., a cleaning woman and nursing home aid in Portland, Maine and a Wal-Mart sales clerk in Minneapolis, Minn. None of these jobs came easily for Ehrenreich; in fact, job searching became quite time-consuming.

Aside from the personality test that Ehrenreich was forced to take at Wal-Mart, she had to deal with the now common drug test. Of this, she said, "It rankles—at some deep personal, physical level—to know that the many engaging qualities I believe I have to offer—friendliness, reliability, willingness to learn—can all be trumped by my pee." She passed the drug test and secured a job at Wal-Mart.

The final chapter in "Nickel and Dimed" is Ehrenreich's own evaluation of how she fared as a low-wage worker. She acknowledges that none of the jobs were easy, but she learned new skills, terms and tools in each.

In Portland, Ehrenreich came closest to living a decent life-having a place to stay and meals on the table. She worked seven days a week to achieve this decency, and living in the same residence in the summer would have cost her more than she could afford with her wages.

In each city, Ehrenreich revealed her true self, explaining that she was researching the low-wage job market to write a book. She received very little reaction from her co-workers.

Although Ehrenreich does not have the solution for the millions of Americans who work for poverty-level wages year-round, she does reveal the sad truth behind the welfare rhetoric. She discovered that "no one said that you could work hard—harder even than you ever thought possible—and still find yourself sinking deeper into poverty and debt."

Poetry Slam event approaching

The first Poetry Slam of the year will take place on Oct. 2 in Uptown

By Nicole Gallo
Writer

The University is once again very excited about the upcoming Poetry Slam, taking place Wednesday, Oct. 2 at Uptown. Traditionally held once a year in the spring, students have the chance to attend the Poetry Slam four times this year, twice in the fall and twice in the spring.

Often comedic and at other times tragic and poignant, the Poetry Slam is an interactive poetry competition. Judges are randomly selected from the audience to evaluate the performance and content of student and faculty poets in an unconventional style of poetry.

For the past three years, the Poetry Slam has been very well attended. Last spring, over 240 people came to watch 29 student and faculty poets perform.

Last year's slam in April saw four teams battle for slam bragging rights, sponsored by LGBT, Mirth Grinder literary magazine, a social justice class and a team comprised of poetry students.

Afterwards, feature poet and emcee of the evening Regie Cabico suggested that Bucknell compete at the national college slam. A committee was formed to foster this goal on campus.

The first slam of the series will feature Cristin O'Keefe Aptowicz. Aptowicz is "Slammistress" and emcee of the two-time National Slam Championship team, New York City Urbana Poetry Slam. A former porn writer turned professional poet, she has appeared on HBO's "Def Poetry" and has been published in slam anthologies.

Cristin O'Keefe Aptowicz will perform at the University's Poetry Slam on Oct. 2. Aptowicz was a member of the winning National Slam team.

In past years, such nationally renowned and televised poets as Regie Cabico, Beau Sia, Toni Blackmon, Shappy Seasholtz and Yolanda Wilkinson have performed on the University's stage.

The second slam of the year is scheduled for Friday, Oct. 25 and will feature slam poet Taylor Mali.

"I think that as each Slam goes by, more and more people realize what an amazing experience it is," Christina Macmillan '05 said. "The campus community is extremely supportive of the event and I have high hopes that we're going to get a large, enthusiastic crowd for the Slam coming up. We're able to bring in such talented professionals that I really can't see why anyone wouldn't come."

The Slam has always been a way for the University to display its diversity through poetry. Not solely an "English major" event, everyone is welcome and encouraged to slam. Slammers range from engineering students to faculty members, and there will be an open mic segment before the contest for those who do not want to compete. The performers and topics are always diverse and entertaining.

As a member of the audience, you are part of the experience, whether you have been handed a score card or not. As is most often the case, it is the loud fan sitting next to the judge that has the ultimate say on a poet's score, and on the excitement and hilarity of the evening.

Theatre is a piece of history

By Melinda Kummer
Senior Writer

Salted popcorn, sticky vintage seats and primary-colored lights—the Campus Theatre is a one-of-a-kind movie-viewing experience. One of only 300 historical theaters in the country, the Campus Theatre boasts original murals, seats, curtains, signage, lighting fixtures and a marquee dating back to 1940.

Assistant Professor of English and Film Studies Eric Faden bought the theater in June 2001. He describes the small theater as a "historical treasure" and is devoted to preserving its historical integrity.

Eric Graham—The Bucknellian

The Campus Theatre is a historical movie theatre. Faden bought the theatre in 2001 and wants to preserve its historical integrity.

Possessing only a single screen, the theater focuses on bringing highly specialized programming to Lewisburg.

"I think the campus theatre is gorgeous—the old fashioned style is comfortable and unique to anywhere I've ever been. It's reminiscent of a 1920's jazz club," Kim Klauder '05 said.

Faden says the University community is always kept in mind when considering which films to bring to the theater.

"We concentrate mostly on independent, foreign, classic and art films. We often see the films early (in New York or Philadelphia) and then decide what films will work the best for Lewisburg," Faden said.

The Campus Theatre works to bring people from many different walks of life to common ground.

"From the community's perspective, I think the theater is an extraordinary example of how a university can save, and, in fact, revitalize historic structures that are normally demolished," Faden said.

Last week, the theater showed a studio archival restored film print of Alfred Hitchcock's "Rear Window." The audience had the rare opportunity to see an "archival" print, since "touring" prints are the most common showings.

Additional features to look forward to this semester include "The Dangerous Lives of Alter Boys" starring Jodie Foster; "The Fast Runner (Atanarjuat)," which won the Camera d'Or award in Cannes for Best First Feature in Canada; "Festival of Animation" running from Oct. 11-17 and "Metropolis," a 1927 Fritz Lang silent film, fully restored with the original orchestral score.

Located at 415 Market St., the Campus Theatre is just a short walk from the University and student tickets are $5.

Willpower depicted in "Four Feathers"

By Stephanie Nickse
Senior Writer

Those who believed in freedom, honored loved ones and had the passion and willpower to defend a nation are the heroes portrayed in "The Four Feathers." This movie is a beautiful epic that ties some of the strongest human ideas and feelings to a historical plot to defend England in the late 1800s.

Movie Review

"'The Four Feathers' is a great movie," Jennifer Reczek '04 said. "It has just enough action and romance to keep everyone happy."

While young friends are sent off to war in the Sudan to defend their homeland, one man decides that he cannot go and resigns from his position as a soldier. For his cowardly behavior, he receives four feathers from his friends and fiancée. In desperation to redeem himself in their eyes, he travels to the Sudan and positions himself so that he can protect his country and look after the friends who he abandoned.

Heath Ledger plays the role of this coward-turned-hero. Other actors in the film include Wes Bentley, whose character—both a soldier and Ledger's best friend—refuses to give him a feather; Kate Hudson, a loving fiancée who is devastated by Ledger's weakness; Djimon Hounsou, an Arab man who saves Ledger in the desert and befriends him while he struggles to survive and Michael Sheen, another friend and soldier who gives Ledger a feather.

The movie is set in the Moroccan desert, where the Sudanese Arabs and the British troops are fighting a war. The movie takes place in 1884, when European nations were trying to divide African lands among themselves. An uprising of the Sudanese led the British to defend themselves against these warriors on foreign land. The army was crushed, but the story of friendship, courage and honor survives.

"'The Four Feathers' captivated my attention and led me through an exciting tale about love, friendship, loyalty, fear, faith and hope," Jamie Robinson '03 said. "The historical context of the movie added an extra twist to the plot."

University alum Frank Roessler '01 finds fame on MTV's "The Real World"

Cast members of Season 12 of MTV's "The Real World" Frank Roessler '01 (right) and Steve (left) pose for a photo at California State University Northridge with Frank's current roommate Joe Aburdene '00. Since finishing "The Real World," Roessler has been traveling to schools across the country to give speeches.

Editor-in-Chief

This season, Frank Roessler '01 became one of the seven strangers picked to live in a house and have his life taped. Roessler, once a Lewisburg resident, is one of the cast members of MTV's "The Real World Las Vegas." Now in its 12th season, the "The Real World" debuted in 1992 as the first reality TV show.

Roessler graduated from the University with an electrical engineering degree and had a few job offers in that field, but instead decided to move to Los Angeles and take a job as a production assistant.

"When I graduated I turned down all my job offers in New York and went to L.A., not to become famous, but for an adventure. It felt good to be doing something risky for once in my life, but I couldn't help feeling like a moron for not starting my career right away. I really felt like I was wasting my life," Roessler said.

When Roessler first moved across the country, he had no intention of auditioning for the "The Real World." In fact, before he auditioned, he had not seen the show in years. Originally, Roessler's current roommate and childhood friend Joe Aburdene '00 wanted to audition, but had a scheduling conflict.

"I have been a big fan of the 'The Real World' since it started, and I actually was the one that wanted to try out. However, I had a scheduling conflict with the open call and ended up missing it. I told him he should go instead, and that I knew he'd make it," Aburdene said.

Roessler listened to his friend and on Dec. 1, he was one of 35,000 people to audition in big cities across the country. From Dec. 1 to Feb. 9, Roessler had to go through seven rounds of interviews before being chosen to be on the show. According to Roessler, the interviews were more rigorous than job interviews.

"The suspense was enormous. Each of the five interviews took about two hours," Roessler said.

Roessler did not tell his parents about his first audition.

Ed Rendell, the Democratic candidate for Pennsylvania governor, came to the University on Saturday to shake hands with students, faculty and alumni at a pre-football game barbecue, organized by Professor of Biology Mitchell Chernin.

Rendell came to campus because he had a Union County Democrats meeting at the Lewisburg Hotel and heard there was a Saturday football game at the University. One of his promoters mentioned his love of sports, especially foot-

Alcohol Report yields encouraging results

By Michelle Dombeck
Arts & Entertainment Editor

A comprehensive alcohol report concerning University student alcohol use has been completed and will be released shortly. The results of the report indicate that the there has been a major decrease in alcohol use and abuse from two years ago.

Richard Ferraro, dean of students, wrote the report this summer. He said that two years ago, the alcohol situation at the University was very problematic.

"When I came here a little over two years ago, there were very significant problems with alcohol. Looking back on some of the student conduct and some excesses, it was really pretty bad," Ferraro said. "But we've made some progress since then."

A few years ago, the University was rated No. 1 in the nation for hard liquor use. Since then, it fell to No. 17 and now has been off the top 20 list entirely for two years.

Alcohol incidents, which are write-ups by Public Safety, resident assistants and the police, are also down.

"Alcohol incidents declined by 28 percent last year, which is pretty impressive. Most schools remain fairly constant in this area or even have increases," Ferraro said. "This is also a pretty hard finding with no need for interpretation. The incidents are simply down."

Downtown incidents are down as well.

"We still have some concerns downtown, but last year was the best year in recent memory," Ferraro said. "The head of the police committee downtown still wants some improvement, but she admitted that it's a better situation than it's been recently."

"In 2000, 59.7 percent of our students, at least occasionally, engaged in binge drinking, which is defined as more than five drinks on one occasion. In 2002, the figure declined to 34.1 percent."

In addition to these findings, the report includes data from student surveys that were distributed in 2000 and 2002. This data also indicates that student alcohol abuse has decreased.

"In 2000, 59.7 percent of our students, at least occasionally, engaged in binge drinking, which is defined as more than five drinks on one occasion," Ferraro said. "In 2002, the figure declined to 34.1 percent. To put that in the national norm, the average in the nation is about 44 percent. We went from significantly above to significantly below the average, which is a very good finding."

Another question on the survey asked how many alcoholic drinks students consumed, on average, per week.

"In 2000, according to the survey, the average was 8.4 drinks a week. The national average at undergraduate colleges is 5.2 drinks per student per week, so we were significantly above. We came down to 6.1 in 2002. This means that students are becoming more moderate and responsible," Ferraro said.

Instead of engaging in heavy drinking, Ferraro believes students are becoming more moderate and simply finding other things to do.

"What we're seeing is people who are not drinking, or who are drinking less. Events like Pub Night at Uptown and BU After Dark encourage students to drink moderately, or not at all," Ferraro said.

Some students have a hard time believing that alcohol abuse is really down at the University.

Bison Express to return with improvements

Mobile kitchen will replace the concessions trailer and feature new menu options

By Alyson Walker
Features Editor

Hungry uphill residents, never fear—the Bison Express will be back, and better than before.

The original Bison Express, a concessions stand placed between Bertrand Library and Delta Upsilon Fraternity, was removed this summer and used for its primary purpose as a stand for sporting events. It will be replaced by a new mobile kitchen, 32 feet in length with better equipment including a grill, walk-in cooler, fryer, coffeemaker and heater.

According to General Manager of Dining Services Tim Tenon, plans for the Bison Express have been in the works for a while, and the facility will be running as soon as the utilities to maintain it are available.

"This mobile kitchen is on campus, over by the art barn. We are waiting to have the utilities ready to then move it over onto the main campus—there is staff that is ready to work in it, so once the utilities are ready, we begin," Tenon said.

The new Bison Express will be located on the west side of Bertrand Library among Coleman Hall, Fraternity Road and the library. With all the new amenities in the kitchen, more power is needed than for the old Bison Express, which had a microwave and cooler as its greatest electrical demands.

The new facility will be a vast improvement from last year.

"When we started last year, we used the concessions trailer, knowing that it wasn't the ideal situation or the best equipped, but it was something we had. We thought we could get the Bison Express started and see what was and was not popular with students," Tenon said.

"We thought we could get the Bison Express started and see what was and was not popular with students. That's the exciting thing about this new facility—it will give us more flexibility on the menu and the storage."

"That's the exciting thing about this new facility—it will give us more flexibility on the menu and the storage."

The original idea for the Bison Express came from students, and it has been supported by administration.

"BSG [Bucknell Student Government] originally thought about the idea for the Bison Express. It was an entirely student driven project at first. Students went to Dining Services with concerns and a vision. The outcome is what you saw next to the library last year," Amir Sadaghiani '02 said.

"I think we were pleasantly surprised with how well it did. The Bison Express is something that was supported by the administration," Tenon said.

Returning students contacted both BSG and Dining Services regarding the whereabouts of the Bison Express.

"Many students have been contacting me and other BSG officers about what has happened to the Bison Express," Sadaghiani said.

"We have had interest from students wanting to know if it is or isn't going to happen—it is going to happen. We are fully supportive of getting it there and up and running but we want to make sure it's done right," Tenon said.

Students are excited to hear about a new facility with improvements that could mean better menu options.

"The food there last semester stunk, but it was the only convenient place to go. New menu options

Public Safety Log

Tuesday, Sept. 25

MISSING PROPERTY—A student reported to Public Safety that a dorm refrigerator was missing from Tustin Gym since August but was not previously reported. The student will check with various club members to see if she can locate the equipment.

THEFT—An employee reported to Public Safety that unknown person(s) removed a wooden sign in front of Sunflower Child Care building and replaced it with a sign taken from the Fence Restaurant on Route 405. East Buffalo Township Police Department and Public Safety were contacted. The Fence sign was returned to the restaurant. The Sunflower sign was later located at the Lewisburg Middle School and returned to its proper place. The incident is under investigation.

Wednesday, Sept. 26

UNDERAGE DRINKING / PUBLIC DRUNKENNESS—East Buffalo Township Police Department requested Public Safety at the front of Lambda Chi Alpha Fraternity for possible underage drinking violations. Upon further investigation, Public Safety learned that East Buffalo Township Police Department had stopped and identified two female students, under the age of 21, who had consumed alcohol. One female was cited for underage drinking and public drunkenness and the other was cited for underage drinking.

CRIMINAL MISCHIEF / UNDERAGE DRINKING—While on routine patrol, Public Safety observed a male and a female in the basket of a construction lift parked behind Vedder Hall. Upon further investigation, the officers identified the individuals as students, under the age of 21, who had consumed alcohol. East Buffalo Township Police Department and Lewisburg Police Department were on the scene. The students will be cited for criminal mischief and underage drinking.

UNDERAGE DRINKING / FAILURE TO COMPLY / OPEN CONTAINER—While on routine patrol, Public Safety observed a suspicious male walking past Edwards House, with a rectangular shaped object tucked under the front of his shirt. After a foot pursuit from the rear of Vedder, the male was apprehended by Public Safety at Bucknell Hall. Two sorority paddles and an open bottle of beer were found in the area where Public Safety first stopped the male. Upon further investigation, Public Safety determined the male was a student under the age of 21, who had consumed alcohol. Citations for disorderly conduct, underage drinking and possession of an open container were issued.

CRIMINAL MISCHIEF—A student reported to Public Safety that unknown person(s) broke two kitchen windows at the Sigma Alpha Epsilon Fraternity. The incident is under investigation.

Friday, Sept. 27

CRIMINAL MISCHIEF—Public Safety responded to the rear of Larison Hall for the report of males yelling and breaking things. Upon further investigation, Public Safety found that a wooden chair was smashed in the quad behind Larison Hall. The incident is under investigation.

INFORMATION / UNAUTHORIZED VISITOR—Public Safety responded to a Bucknell West Mod to assist University officials with a student who refused to leave a mod he was visiting. The male was transported by Public Safety to Evangelical Community Hospital Emergency room for treatment and later returned to campus. A citation was issued for underage drinking. Further citations pending.

Sunday, Sept. 29

MEDICAL TRANSPORT—A student contacted Public Safety and requested transportation to the Evangelical Community Hospital Emergency room for treatment of a wrist injury. A Student Health Services driver responded and transported the student and later returned him to campus.

MEDICAL TRANSPORT—Public Safety responded to Gateway Roser for the report of a student having difficulty breathing. The individual was transported by ambulance to Evangelical Community Hospital Emergency Room for treatment of an overdose of prescription drugs. The student later returned to campus.

DISORDERLY CONDUCT—Public Safety responded to Christy Mathewson Memorial Stadium for the report of a fight in progress involving fans from a visiting team with a knife. East Buffalo Township Police Department and Lewisburg Police Department responded. A visitor was confronted by another visitor after his behavior became disruptive. The disorderly male then exposed a knife blade. Citations for disorderly conduct were issued to both males and an additional citation for harassment was issued to one. Both visitors have been banned from the University property until further notice.

ACCIDENT / HIT & RUN—Public Safety responded to the parking lot in the Bucknell West Mods for the report of a vehicle that sustained damage while parked there. No witnesses or suspects were located. The incident is under investigation.

INFORMATION / POSSIBLE SEXUAL ASSAULT—A student reported to Public Safety that she believes she was sexually assaulted, while being intoxicated, at an off campus residence. The incident is under investigation.

Monday, Sept. 30

MISSING PROPERTY—An employee reported to Public Safety that the smoker's station had been removed from the rear of Dana Engineering Building. No witnesses or suspects were located. The incident is under investigation.

MEDICAL TRANSPORT—A resident assistant contacted Public Safety and advised them there was a student in Smith Hall requesting transportation to Evangelical Emergency Room for treatment of a sore throat. A Student Health Services driver transported the individual, who later returned to campus.

SUSPICIOUS PERSON—Public safety responded to Vedder Hall for the report of a suspicious person inside the building. Upon investigation, Public Safety determined a male had been walking in the building asking directions to the building's library. Staff in the building had escorted the male outside. A search of the building and the area met with negative results.

Tuesday, Oct. 1

MISSING PROPERTY—Public Safety responded to a Roberts Hall office for the report of two missing keys. Physical Plant responded to change the locks. The incident is under investigation.

MEDICAL TRANSPORT—A student contacted Public Safety to request transportation to Evangelical Community Hospital Emergency Room for treatment of a back problem. A Student Health Services driver responded and transported the individual, who later returned to campus.

Official ring released today by University and ArtCarved

By Chris Styers
Senior Writer

As part of the Parents Weekend celebration, the official University ring will be unveiled today in the University Bookstore.

The newly adopted tradition of a unique ring design will replace purchasing customized University jewelry and will offer a tangible, everlasting bond between alumni and the University.

In previous years, students could purchase individualized jewelry in many different styles. Because each piece of jewelry was so unique and individualized, alumni had no unifying symbol by which they could recognize each other.

The new ring will serve as a universal icon for alumni as well as a symbol of University characteristics, such as academic excellence and faculty devotion.

Plans for the ring began several years ago. In 2002, the Single Ring Committee, consisting of the University Bookstore, Office of Alumni, Parents and Volunteers, ArtCarved (makers of the official ring,) students, faculty and staff, surveyed students in the LC Mall for ideas pertaining to the ring.

The surveys asked students to contribute their feelings on some of the most memorable places or symbols around campus. The University seal was chosen from a long list of possibilities as the most recognizable and important symbols to students and the committee.

"The Bucknell family grows every year by leaps and bounds. It is our hope that the implementation of an official ring tradition will serve as a symbol of our family's unity, as well as the community we share," Jennifer Butler '03 said.

To help celebrate the unveiling of the rings, the committee hopes to have an Official University Ring presentation in late spring for students who purchase the ring.

The ceremony is intended to be similar to the First Night ceremony for incoming students.

University President Steffen Rogers, Board of Trustees members, parents, faculty, alumni and staff are expected to take part in the ceremony recognizing Official Ring recipients.

The unveiling of the ring will take place today, Saturday and Monday from 10 a.m. to 4 p.m., and will also be on display Sunday from 9 a.m. to noon.

would be a great change," Adam Turbett '04 said. "The new storage will help too—they needed more spots for storage because they were running out of items. You would go there, and they'd be out of the things you'd want, but you couldn't go anywhere else by that time to get any breakfast, so you'd have to get something from them anyway."

Full utilities, including water and a phone line, would mean that students could use their BU IDs instead of filling out slips to charge their food.

"That's one of the goals of the new Bison Express," Tenon said.

This is not the only goal for uphill eating. Tenon said the next step would be to find an indoor service uphill.

"The ultimate goal for us is to have permanent space inside a building. But space is at a premium on campus. Ideally, if we can get through this school year, we could possibly have a more permanent location next year," Tenon said.

The idea of the Bison Express was originally designed to service uphill residents. The new location will make it even more convenient for them.

"It's nice for the kids who are uphill and have classes in the quad to have somewhere where they can get food on the way to their classes, instead of having to go past them and come back," Trisha Berner '04 said.

"I think that uphill needs a real place to go and eat, besides a little trailer. It took too long to walk to the cafeteria because it was out of the way between McDonnell and Swartz and any of the academic buildings," Turbett said.

"It's nice to have somewhere uphill to grab a drink or a quick meal when you're in a hurry and just don't have time to make it to the LC," Janet Serafin '04 said.

The return of the Bison Express is viewed optimistically by both Tenon and Sadaghiani.

"If we can get it anywhere up on that quad by the library and have a menu and products at convenient times for the campus community, I think it could be quite successful," Tenon said.

"I hope that the new Bison Express is all that the old one was and more. I feel that it will still serve the same needs of students who originally wanted an uphill eatery, while attracting more students with its expanded options," Sadaghiani said.

The exact date of opening is as of yet unknown, but students can look forward to seeing the Bison Express back in action soon.

Russia may back U.N. resolution

In an apparent breakthrough for U.S. diplomats, Russia's foreign minister suggested Wednesday that Moscow may be willing to support a new U.N. resolution on Iraq if it helps the work of arms inspectors. Until now, Russia has insisted that the existing U.N. resolutions should be sufficient as long as Baghdad permitted the inspectors to resume their duties.

U.S. soldier dead in Philippine blast

ZAMBOANGA, Philippines—A U.S. soldier and a Filipino were killed in a powerful blast Wednesday outside a bar frequented by soldiers from an adjacent military base in the southern Philippines, officials and military sources said. At least 14 people were wounded in the explosion, which went off just a few yards from where the U.S. troops have been staying while supporting a humanitarian mission on nearby Basilan Island.

Surge in Kashmir election violence

SRINAGAR, India—Violence continued to plague the third round of balloting for the state legislature in Indian Kashmir on Wednesday, with at least 10 people killed in three separate attacks. Nearly 150 political activists, candidates, soldiers and civilians have died since elections began.

Croatian leader confronts Milosovic

THE HAGUE, Netherlands—The first head of state to testify at Slobodan Milosevic's war crimes trial portrayed him Tuesday as a frosty warmonger bent on creating an ethnically pure Greater Serbia. Croatian President Stipe Mesic gave evidence for nearly four hours as a prosecution witness at the U.N. tribunal for the former Yugoslavia. Legal experts said his testimony gave the clearest snapshot yet of how the former Serb leader took control of the federal army, the budget and the presidency, and turned them into Serb entities aimed at promoting a "greater Serbian" nation.

Bulgaria makes plan to join EU

SOFIA—European Union (EU) candidate Bulgaria said on Wednesday it should not be lumped with slower Balkan aspirant Romania because that might hurt its chances of joining the bloc by the end of 2006. While the two Balkan neighbors have recently joined forces to knock on NATO's door, Sofia said being paired with Bucharest in the EU membership queue is a disadvantage.

Thousands of foreign troops have left Congo

KINSHASA—Some 15,000 foreign troops have left the Democratic Republic of Congo in recent weeks and thousands more are expected to pull out in the coming days, senior U.N. officials said on Wednesday. The mass retreat falls under renewed efforts to end Africa's biggest war, which sucked in six countries and left more than two million people dead.

audition, but so did 35,000 other people. I didn't realize, as an adult, the proportions of popularity the show has," Roessler's father Howard Roessler said.

According to Roessler, after each interview, MTV told him he would receive a call in two weeks, but would call him after two days. When he got to the semifinal round, he did not receive the call for two weeks. When the directors called him to tell him he made the final cut, Roessler called every person in his address book and could not sleep for the next two days.

"Even up to the last second, I really never thought I was going to make it. I just couldn't see myself as one of those 'characters.' It's funny, but halfway through the interviewing process I told the casting directors I thought I was too boring to be on the 'Real World.' Lucky for them my roommates didn't have the same problem," Roessler said.

Roessler received the good news on a Friday and moved to Las Vegas just a few days later on Feb. 13. He lived with his six roommates in a casino's penthouse until June 21. According to Roessler, the design and artwork of the penthouse were gorgeous.

"Our living quarters were actually the smallest 'The Real World' house ever, half the size of Chicago, so that added to the drama. But the tradeoff was that we were in a casino. The bar, nightclub, pool, restaurants, movies and weight room were just an elevator ride away," Roessler said.

When Roessler first met his roommates, he thought they were the best looking cast he had ever seen.

"I had my ups and downs with all of them, but now we're all good friends. I never expected to come out of the show with anyone I considered a true friend, but Steven and I actually live right next to each other now and do pretty much the same stuff we did on the show," Roessler said.

Another consequence of stardom that Roessler had to get used to was the cameras. About 30 cameras were placed throughout the penthouse and constantly taped the cast.

"The first day I was kind of nervous. I was surprised about how quickly I forgot about the cameras. After about a week, you think of them as your shadow," Roessler said.

Although audience members often question the validity of the show, Roessler insists that the show is real.

"Every single part of the show was real. It's not acting. However, I'll admit that there were things I tried to avoid on the show because of the cameras, things you just don't want advertised. Through the interview process I was a lot of talk. That might be why I was chosen. But on the show I realized I didn't go to Las Vegas to become a softcore porn star," Roessler said.

So far, the first three episodes of the "The Real World" have aired. According to Roessler, the first episode was not a reflection of what the rest of the reason will be like.

"I think the first episode might have made Frank look a little bad with the whole girl situation, but I think he handled himself well and that is just the kind of guy he is. He is a genuinely a good guy and he is going to represent Phi Gamma Delta (FIJI) and Bucknell to the fullest," Rossler's fraternity brother and FIJI President Luis Davila '03 said.

Howard Roessler watches his son on television each week.

"It's strange to surf TV and all of a sudden you see your son. I expect to see him on home movies, not on TV," Roessler said.

According to Roessler, he cannot stand watching himself on television.

"I think about all the people who are looking at me at that moment and I go crazy. This whole thing still feels like a dream right now," Roessler said.

Frank Roessler '01 (above), a cast member of the long-running series "The Real World," says he doesn't consider his selection for the show an accomplishment, but rather "a chance-of-a-lifetime experience I'll never forget." The 12th installment of the series, filmed in Las Vegas and featuring Roessler, is currently airing on MTV.

Aburdene believes that Roessler is more critical of himself than other people are when they watch the "The Real World."

"When I see Frank on TV, I think he comes off very much like how he is in person. I think Bunim-Murray has done a good job in capturing Frank and incorporating his sense of humor and personality, which is why he was picked for the show in the first place," Aburdene said.

According to Roessler, being chosen for the show was just luck and he believes it does not take a rocket scientist to embarrass yourself on national television.

"I don't consider 'The Real World' admirable or an accomplishment, but at least I got a chance-of-a-lifetime experience that I'll never forget," Roessler said.

Living in Las Vegas made Roessler realize how spoiled he was at the University because he got used to the intelligent, good looking and humorous people here.

"Las Vegas is like hell's waiting room. It's about the right temperature and everyone's on their way there," Roessler said.

Even after spending five months in Las Vegas, Roessler still said that he could not have had the same experience that he had at the University anywhere else.

"I loved Bucknell. It was one of the greatest experiences of my life. As a matter of fact, all my roommates got sick of how much I talked about it," Roessler said.

As of now, Roessler does not have any specific plans for the future, although he is considering graduate school. Since the show ended, he has been doing speaking engagements around the country, such as one at California State University Northridge last week.

During the rest of the "The Real World" season, there will be a few surprises and, according to Roessler, the cast will spend two weeks on "the world's largest island continent where the toilets flush clockwise."

To see the drama unfold and secrets revealed, watch the "The Real World" to "find out what happens when people stop being polite and start getting real: The Real World, Las Vegas."

> "Every single part of the show was real. It's not acting. However, I'll admit that there were things I tried to avoid on the show because of the cameras, things you just don't want advertised."

Report shows decline of binge drinking on campus

ALCOHOL REPORT From page A1

"I have noticed that many people go to events such as BU After Dark, which is a good sign, but I don't know that I've really seen a lot of evidence that people are drinking more responsibly," Joy Dickson '03 said. "I think we may be improving in this area, but considering all the other factors that could affect the results I don't think we're improving as much as we might believe and hope. I guess I'm a bit skeptical until I can rule out other factors."

Cristy Morgan '05 agrees.

"The numbers that came from the survey sound encouraging, but I'm not sure if they actually reflect the University's situation," Morgan said.

Coordinator for Alcohol and Other Drug Programs Robert Thomas, who was in charge of conducting this survey, said the response rate was similar for both years, but that the percentage of Greek students represented in the survey was not constant.

"The Office of the Registrar supplied a list of 150 students from each class year for a total sample of 600. The response rate for the 2000 survey was 20.6 percent and 20.5 percent for 2002," Thomas said. "In the 2000 survey, 24.8 percent of the students reported being actively involved in social fraternities or sororities. In 2002, the figure was 18 percent."

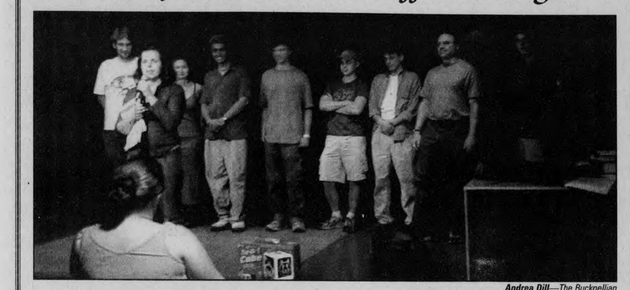
Greek students, according to Ferraro, tend to drink more than independent students. However, Ferraro said that the the two years can be compared.

"If you're giving the exact same survey in 2000 and in 2002, what you're really interested in is in the difference," Ferraro said. "There's no point in quibbling about the baseline."

Ferraro also urged people to look at the whole picture.

"The survey is one piece of the puzzle. Taken together with the decline of incidents and better reports from downtown, it seems undeniable that we are seeing some progress," Ferraro said. "Progress does not mean perfection and we still a ways to go, but we seem to be moving in the right direction."

Poetry slam series kicks off with laughs



Andrea Dill—The Bucknellian

In the first poetry slam of the semester, 13 poets braved the stage in a two-round poetic brawl. Aaron DeRosa '03 placed first in the competition. Second place honors were earned by Jennifer Perrin '05, who had the highest scoring poem of the night. Third place went to Anton DeRosa. Feature professional poet Cristin O'Keefe Aptowicz led the event, and a special guest appearance was made by last year's feature, Shappy Seasholz.

Alcohol report encourages but inspires more effort

Within the next few days, a comprehensive alcohol report regarding alcohol use among University students will be released. The report illustrates that alcohol consumption from two years ago has decreased.

One important statistic emphasized by the report is that the number of alcohol incidents decreased by 28 percent from the 2000 to the 2002 study. These incidents include write-ups by Public Safety officers, residential assistants and the police. This decline can be attributed to many changes that the University has been implementing over the past few years. For example, the University now stresses alcohol awareness more during first-year student orientation than it did in the past.

The amount of alcoholic drinks that students consume each week has also declined. In 2000, the average student consumption was 8.4 drinks a week, and now it is 6.1 drinks a week. However, that average is still above the national average at undergraduate colleges, which is 5.2 drinks a week. Although the University's average is still above the national average, the important part is that the average decreased significantly from two years ago.

Despite the fact the University is still above the national average in terms of number of alcoholic drinks consumed each week, the University is going down on the national list for hard alcohol use. Once listed as No. 1 for hard liquor use, the University recently dropped to No. 17 and has now fallen off the top 20 list. Although the University should take credit for taking appropriate measures to decrease hard alcohol use, it is possible that alcohol consumption has increased at other schools and therefore the University dropped on the list.

According to Dean of Students Richard Ferraro, one reason why alcohol use has gone down is because students are choosing to drink in moderation. He also believes that students are finding non-alcoholic events to attend. The University has been successful in providing events that allow students to drink in moderation or not drink at all. For example, last week's BU After Dark gave students a fun, non-alcoholic option for the evening. The University should continue to hold events such as this one.

Although the results are encouraging, students taking the exam are not necessarily an accurate sampling of the student population. The Office of the Registrar randomly chose 150 students from each class year, for a total of 600 students. For the 2000 survey, there was a 20.6 percent response rate and a 20.5 response rate for 2002. However, in the 2000 survey, 24.8 percent of the students who responded were active members of social fraternities or sororities. For the 2002 survey, that number was only 18 percent. Although a higher student response rate would have illustrated more accurate results, the response rates of the two years are comparable, resulting in believable numbers.

In the future, the administration should work to get more students to fill out the survey to obtain results that represent the responses of a larger portion of the student body. However, the 2002 results illustrate that the University is succeeding in its quest to decrease alcohol use and abuse on campus. Hopefully the administration and students will continue to work in the right direction and progress even further.

Partisan politics are a necessary evil

By Mike Niebauer
Senior Writer

The precision of the polls has become so effective that it has come to distort the natural flow of national political debate.

Until recently, the bipartisan approach toward the war on terror had many worried that President George W. Bush's 70 percent approval rating would distort dissenting opinion, squelching any open and healthy opposition.

One does not have to be an obviously bitter and now hopeful "Gore '04" supporter to welcome the mere fact the Democratic Party has not died out into irrelevance. The healthy dissent that is now coming out is late, but indeed welcome to many who have problems with the direction and outcome of U.S. policy against Iraq.

Former Vice President Gore's politically forward-looking and widely-reported speech opened up to debate many areas previously unquestioned. Gore asserts that the preemptive nature of the Bush Doctrine, if extended to the rest of the world, destabilizes international rules of law and conduct.

Intensifying the world's political hot spots (from Pakistan and India to Israel and Palestine) should not be the goal of the last great superpower on the planet. And whether Republican or Democrat, this new foreign policy doctrine evokes a sense of perpetual conflict, defying planners and mystifying world financial markets.

Another Democrat, Sen. Joe Biden of Delaware, head of the Foreign Affairs Committee and general supporter of the Bush Doctrine, asked probing long-term procedural questions in hearings this week. He concentrated on the "before and after" of the Iraqi campaign. With or without much cooperation from other nations, how much will it cost in lives and treasure? We can be sure that the Saudis and the Japanese will not be paying for the operation as much as they did during Desert Storm.

Financially speaking, this time it will be essentially a U.S. expenditure. How many ground troops will it take to keep order after it is over, and how long will they be on station in Iraq?

The traditional domestic and regional political rivals would have to be restrained from taking reprisals against those who have traditionally supported Iraqi President Saddam Hussein.

The Kurds in the North and the Iranians to the east have scores to settle against the current Iraqi military and political structures. Ironically, we will become the protectors and guarantors of the order of Hussein's followers (and Hussein, if he survives).

Biden said that the United States could be tied to the occupation of Iraq for decades. The United States will have to fully reintegrate the Iraqi oil reserves into the world oil markets. It will be politically difficult in a region so filled with strife, and if Western foreign powers are seen dividing up perceived Arab and Muslim mineral treasure it will not go without violent protest and social upheaval, generating new terrorism.

Biden is looking at implications and logically separating the rhetoric from the plausible outcomes of the Bush Doctrine, wondering if it can not only be sustainable in practice, but also ultimately politically palatable over time.

These issues are not as simple as they have been explained by White House press handlers. These are the fears of many in the military and diplomatic corps. Biden's efforts and that of his committee are not insignificant to this issue.

We must be political adults about politics. To believe that politicians will not use current events for political gain is naive. Both parties do it, and we should be glad they do.

Yes, Gore is calculating during his remarks as much as Vice President Dick Cheney is while he was a guest on Rush Limbaugh's radio program, injecting politics into a mostly partisan audience.

That Bush said Democrats place special interests above homeland security is no different. Bush administration officials bristled against Gore's speech, claiming he is irrelevant.

They are mistaken.

The time for questions is now—before the nation commits soldiers on the ground, not afterward. We owe it to the families of the troops we may lose to question our leaders, and we should be protected from unpatriotic allegations in doing so.

Calculation is part of the political game. But without an open debate with a healthy dissent from any loyal opposition, our system fails. If any doctrine fails to maintain support after debate, it should not be implemented.

To not debate because it will endanger the proposal is intellectually impotent. This path may not be worth the money it will take, or the lives it will cost, regardless of its present political popularity during a congressional election. The heat of the current campaign season will fade, but the consequences of these decisions will endure.

Debate with a wide spectrum of views is not impolite, it is essential in a healthy and vibrant democracy.

Groups must work for solidarity

By Daniel Morel
Staff Writer

Saturday, Sept. 28 found Washington, D.C. awash with protesters and demonstrators, all voicing their disagreement with International Money Fund and World Bank policies.

Despite the apparent success of these protests, as with previous peaceful gatherings across the globe, they were marred by more anarchistic activities.

While organizations worked to put an orderly face to the thousands of dissenters and last minute snake chains of people, critical masses of bikes clogging intersections, sidewalks and roads led to mass arrests (649 in just one day), unfortunately hampering the spirit of solidarity of the whole weekend.

While unruly protests can easily be blamed on individual agendas, they have inadvertently created divides among themselves, ineffectively each taking on the entire campus individually.

These fractures formed between the "fringe" groups have seldom been the result of personal dislikes or other petty differences. Most often, what has happened has been an inability to see beyond core belief differences. Not all the members of Sirens are vegans, nor do all the Habitat for Humanity volunteers necessarily support the Living Wage Campaign.

In my three years here, inclusion in major events among groups was minimal because, in the eyes of the organizing force, what purpose does it serve to promote your belief system if you are working with someone who doesn't ascribe to it?

It is difficult to analyze problems of the radicals and attribute it to this issue, as it requires reassessing core values and the compromises that can be made for a greater success. These compromises are not implausible, though. In many cases, differing agendas have been combined with hopes that the end will serve everyone's best interests.

Internationally, the coalition system adopted by governments, particularly in Europe, is a perfect example of how groups accept beforehand that they may work with differing viewpoints.

Back home in the United States, the hodgepodge conservative party, better known as the Republicans, provides an umbrella to all sorts of agendas and beliefs.

Brent Scowcroft, who worked under the first President Bush administration and is steadfastly against the possible war on Iraq, and William Buckley, founder of the National Review and staunch drug legalization supporter, are two conservatives who comfortably work within the Republican platform without causing too many waves.

While this may seem like nothing more than preaching morality, for those who seek a united front for greater success, fragmentation is a definite detriment.

There are those in the world (and on this campus), who strive for more cohesion, but their efforts will only be rewarded when single agendas are replaced with mass determination.

Bucknell "bubble" working too well

By Jeff Day
Writer

University news, local news, current events or international crises. I thought about the war on Iraq as I sat at my desk. I thought about the University's Vision 2010 as I navigated the Internet, and I contemplated about current events as I ate lunch in the cafeteria.

Then it dawned on me; I know almost nothing about any of these topics—not that I am naive or uninterested. Consider a few questions: When was the last time you heard U.S. President George W. Bush speak or read a speech about the status of the United States against Iraq? Do you even know what Vision 2010 is? And for that matter, its current state of affairs? Do you simply know of any national current events worthy of writing about?

For the majority of students on campus, current events are the memories and after thoughts of the previous weekend.

If you answered these questions similarly to the way I did, you too would find yourself struggling to find a topic to pinpoint.

We have all heard of the infamous "bubble" at the University, and I am quickly learning of its true significance. Yes, some students do have a great deal of knowledge about University events, community news and national reports, but these individuals have made a conscious effort to search out information and maintain a certain level of awareness of the outside world.

For the majority of students at the University, current events are the memories and afterthoughts of the previous weekend; community news is the state of affairs at the Beer Barn; University news is seeing who made this week's Public Safety Report.

These are indeed all important activities, but only four weeks into school, I feel as if I were removed from "society" and placed into some self-contained world of studying and partying.

Of course,we are all learning of the relationship between supply and demand, deciphering constellations and relearning history—or at least understanding the true value of home-cooked meals, despite our previous opinions of mom's cooking.

College should be more than simply passing tests and avoiding alcohol citations. We all came to the University to learn and have an absolutely incredible four years — for some of us that entails an understanding of the true meaning of cheap beer.

Yet, accompanying all of these aspects should be a greater understanding of current events, national news and simply the real world. When we leave the University, I hope that we enter a world that we are well prepared for and not one that has been forgotten for the previous four years.

This article is a wake-up call for me, and hopefully to others as well. Yes, I know the Buffalo Bills' record, and, yes, I know what each of my hall mates did over the weekend. In doing so, I realize that I lack any knowledge of important world events. College is fun, college is an education and college will most likely be the best four years of your life. Let's just remember that there's a world around us that hasn't stopped moving simply because we stopped paying attention.

Complaints seem to lean left

By Aaron Hanlon
Staff Writer

I realize that it's unlike me to be a complainer, but I might as well get in on the act. It seems as though everyone complains about everything these days.

"Hippies" don't want a war, so they complain about it. Minorities are tired of being marginalized, so they complain about it. Homosexuals don't want you to say something is "gay," animal-rights activists don't want you to eat meat and socialists don't want you to keep your own money.

So they all complain about it. And that's fine.

We all have the right to state our grievances. But there seems to be a left-wing trend in the vast majority of complaints that we encounter on campus. In fact, of those who are politically active on campus, these complaints are shouting down at all of us from a titanic, leftist podium.

And while they preach ideals of tolerance, diversity, equality and justice, they simultaneously and hypocritically marginalize and discriminate against an oppressed, politically-active, conservative minority.

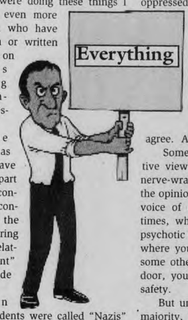
This is my complaint; that many of those who are so absorbed in their crusade for the establishment of Utopia at the University, many of those who fight for the rights of the oppressed and downtrodden, are themselves the oppressors.

When the left finds itself in the majority, it seems to become the embodiment of that which it consistently condemns.

Such an observation is supported by historical and contemporary events. Most obviously, the leftist regimes of Lenin, Stalin, Mao and others were indeed authoritarian and despotic.

And all arose from leftist ideologies that advocated the freedom and empowerment of the oppressed working or peasant classes. Lenin and Stalin's Bolsheviks claimed to represent the international proletariat, and later they represented the working-class constituency by arbitrarily forcing many of them into labor camps.

More recently, and far less severe, are the examples of disgruntled "children of the left" (children I hope, for if faculty were doing these things I would be even more disgusted), who have torn down or written profanities on posters bearing conservative messages.



When several students were called "Nazis" by a leftist, no campus-wide e-mail was sent, even though the incident was reported, and some students were concerned for their safety.

Guest speakers are certainly liberally biased, from the ultra-liberal Toni Morrison to the moderately liberal Janet Reno and Ralph Nader. The Office of Lesbian, Gay, Bisexual and Transgender Awareness has its own staff, yet Fellowship of Christian Athletes stores its Bibles and supplies in my living room, and has only enough money to buy Kool-Aid and potato chips.

The consistently oppressed conservatives on campus do not have an office or resource center, despite their minority status.

My complaint has relevance to the daily life of a politically conservative student: sympathizing with some leftist ideology, and drawing on my experiences as a member of the oppressed minority, I realize that it can be difficult when the majority of people believe differently than you do.

Often times, professors who you vaguely suspect (read: undoubtedly know) are leftist-leaning, can be intimidating in discussion when you disagree. After all, they grade us!

Sometimes speaking a conservative viewpoint among peers can be nerve-wracking; nobody wants to be the opinionated jerk who disrupts the voice of the majority. And sometimes, when someone who may be psychotic takes the time to find out where you live and write "Nazi" or some other derogatory slur, on your door, you might even fear for your safety.

But unlike the empowered leftist majority, I am going to stick to my principles and tough it out, without calling on the University or the left to knock off constitutional rights here and there and hand me a "minority crutch."

I have no problem tolerating the anti-war messages everywhere I walk, even though they make my shoes chalky.

As a matter of fact, I should really

Dissenters not making the case

By Tom Elliott
Senior Writer

While America continues to ensure its security through preparation for a possible preemptive strike against a declared hostile force, those who dissent our foreign policy are peddling out increasingly inane excuses for inaction.

They'll speak with great fervor about the sanctity of the freedom to dissent, and its instrumental role in American political discourse. Near no one would challenge this; yet speaking against your country's stated position should be done from a principled, educated position. To do so for reasons of merely creating an intended illusion of popular dissatisfaction will only degenerate the quality of such debate, and therefore possess no meaningful purpose.

From all the dissenting opinion expressed recently, it's quite astonishing that it's been almost entirely worthless. Tossing around the old wartime peace clichés, like "War is not the Answer," "Give Peace a Chance" and "Peace at all Costs" only detracts from the ability for the dissenters to provide an articulate reasoning for why exactly the United States should not engage this enemy.

We already know who is on board: the Bush administration, the vast majority of the American public, a near entirety of the congressional Republicans, the majority of the congressional Democrats, the United Kingdom (including both the Labor and Conservative parties), Israel and a plethora of other countries (Arab included) pending some sort of U.N. resolution.

So then, you ask, who exactly is against liberating Iraq? Most notably, former Vice President Al Gore, Barbra Streisand and some other lefties who are confusing this with the Vietnam War. Ted Kennedy, who was "unimpressed" with the argument Bush has made, is playing it like Daschle—admitting Iraqui President Saddam Hussein is evil, but failing to go the next step and demand regime change.

Gore first. His comments were probably the dumbest of all, even embarrassing the New Republic—a publication that continually supports Gore & Co. Gore's speech to the San Francisco Commonwealth Club essentially said that America is now more dangerous than the terrorists. The most astounding thing about his speech was its incredible irony.

Gore broke with party ranks to vote for war with Iraq in 1991, a vote that passed very narrowly. In 2000, Gore told the BBC that he had "told Iraqi opposition politicians that the United States remains committed to the overthrow of President Saddam Hussein." Even more recently, Gore gave a speech earlier this year to the Council on Foreign Relations on the necessity of a "final reckoning" with Iraq. He even described the country as a "virulent threat in a class by itself" and suggested that the United States consider ways to oust Hussein.

Now Streisand. In a fax that she sent to Rep. Dick Gephardt, D-Mo., she explains why the Democrats should "go oh the offensive" over Iraq. In part it reads, "How can we ignore the obvious influence on the Bush administration of such special interests as the oil industry, the chemical companies, the logging industry, the defense contractors, the mining industry and the automobile industry, just to name a few?" All of which she claims will gain from a war with Iraq. Don't we all know it—as soon as we start dropping bombs, Cadillac sales will go through the roof, and the logging industry will naturally flourish. Um, what?

Even more recently, Babs gave a speech at a Democratic fundraiser in which she quoted Shakespeare to add to her case as to why war with Iraq was not in America's interests. A short while later, it was brought to her attention that Shakespeare had not written the text she had cited. She maintained that the content was still true, and whoever did write it, should write a play. After reading the "Shakespeare" she had quoted, I can assure you that Streisand is no academic; it didn't sound at all Shakespearean—it wasn't even in iambic pentameter.

Reps. David Bonior, D-Mich., and Jim McDermott, D-Wash., traveled all the way to Baghdad to deliver a Jane "Hanoi" Fonda type message to America. They were interviewed on just about every Sunday morning news show to deliver their dissent. Among other strange things said, they accused the president of lying about the Iraqi threat and called on the administration to "let the U.N. inspectors do their job" and "take the Iraqis on their face value." It is sort of difficult to let the inspectors "do their job" when Hussein won't let them. And why should we now disregard the lies that have perpetually emanated from the Iraqi government, so we can "take them at face value." Gimme a break.

Sure, we all want to "Seek Peace Above all Else," but in an intelligent manner. Allowing our enemies to prepare for our annihilation isn't the most brilliant way to ensure peace. Saddam has connections with terrorist groups that have demonstrated their ability to strike us. He has evidenced a willingness to provide them with both arms and financial rewards. He possesses weapons of mass destruction, which surely he wouldn't mind supplying, either. So next time some peacenik-protester says something about "No War," ask them if they want another Sept. 11.

World's first HIV positive Muppet makes appearance

By Elisabeth Salemme
Staff Writer

Kami, the world's first HIV-positive Muppet, made its debut on Africa's version of "Sesame Street" on Monday in an attempt to strengthen the AIDS awareness campaign as well as to promote acceptance for people infected with HIV. The notion of presenting pre-school-age children with such a serious topic as AIDS is ridiculous.

While AIDS awareness is important, especially in Africa where the disease is so prevalent, children who have not even begun school yet do not need to be as aware about AIDS as adults, who are more likely to contract the disease through their lifestyles.

Television characters that promote acceptance and understanding are a good idea, especially in countries where these ideals are not always practiced. However, the creation of a Muppet that is infected with HIV is only a political move and will not provide children with the sentiments of tolerance as the show's producers claim it will.

We do not see characters on children's television that are infected with cancer or other terminal illnesses. It is too traumatic for children, who are at such a vulnerable age, to be presented with such depressing topics.

In addition, while Kami's claimed purpose is to promote acceptance, the fact is, Kami shows children who have AIDS they are indeed different and, therefore, they can not feel normal even as they watch television.

While AIDS awareness is important, especially in Africa where the disease is so prevalent, children who have not even begun school yet do not need to be as aware about AIDS as adults, who are more likely to contract the disease through their lifestyles. Children who may have been born HIV-positive do not need the constant reminder that they were essentially born with a death sentence.

Television programs for children should not have such emotionally-triggering themes, but should be amusing and entertaining, as this may be the only escape some children have from their own depressing reality.

Kami is not the first of her kind to bring up such inappropriate issues for young children. The Israeli and Palestinian version of "Sesame Street" presents children with Dafi and Haneen, a Jewish and an Arab girl who are friends. Every day, children in Israel and Palestine are affected by the severe conflict that is taking place where they live. Again, they are too young to have the constant reminder of this reality.

On the other hand, according to Time Africa magazine, other countries have introduced characters to Sesame Street that will certainly be beneficial for young children, such as Canada's "Katie," a wheelchair zooming schoolgirl who encourages positive attitudes toward physical disabilities, China's "Xiao Mei Zi," a preschool girl who encourages girl-power and self-esteem and Egypt's "Khoka," a knowledge-hungry female monster who coaxes girls to go to school and excel there. These themes are age-appropriate and serve the purpose of promoting acceptance as well as encouragement to excel.

The producers of the African version of "Sesame Street" need to reconsider the potentially harmful effect the character of Kami may have on children's psyches. It is not fair to begin with that such a great number of African children are born with AIDS. It is wrong to take away their happiness with a reminder of this reality every day.

Reagan administration bears responsibility for U.S. hostility towards Iraq

By Michael Dudzinski
Staff Writer

The bio-weapons that U.S. President George W. Bush claims are currently a threat to the United States were supplied to Iraq during the early years of the Reagan administration. The Associated Press confirms that past government records reveal that former President Ronald Reagan and former Vice President George H. W. Bush are responsible for supplying Iraq with bio-weapons during the early 1980s.

This is not the only blunder of the Reagan/Bush administration that has backfired. The source of the conflict that existed in Afghanistan is blatantly attributed to the Taliban, which, until recently, governed much of the country. It is often ignored that former Vice President Bush covertly supported and supplied the Taliban with weaponry in the mid-1980s, in order to prevent the Soviet Union from controlling the oil-rich territory.

B & P Commentary

What these facts convey is that the roots of the war on terror can be traced to the Reagan era of the 1980s. The Taliban and Iraq were supported and funded by the United States, which wanted to safeguard its oil interests in the Middle East.

After it became clear that the United States was only interested in oil investments and used both regimes to achieve its goals, the Taliban and Iraq soon changed from friend to foe.

The Associated Press said that the Center for Disease Control sent strains of anthrax, the West Nile Virus and smallpox to Iraq during the early 1980s. Although the Commerce Department legitimized the export of biological weaponry to Iraq, the Bush administration has failed to claim responsibility for supplying Iraq with the very weapons it seeks to destroy. Sen. Robert Byrd, D-Va., demands answers from the current Bush administration on the correlation between the Iraqi agenda and past U.S. endeavors.

In 1983, Reagan sent Donald Rumsfeld to Iraq as a special envoy. Newsweek said that Rumsfeld met Iraqi President Saddam Hussein to supply him with biological weapons and economic aid in support of the Iran-Iraq war. The Reagan administration feared that the Iranian revolutionaries would seek control of oil reserves in the Middle East. For the next five years, the United States clandestinely backed Hussein in order to protect the oil interests of the elite.

Even more disappointing was Bush's attempt to cover up many of Hussein's criminal activities in order to ensure his chance for reelection in 1992. According to Newsweek, top Defense Department officials claim that documents containing such information about Hussein were kept confidential until after the war ended. The former Bush administration feared that if certain criminal activities of Hussein were released, the public would condemn the president for failing to oust the Iraqi leader. The records were kept confidential to give Bush an edge in the upcoming election.

Byrd said that the main concern stemming from the disclosed information on United States-Iraq relations is that certain Reagan/Bush loyalists may have instigated the very conflict that exists today. The information exposes the likelihood that the war on terror may not be as modest as the current Bush administration claims. Such a revelation suggests that the atrocities plaguing our nation could have been avoided in the first place. Many scholars have expressed alarm that the administration's present agenda suddenly seems all too coincidental.

Despite its acknowledgement of Hussein as a menacing despot, evidence reveals that the United States still sought to continually appease the dictator to safeguard oil interests in our nation. What this means is that the Reagan/Bush administration had put their own special interests ahead of its primary responsibility to protect the American people. So who should be brought to justice? One might take a look within the U.S. government instead of holding the leaders of other nations responsible.

Economic concerns may not affect upcoming elections

The future of the economy may look bleak, but national security may replace it as the deciding factor in the upcoming presidential elections

Bush speaks about economic security in Iowa. The Bush administration has been criticized for downplaying the current economic slowdown in order to focus on the war in Iraq.

By Jim Leahy
Senior Writer

America's economy is suffering as corporate scandals, post-bubble and post-Sept. 11 business slowdowns, poor earnings numbers and a possibly devastating shutdown of West Coast ports continue to rattle consumer confidence. The stock markets have responded with weakness—except for a few strong days—and money is remaining out of stocks.

Despite this, Republicans have successfully kept Iraq at the center of reelection campaigns. The election season next month will certainly be volatile and it remains to be seen how economic issues will actually affect the races and outcomes on Election Day.

The signs of sluggishness in the American economy are many. Data flowing from all sources that investors look to for hope continues to be weak. Just this week, reports including the Chicago Purchasing Managers Index, personal income, Redbook Retail Average, Purchasing Managers Index, construction spending and the consumer comfort index were released. Initial jobless claims, factory orders and the unemployment rate will all be announced later in the week.

This week's numbers are not that good. Manufacturing activity in September fell, according to the Institute for Supply Management. According to The Wall Street Journal, this decline "reinforced fears of a double-dip recession. But since the decline wasn't as sharp as some investors had feared, that bad news was interpreted by some as a positive."

Personal spending was also down and below estimates, as was the Chicago Purchasing Managers Index. Numbers coming at the end of the week are expected to show further weakness—including the unemployment rate, which could rise to almost 6 percent.

News is adding to other jitters on Wall Street. On the West Coast, port operators at 29 ports have locked employees out after a dispute with their unions. "The Pacific Maritime Association locked some 10,500 union workers out of the docks Sunday after accusing them of staging widespread work slowdowns," said The New York Times. The cost to the economy is about $1 billion a day and U.S. President George W. Bush said, "We're worried about it."

Earnings reports are not helping either. Retail companies are hurting with the decline in back-to-school spending, some financial companies are hurting with the decline in trading revenues and the loss of IPO deals and Wal-Mart is warning that its sales are down. It is not all bad, so some investors are showing their resolve and keeping money in the market.

All of this might be the reason for Tuesday's massive market run-up. Markets have finished off one of the worst Septembers in history and stock prices are relatively low. On Tuesday, all the members of the Dow Jones Industrial Average rose and helped the market to a 300-plus point gain. Most commentators do not expect this rise to continue and are writing it off as short-term.

The tea leaves for the markets continue to be very hazy. Many investors continue to sit on the sidelines waiting for concrete signs that the economy is not declining again or that stocks will begin to rise. The Federal Reserve Bank has lowered interest rates so many times that most feel rates will not go any lower. This takes some ammunition away from the bank and may make a recovery harder.

As the midterm elections approach, candidates are beginning to solidify their running platforms for the final weeks of the campaign. Democrats are finding that Iraq and the creation of a Department of Homeland Security are taking center stage while the economy has been a secondary issue. The Republicans have been riding the talk of war into the elections and are still unsure how their strategy will play out.

The Washington Post said that "the debate over Iraq has created a fragmented environment politically, and it is not clear whether that will change between now and Nov. 5. Were it not for the emergence of possible war with Iraq and renewed focus on the next phase in the war against terrorism, this midterm election might be shaping up as more typical of others in the past, with Democrats exploiting economic anxieties to their advantage against the president's party in Congress."

The Democrats' desire to focus on the economy shows in recent poll numbers. According to a Washington Post-ABC News poll, Democrats are better positioned on the economy, Social Security, education and health care. Taxes and the federal budget have the two parties at a tie. With the president controlling the spotlight, economic issues will likely remain off the stage.

American voters always take economic issues seriously. The U.S. economy is struggling right now as we head into midterm elections and campaigns will likely be pushing fixes for it. War talk and homeland security issues have taken over and may influence the outcome of the elections more than the poor economy will.

Amid controversy, New Jersey Sen. Torricelli withdrawals bid for reelection

By Michelle Johnson
Writer

Sen. Robert Torricelli speaks at a press conference. Following several corruption allegations and poor results in public opinion polls, Torricelli has withdrawn his bid for reelection.

Sen. Robert Torricelli, D-N.J., withdrew his bid for reelection on Monday, due to an ethical scandal involving illegal campaign contributions.

Though an investigation conducted by the U.S. Attorney's Office in January ended with no official charges filed against Torricelli, a report issued by the Senate Ethics Committee in mid-July reprimanded him for taking gifts from businessman David Chang on at least three occasions.

According to the Associated Press, Chang says that these gifts included an $8,100 Rolex watch and Italian suits. Chang is currently in jail for illegally contributing roughly $53,000 to Torricelli's 1996 campaign. He claims that in return, Torricelli lobbied for his business interests in the United States and South Korea.

The Philadelphia Inquirer said that this decision was made by Torricelli and other members of the Democratic Party after public opinion polls released during the past week revealed that Torricelli was losing by a 2 to 1 ratio, regarding independent voters, to his Republican opponent Douglas Forrester. This voting block is critical in determining the winner of this race, which is pivotal for the maintenance of the Democrats' one-seat majority in the Senate.

Torricelli also dropped from a 14-point advantage over Forrester in June to a 13-point deficit in another poll released during the weekend.

"I will not be responsible for the loss of the Democratic majority in the United States Senate," Torricelli said during an emotional news conference held after the decision to withdraw had been made, according to The New York Times.

Torricelli's decision to drop out of the race for the good of the party has raised many objections. Sept. 16 was the official deadline to change the ballot in New Jersey. Now, with only five weeks to go until the election, Republicans are heatedly accusing Democrats of violating election laws.

"The laws of the state of New Jersey do not contain a 'we-think-we're-going-to-lose-so-we-get-to-pick-someone-new' clause," Forrester said in a New York Times article.

Though this particular situation has never occurred before in New Jersey, there was an extension granted to the Republican Party two years ago when Governor Donald DiFrancesco had to quit the GOP primary after his own ethical controversy. The legislature, which was composed of a Republican majority, postponed the primary for three weeks to give his replacement, Bob Franks, enough time to campaign.

There is also a clause in New Jersey law that gives a party permission to replace a candidate if he leaves office within 30 days of an election. This indicates that Torricelli may have to resign from his current office to avoid the consequences of allowing the deadline for ballot changes to pass.

On Tuesday Democratic leaders announced that former New Jersey Sen. Frank Lautenberg was to replace Torricelli. Lautenberg, who is 78, has served three terms in the state senate already, which the party feels is likely to give him credibility in the public eye. The fact that Lautenberg has statewide name recognition is also a key asset since it is so late in the campaigning season.

As if this wasn't enough for Forrester to contend with, New Jersey has voted for the Democrats in the past seven elections, giving many of Torricelli's colleagues confidence that they still have a shot at winning on Nov. 5.

The party was attempting to remove the final obstacle in officially replacing Torricelli on Wednesday by asking the State Supreme Court to grant a waiver to the Sept. 16 deadline.

ball, but because of his tight schedule he could not attend the game.

Rendell was in the area because he had already visited 66 out of the 67 counties in Pennsylvania. He proudly said that Union County was the 67th. After his meeting with the Union County Democrats, he was going to Bloomsburg to meet with students, attend a fundraiser and visit the Bloomsburg Fair.

Rendell worked the crowd quickly, pausing momentarily to chat with friends. They discussed past family vacations and briefly planned for future ones. When he met strangers, he gave a big smile and said, "How are you doing today!"

Rendell served as the 121st mayor of Philadelphia from 1992-1999. His biography notes that "among his many accomplishments as mayor, he eliminated a $250 million deficit; balanced the city's budget and generated five straight budget surpluses; reduced business and income taxes for four consecutive years; implemented new revenue-generating initiatives and dramatically improved services to the city's neighborhoods."

Former Vice President Al Gore has referred to him as "America's Mayor."

Rendell has many opinions on what is best for the state. He promises to try to increase the state's share of public education costs above the present 35 percent level, possibly as high as 50 percent. He wants to increase economic development by creating a series of "new revolving loans and grant programs," which would help rebuild Pennsylvania's smaller cities.

Rendell also supports abortion rights, while advocating the adoption of unwanted children and programs to encourage abstinence. He supports the death penalty, but would make DNA testing available to defendants in capital cases. He also wants to establish a panel to review the experience of defense attorneys in such cases.

Bison maintain their home unbeaten streak

With a recent 0-0 tie against Philadelphia University, the men's soccer team has gone five games without losing a game

By Tara Utchel
Senior Writer

The men's soccer team managed to squeak out a 2-0 win over Monmouth and a 0-0 tie with Philadelphia University this past week. The Orange and Blue have gone five games without a loss—their longest unbeaten streak of the season.

The Bison dueled visiting Monmouth University on Sunday, Sept. 29. They came out on top, a victory that goes in the history books as the program's best start since the 1974 season.

"I feel that we are starting to gel as a team and we are beginning to really read each other's tendencies. The freshmen are doing a great job of coming in and getting the job done," Jon Hemmert '05 said. "We really have several threats that we can look to go to, and I feel that has been a big part of our success."

Lewisburg got caught in the aftermath of hurricane Isadore last Friday and Saturday night, so the game field fell victim to the 48-hour downpour. The right corner of the field suffered from a 20-by-20 soggy patch. Coaches and players were wary of the conditions and feared that it would interfere with the pace of the game.

"We wanted to play into the mud for the first half, letting Monmouth play into the second half, after it got worse. However, it did not get much worse and really was a non-factor," Head Coach Brendan Nash said

Even though the field conditions were not a factor, the men's performance lacked intensity throughout the first half. For most of the season, the Bison have started the game more sluggish than normal. The team usually comes alive in the second half, showing its opponents how to put the ball in the back of the net.

"The first half we did not dictate the pace of the game like we wanted to. The second half we came out with more energy and it showed with two quick goals," Nash said. "From there we just finished the game and got the shutout."

The Bison exploded into the second half, wasting no time getting on the board. Dennis Deluca '05 passed the ball away from pressure to an open Hemmert. Hemmert crossed the ball to Nick Taylor '03, who headed the ball into the left corner of the goal, just 3 minutes, 26 seconds into the half.

Over three minutes later, Hemmert earned his team-leading eighth assist of the season. He crossed the ball to Scott Visnic '06, who was waiting in front of the goal. Visnic mirrored the first goal of the game by heading the ball into the net to finalize the score at 2-0.

"Jon is so tough to defend. He had two assists, but also set up quite a few other chances. He is so accurate on restarts we feel we can score anytime we have a restart in the offensive third," Nash said.

"Getting assists is such a team effort, it involves an entire buildup, and most importantly a finish from the goal scorer," Hemmert said. "I have been fortunate enough to have all of those things falling in place and have been able to pick up a few assists. With strong defense and solid play in the midfield, a goal here or there should get us the win."

Despite the strong defense and solid play in the midfield, the Bison failed to get a goal on Tuesday, Oct. 1 against visiting Philadelphia University. The Orange and Blue's defense did manage to fend off the Rams' attack for a 0-0 tie.

Bucknell dominated the entire game, but could not convert any of their 24 shots. It was just one of those days, when nothing was working for the team.

"The game against Philadelphia was pure frustration. Our inability to execute chances, coupled with many poor services, kept us from finding the net," Hemmert said. "It was just one of those games that you know you will regret later in the season. We will look back on this one as a game we should have won."

Stage set for Colgate game

By Cory Nadler
Senior Writer

The Bucknell football team improved its record to 2-2 with a 27-13 win over Delaware State (DSU) on Saturday behind three touchdown passes by quarterback Todd Wenrich '03.

Delaware State dug a hole for itself early, committing four penalties on its first drive of the game. On the same drive, Anthony Lewis '05 came off the edge to block the DSU punt, which was recovered by the Bison at the DSU 40-yard line.

Five plays later, Wenrich threw a jump ball into the end zone that Jim Horan '03 went up and hauled in from 10 yards out. Wenrich's first touchdown pass gave the Bison a 7-0 lead with 9 minutes, 57 seconds remaining in the first quarter.

"Bucknell was able to capitalize on our mistakes," DSU defensive back Khary Darlington said.

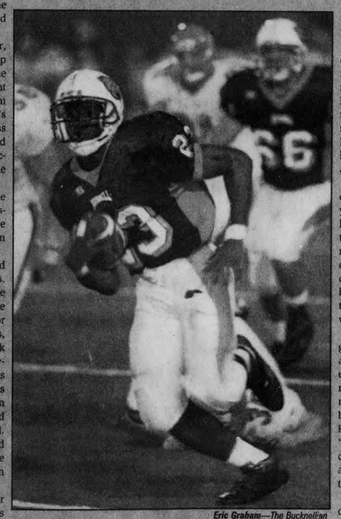
The Bison continued to force DSU mistakes. On the next drive, the Hornets tried a fake punt, but were called for an illegal forward pass, which gave the ball back to the Bison. After moving the ball only 20 yards on seven plays, Chris Lundberg '03 came on the field to try a 41-yard field goal into the wind. The ball barely cleared the crossbar to give the Bison a 10-0 lead late in the first quarter.

Defense took over the game for both sides for the remainder of the first half. The Hornets looked as though they were poised to move in for a score following a Bucknell fumble on the Bucknell 39-yard line. The Bison defense held inside the red zone. Stephane Pluviose '04 forced and recovered a fumble on the BU 18-yard line to stop the DSU threat.

The Bucknell defense continued its great play in the second half. On the first drive of the half, Lewis intercepted a DSU pass on the Bison 17-yard line. The Bison were not able to capitalize on the turnover, and had to punt the ball away. Lewis earned player of the game honors, finishing the day with seven tackles, the interception and the blocked punt.

On the ensuing drive, DSU marched 58 yards on six plays to make the score 10-7 in favor of the Bison. The scoring drive was capped off by a 33-yard touchdown pass for the Hornets.

On the next drive, the Bison faced a fourth down and one yard to go at midfield. The snap for the punt went directly to Mike Leatherman '04, who ran the ball 42 yards to the DSU 8-yard line. The Bison ran a play action pass from Wenrich to Ken Lockard '03 for the 8-yard touchdown. Lockard's first career touchdown gave the Bison a 17-7 lead with 7:00 remaining in the third quarter.



Eric Graham—The Bucknellian

Runningback Blamah Sarnor '06 carried the ball 20 times for 79 yards in the game over Delaware State.

"The fake punt was something we had worked on," Assistant Coach Dave Kotulski said. "At that point, we needed something. It helped change the momentum, and then our offense took control of the game."

The momentum did not completely swing Bucknell's way quite yet. On the kickoff following the second Bison touchdown of the afternoon, the Hornets' DaShaun Morris ran the ball back 92 yards, up the middle of the field, for a touchdown. After DSU missed the extra point attempt, the Bison led 17-13 with 6:44 remaining in the quarter.

To begin the fourth quarter, the Bucknell offense chewed up five minutes off the clock with a 13-play, 89-yard drive. The drive was capped off by a 29 yard touchdown pass from Wenrich to a wide open Albert Marquardt '04, to make the score 24-13 in favor of the Bison.

On their next drive, the Bison marched 60 yards on nine plays. Lundberg knocked in a 37-yard field goal to push the score to 27-13 Bison. Bucknell's defense held on to the lead for a final score of 27-13.

The Bison almost doubled the total yards of the Hornets, keeping DSU to 216 total yards, while racking up 394 yards of offense. The defense continues to be a strong point for the Bison week in and week out.

"Every week we get used to each other a little more, and trust each other a little more and just do the normal things," linebacker Kevin Ransome '05 said. "We were able to change up the coverages and confuse them."

While the defense continues to play well, the Bison offense has been improving from week to week.

"We have been struggling with being consistent, but the offensive line is coming around and everything is flowing," Wenrich said.

"The offense did a marvelous job, especially in the second half," Kotulski said.

The Bison open their Patriot League season when they host Colgate on Saturday at Christy Mathewson-Memorial Stadium.

"Colgate is a game you always look forward to playing," Kotulski said.

Volleyball gains first Patriot League victory over Lafayette

Bucknell relied on a number of players, including Jennifer Wrigley '02 (right) and Chelsea Robertson '05 (left) to win against Lafayette. This week, the team got their first Patriot League victory of the season.

This week marked the Bucknell women's volleyball team's first Patriot League victory of the season. The Bison now stand at an impressive 7-7 overall record and have returned to the .500 mark in the Patriot League with a 1-1 record.

Bucknell defeated Lafayette in three consecutive games on Saturday, Sept. 29. In the first game of the evening, the Bison won in a 30-24 victory. During the second game, the Orange and Blue defeated the Leopards 30-22. In the final game of the night, Bucknell pulled out an impressive 30-21 win.

"The team worked well together," Head Coach Cindy Opalski said. "We were upset about our loss on Wednesday against Lehigh, and picked up our intensity. We worked in practice the past few days and were able to execute very well against Lafayette."

"Beating Lafayette was definately a confidence booster," Melanie Ghiz '03 said.

Bucknell relied on a number of players to lead the team to victory. Ghiz and Brandi Trapasso '04 led the team with 10 kills each, and Brandi Trapasso added another 14 digs to help the Bison effort. Breean Trapasso '04 finished the game with a team-leading 23 assists in the victory.

"We went into the Lafayette game with a great attitude," Brandi Trapasso said. "A lot of freshman stepped up and played well in the game, and that made us more unified as a team. Most teams normally have six or seven girls playing well and the rest backing them up, but we had all 14 girls playing well against Lafayette."

Last week Bucknell was defeated by Lehigh in their first Patriot League match. It was a disappointing loss, but the women took it in stride and came back to win their next game against Lafayette.

"The loss to Lehigh was very frustrating because I know how well we can play, and that night we just didn't play to our potential. I do look forward to playing them again in our gym," Ghiz said.

"We were going into the Lehigh game really excited, but we didn't really step up and play well," Brandi Trapasso said. "We didn't come together as a team. It was disappointing, but we have taken that loss and it has made us better as a team. We are going to keep getting better and become more competitive with each game."

Bucknell will face Patriot League rivals American University, on Friday, Oct. 4, and will face Navy, on Saturday, Oct. 5, in Davis Gymnasium.

"American is a very competitive team, and they are really good every year," Brandi Trapasso said. "Coach has really been working us, and we have been practicing harder than ever before. Because of all our practice I think we are prepared for the game against American. That game will give us momentum into the Navy game and will help set the pace for the next couple of games. We are going to take it one match at a time, but we are really going to step it up this weekend."

"I think that our team has great potential for the following Patriot League games. We have great defense and I think we will really need it in some of the big games coming up." Ghiz said.

Injured University student gives back to local community

Sometimes a twisted ankle can lead to lollipops and rewarding coaching

Caralyn Desautels '03 spends her time as an assistant coach to the Lewisburg High School women's soccer team.

Bucknell students get some exposure to Lewisburg High School sports through Friday night football games held in Christy Mathewson-Memorial Stadium. But take a short drive to the high school to watch a Lewisburg High women's soccer game, and on the sidelines you will find a Bucknell senior helping to run the show. Lollipop in mouth, there is Caralyn Desautels '03, one of the team's assistant coaches.

The story behind Desautels ending up coaching at Lewisburg is one of frustration, disappointment and the desire to give back. Heavily recruited in high school by the University Head Soccer Coach Chrissy Findlay, in high school, Desautels was a coach's dream player. She had been playing soccer from the time she was 4 years old all the way through elementary, middle and high school. She was a 13-letter varsity athlete in soccer, track and basketball. She also held practically every soccer accomplishment there was, including playing for the Select Team of New York and traveling overseas to Europe to compete in the World Scholar-Athlete Games with 2000 athletes from 150 countries.

Attracted to the University because "it was a nice size and a good fit geographically and academically," in addition to its soccer program, Caralyn fit right in. It was in the second semester of her first year that events were put into motion that she would find to change her soccer career forever.

"I was first injured when I rolled my ankle," Desautels said. "I'm not exactly sure how I did it."

Whatever the cause, she came back for preseason practice in the fall of her sophomore year to find she had a constant pain in her ankle.

"I went to the doctor and I was told I needed surgery," Desautels said. "The ligaments and tendons in my ankle were torn and dislocated, so I went in locally to have it done."

Unfortunately, the first surgery was unsuccessful at fixing her injury, and she continued to have a lot of pain. Desautels had two more surgeries on her ankle, one in her hometown of Buffalo, N.Y., and another in Baltimore, Md., in May of this year, performed by the top ankle surgeon in the country, until everything was fixed.

"This is literally the first time in two years that I can walk without pain," Desautels said.

While all this was going on, Desautels gradually accepted the fact that, due to her health, she would never play soccer competitively again—every athlete's nightmare.

"Throughout her sophomore year, it was a waiting game with all the surgeries and rehab," Findlay said. "We had her doing stats, but it's not the same as sitting on the bench with the team. Soccer is such a big part of her life and always has been, and I think that when you take something as important as that away, it's really hard."

To keep involved on campus, Desautels joined Kappa Kappa Gamma sorority and continued to work hard in her double major of Spanish and economics, but there was still that nagging feeling.

"I think it took me seven months to come to the fact that I'd never be able to play again," Desautels said. "You have to tell yourself when you wake up in the morning wanting to do one thing, that you can't do it. When I finally got over it, I thought the only way I could stay involved was through coaching, and that's when Chrissy talked to the coach at Lewisburg."

Coaching is not new to Desautels. One of her many involvements in soccer is a camp run by the MLS which she attended when she was 15, and that she was later asked to come back and coach. The camp runs anywhere from 4-9 weeks over the summer and travels all over the country. In addition, she has helped to run some camps at her old high school, Nichols School.

Her coaching experience is one of the things that interested Lewisburg High School Head Women's Soccer Coach Mark Nebiker.

"I first met Caralyn in May of this year through Chrissy Findlay," Nebiker said. "I've been talking to Chrissy to see if she knew anyone who might be interested in helping out, and she gave me Caralyn's name. Caralyn and I e-mailed back and forth, and when I met her, I found that she knew the game very well and that she coached over the summer for the MLS."

> "She's confident in what she's doing, gets her point across well and doesn't take any garbage from the kids."
> —Lewisburg High School Head Women's Soccer Coach Mark Nebiker

Nebiker gave her an assistant coaching position, and her duties include running the Junior Varsity program. Aside from working on more fundamentals and conditioning, one of the best things that Nebiker has found about having Desautels as a coach is that she connects with the girls and can identify with them.

"I like the way she's confident in what she's doing, gets her point across well and doesn't take any garbage from the kids," Nebiker said.

One unique thing that has popped up while coaching has been a box of lollipops on the bench.

"As a player, I knew I was on the opposite end as the referees and as a coach I didn't want to do that," Desautels said. "So whenever I want to get mad and yell at the referees, I put a lollipop in my mouth so I can't talk."

"She's not afraid to speak up," Nebiker said. "The second day of the season, she was warned by one of the refs, so one of the girls said, 'You need a Dum-Dum, Coach!' She's had a lollipop in her mouth every game since."

Overall, Nebiker is very pleased.

"Looking at it now, midway through the season, she's been a valuable asset," Nebiker said. "She has been very mature, especially for being only 21 years old. I'm glad it worked out."

Following a long and winding road riddled with many challenges, Desautels has found a way to stay involved and pass her knowledge and passion in the sport of soccer on to many others. Findlay is very happy to see things falling into place.

"She feels good about it," Findlay said. "She's getting across to them and having an impact, and if that's the case, she's accomplishing much more that she thought she would."

Field Hockey is back at .500

After a rough start in the Patriot League, the Women's field hockey team is back at .500 for the regular season and is optimistically looking towards the future. The Lady Bison's victory over Saint Francis gave them them 2-2 record in the Patriot League and 4-6 record overall.

On Wednesday, Oct. 2, 2002 Bucknell played at Saint Francis and easily defeated the Red Flash. Saint Francis scored first in the 10th minute, but the Bison retaliated with four consecutive goals.

The first Bison goal came on a penalty stroke from Amy Marvel '03. Kelly O'Brien '06 picked up the go-ahead tally and Kirsten Nilsen '06 scored a pair of second-half goals and to lift the Bucknell field hockey team to its first road victory of the season, 4-2

Nilsen tacked on two insurance goals in the second half for her first career multi-goal game. Rookies Nilsen, O'Brien and Carli Cataldo '06 have combined for 10 of Bucknell's 17 goals this season.

Boynton finished with two assists for Bucknell, while Marvel added an assist in the Bison victory. Goalie Sonja Wettergreen ' 03 finished with six saves as Bucknell outshot Saint Francis 18-9.

On Saturday Bucknell fell to Lafayette, 5-0. Lafayette is undefeated in the Patriot League, and their victory over the Bison makes it their eighth-straight win. The Bison were playing without their leading scorer, Meiko Boynton '05, who leads the team in the number of points, assists, goals, and game winning goals.

Bucknell returns to Patriot League play this Saturday when it hosts Lehigh at 1 p.m. at West Field.

Professional ballplayers have their five minutes of fame. At least that's what people like to say, as though there's some grand force of justice waiting in the corridors of obscurity, behind every "little guy," long shot and underdog out there, ready to bless everyone with one fleeting moment of glory for precisely five minutes before leaving him to fade into the annals of forgotten achievements.

This is really a ridiculous notion. Not only is it a sad truth that most baseball players never get within spitting distance of fame, let alone close enough to bask in the warmth of public adoration, it's also an entirely maintainable fact that, in baseball, there is no such thing as "five minutes of fame."

In this game, once a guy's got fame, he's got it forever. A timely hit or fantastic play—or a catastrophic error, for that matter—no matter how spontaneous or "fleeting" it is, will indubitably float around on the tongues of trivia buffs and history connoisseurs long after the limelight has burned out.

Heck, even if a guy's career bites the dust immediately thereafter, he'll live on as a historical entity for what can only be assumed to be an infinite number of years.

Such is the case with the three main instigators in a drama-packed World Series that took place 55 years ago this week. The 1947 World Series pitted the perennially dominant New York Yankees against Brooklyn's beloved Dodgers, the second of what would eventually become seven Yankee-Dodger intracity Series.

Prior to the Series, it wouldn't have been difficult to offer predictions about which players would emerge as heroes—the Yankees had a lineup that boasted such names as DiMaggio and Rizzuto, and the Dodgers' artillery wasn't to be scoffed at either, with guys like Pete Reiser and the barrier-smashing rookie Jackie Robinson. And while they'd all contribute something to the seven-game battle at some point, it was three other names that would be eternally associated with the spirit of 1947's World Series: Lavagetto, Bevens and Gionfreddo.

Cookie Lavagetto and Bill Bevens would be the protagonists in a heart wrenching game four, while little Gionfreddo would provide the drama in game six.

The Yankees had taken advantage of the home-field edge in the Bronx and jumped to a 2-1 lead in the Series, and looked to be heading towards their third victory on the back of an unlikely hero in Bevens. Bevens had been a paltry 7-13 during the regular season, and while the American League didn't really light him up, it didn't exactly find him perplexing either. On Oct. 3, 1947, however, he had the Dodgers line-up melting at the plate.

Bevens took what would have been the first World Series no-hitter into the ninth inning with a 2-1 lead, and before long he was one out away from doing something no man had done before. He was, in fact, just a couple pitches away from eternal fame. It just wasn't the fame he, or the Yankees, would have liked.

It was another unheralded player who would steal the moment, as pinch-hitter Lavagetto swatted a double into left field, scoring two. Goodbye no-hitter. Goodbye Yankees. For now.

The Bronx Bombers struck back in game five, regaining the Series lead. And while they fell behind 8-5 in the sixth inning of game six, Yankees fans could take some comfort as DiMaggio strode to the plate with two runners aboard and pelted a sure-fire home run towards the Yankees' bullpen. But again, it was a no-name character who barraged common sense and strode his way into history with one clasp of his leather glove. Gionfreddo had drifted onto the Dodgers team partway into the season, and had only batted .177 in 62 at-bats, but when he was plunked into left field on Oct. 6, he was as opportunistic as any player has ever been. He ripped DiMaggio's shot right out of it's majestic arch, ending the Yankees' drive and allowing the Dodgers to cruise on to victory.

Miracles can't happen every game, though, and the Yankees would go on to stomp the Dodgers 5-2 in game seven and win the second of their six World Series over the Brooklyn gang (it wasn't until 1955 that justice sided with Brooklyn altogether, allowing the lovable squad to triumph overall). In the long run, the three heroes of 1947 didn't get very far either.

Neither Lavagetto, Gionfreddo or Bevens ever played another game in the major leagues after that Series. So if there is a limit on fame in baseball, they used up every precious ounce they had in their respective moments of profundity.

Over the next few years, Gionfreddo's catch would be outshadowed by Mays' 1954 grab and Bevens' gem would be eclipsed by Don Larson unblemished nine innings in 1956, but it's impossible to completely overshadow the pure unpredictability of that 1947 Series. How timely of Bevens, Lavagetto and Gionfreddo to stumble upon their five minutes on so grand a stage.

It's really the kind of thing that makes baseball such a beautiful game. After all, where else can a guy's five minutes turn into 55 years?

Major League colonoscopies

By the time you read this article, much of the first round of baseball playoffs will have passed like a kidney stone from the prostate-swollen urethra of major-league baseball playoffs. Baseball playoffs rank a distant third in terms of painfully arduous postseasons, with the NBA's three month slug-crawl taking a definitive first. Watching the NBA playoffs is like trying to have an animated conversation with Jack Webb from "Dragnet."

But major-league baseball's playoff picture has only one real problem, the white-collar crime known to most as the "wild card." I consider the wild card a white-collar crime because it serves only one purpose: for corporate bigwigs with powdered wigs and monocles to make an extra mil on the sale of ballpark franks over the course of five extra games.

Of course, some would say why do we care, it's a few more games to entertain the public, what's the harm in that? Well the harm is that it destroys the excitement and intensity of pennant races. The perfect example of the malevolent effects of the wildcard system was in full effect this season as Oakland and Anaheim duked it out in a last-man-standing, barroom brawl in the last week of the season to guarantee themselves … home field advantage.

Prior to the creation of the wild card, they would be fighting to keep playing, but now, not so much. The thrill of a pennant race has vanished … replaced by a much flimsier "wild card" race, which I could only imagine was established in response to the growing disparity in the quality of teams or the dilution of players, one of the deleterious effects of overexpansion.

But like it or no, the wild card exists and it is on this that I must comment. Let's break down the matchups.

In the American League, we have the wild card Angels challenging the defending league champion New York Yankees. Notice, whenever announcers talk about the Yankees, they are the Yankees that have won four of the last six World Series. Forget liberal versus conservative media bias, let's talk about Yankee media bias. I haven't seen Yankee kissing this bad since Lee's surrender at the Appomattox Courthouse.

Regardless, after the Angels shed the meaty albatross of Mo Vaughn from their ship of state, they've managed to succeed beyond all expectations. They truly are a Disney movie in the making—of course this is the part of the story that will be edited before the final premiere … the part where the Yankees rip Anaheim apart, feather by feather until they lie on the field, bruised like a 4-week-old peach. Anaheim lacks experience, a starting rotation comparable to that of the Yankees and a prayer. And there's nothing Christopher Lloyd can do about it.

In the Oakland-Minnesota series, we can expect contraction to happen early as the Twins conjoin at the head and can't tell which elbow to lean out over the plate. They've got a great team, but like Anaheim, no depth at the starting rotation, no experience and no one seems to be able to hit lefties … let's get Karl Marx in here for some batting practice.

I sincerely consider not discussing the National League after its unfair treatment of the New York Mets. Could you believe that the crappy umpires could cause the outcome of so many games?! It's ridiculous. If not for faulty umpiring, the Mets would easily have set a National League record for wins. But noooo … they don't complain and look where they end up. But at least Mo Vaughn will win NL MVP.

The Boston Braves take on the wild card contending New York Giants. Barry Bonds can only be described as sensational this year, showing how you don't have to obliterate a home run record to show who wears the pants in this league. But Atlanta's pitching has been superb and Bonds is only one man … or two men, apparently. Bonds is definitely the type to refer to himself in the third person, begging the question, is he referring to himself or some stunt double that he uses for all his action sequences—every time he hits a homerun, he pats the guy on the back and tells him to give the crowd a wave as he runs the bases. "Barry Bonds don't like that call," "Barry Bonds likes hitting home runs" or "Barry Bonds likes his grapes peeled." It's probably going to be a battle, but in the end, the Braves will head to the World Series for yet another postseason defeat that no one in Atlanta really cares about anyway.

Atlanta really is the perfect foil for the Yankees. Like Richelieu and Louis XIII, Space Ghost and Zorak or George Bush and a dictionary, George Steinbrenner has Ted Turner. Steinbrenner probably has Turner's portrait hung over his wall as a reminder of what he must never become. Turner and his Atlanta Braves are living proof that success without rings is not exciting. Atlanta has won 10 division titles in a row but only one ring in that stretch. Where's the enthusiastic support for them? Out tailgating because the flames licking up the side of a Dodge Stratus are more exciting than anything going on in the stadium.

The final bout pits the Cardinals against the defending World Series champion Arizona Diamondbacks. There are few pitching duos as awe-inspiring to watch as Johnson and Schilling. Not since Charlie Sheen starred in "Major League" have I felt so emasculated simply watching a pitcher walk out to the mound.

But the champs are hurting and the Cards have one of the strongest lineups in postseason and you have to respect a team that can recover after the death of such a valued teammate. Sadly, that death will cost them in the long run with a starting rotation stretched thinner than the lining of Ted Kennedy's liver.

All-Skate!!! Just as the New York Yankees look for their unprecedented 32-straight World Series rings and the Super Bowl favorite turned playoff beggar St. Louis Rams look to notch a "W" in the win column, another sport hopes to capture the American heart. Hockey is back on Oct. 9, and you have front-row seats to the media guide for the 2003 Season! If you're like my brother, you read all the details and every stat a locked up unemployed statistician could conjure up. Since I know some of you just breeze through the "pictures," I'll try my best to inform you on what you missed:

Step 1—take a Russian speaking course! No, I'm serious. If you are going to get a firm grasp on present-day hockey, your daily diet must consist of Russian pronunciation lessons. Maxim Kuznetsov, Pavel Datsyuk and Manny Malhotra are but a few of the casual names thrown out by hockey announcers and analysts alike. Where the East meets West once again, this time instead of Germany as the point of battle, hockey players from all over the globe mix sides and face off in American hockey arenas for a truly global event.

Let's begin our journey in the Motor City of Detroit and find out how the octopus-throwing juggernauts are fairing. Question: How good can a team be when it loses its coach, goalie and key offensive threat? Answer: Stanley Good. Scotty Bowman, finally called it quits as skipper of the Red Wings after capturing Lord Stanley's Cup. Bowman, a player's coach, brought the best out in his players and harped on the fundamentals of hockey to lead the Red Wings to last year's championship. Dominik "I look like a fish out of water on hot summer's day" Hasek, former goalie of last year's Red Wings, signed a one-year contract to win it all and succeed. Now he is satisfied and out of the NHL. The last of the stars to move on comes in the way of injured center Steve Yzerman. Yzerman, who injured his knee in the off-season, is not expected to return to action until the All-Star break. So are the Wings ready for another run at the Cup or is this what my friends like to call another example of "The Decker Effect" of big buildup with little to no results?

My favorite team you ask? Why the Dallas Stars of course! Actually, I go all the way back to the Minnesota North Stars before they moved to Dallas and Neal Broten days. Probably the most retooled team from the off-season, the Stars look to regain their premier standing in the West. Free agent additions Bill Guerin, Scott Young and Ulf Dahlen should all plug in seamlessly under player-friendly first-year coach Dave Tippett. In goal, Ed Belfour's five-year reign is over and it is time to see if career backup Marty Turco is up to the challenge of performing as a No. 1 goaltender. The Stars also added veteran goalie Ron Tugnutt to provide insurance in case Turco isn't getting the job done.

Closer to home, the Pittsburgh Penguins look to improve to the next level, but once again the outlook is not positive. A couple weeks back a few friends and I traveled to Wilkes-Barre, Pa., to watch a preseason matchup between the New Jersey Devils and the Penguins. Once we settled into our $18 seats—turned $50 glass seats due to confusion—we noticed that the Penguins once again had the toughness that was symbolic of the glory years. Good thing we snapped our group picture quickly since the Penguins were boarding the Devils, taking out a frustration not felt in years.

Goalie Dominik Hasek, now retired, proudly displays the Stanley Cup.

After missing the playoffs for the first time since 1990, the Penguins are hungrier than ever, but losing Robert Lang to Washington and the constant non-hockey related injuries keep them from achieving that goal. The Penguins were not active in the free agent bonanza due to financial concerns, so we will see whether youthful vigor can beat proven, skilled players. The future might be the No. 18 overall pick in 2000 NHL Entry Draft Brooks Orpik. Mario Lemieux has expressed interest in once again having the dual role of front office and hockey player, but in all honesty, unless Lemieux finds help from Clark Kent, G.I. Joe and Wayne Gretzky, this will be a rather sub par season for Pens fans.

So I was chatting with a Colorado Avalanche fan this afternoon and after we ironed out the pronunciation of Patrick Roy, pronounced "Wua," not "Roy" as in Roy Rogers, she explained how the Avalanche seemed poised for another terrific season. (Sure hometown favorites!) I tend to agree with her for a couple reasons. First, General Manager Pierre Lacroix dealt for defensive intimidator Darius Kasparatis to add to a stellar back line. Returning are Peter Forsberg and a talented crew, which should once again translate into a winning season.

Pittsburgh (1-2) at New Orleans (3-1)
The Saints have come out hot this year, though last week they lost to the then-winless Lions. The Saints have strong offensive weapons, yet they are 4th in the AFC in turnovers committed. New Orleans will have to rely on the arm of Brooks to win this one because the Steelers rushing defense is still as potent as ever. It's their pass defense that is horrendous. Who would've thought there would be a QB controversy in Pittsburgh? I'm a Stewart supporter all the way, but still this week I'd like to see what XFL MVP Tommy Maddox can do. No matter who takes the snaps under center, the Steelers main concern should be the ineffectiveness of "the Bus" this season. The Steelers are going to start a winning streak, and the Saints a losing streak, this week.

New England (3-1) at Miami (3-1)
This is a matchup for supremacy in the AFC East. Both teams are coming their first losses of the season last week due to multiple turnovers. The Dolphins were annihilated last week through the air as they gave up five passing TDs, which doesn't bode well considering they are facing Brady, who is second in the league in total passing yards. While the Patriots were beaten last week on the ground by Tomlinson, the NFL's leading rusher, this week they will be facing Ricky Williams, the NFL's second leading rusher. Ultimately, whichever team addresses its apparent defensive problems from last week will win. As much as it pains me, I'm picking the defending champs.

San Diego (4-0) at Denver (3-1)
San Diego can pull away in the AFC West with the Raiders, if they win. The Chargers are 4-0 for the first time since their 1994 Super Bowl season, and they don't show any signs of slowing down. The Broncos better come to play this week and don't lose the game like they did on Monday night. Both offenses are potent, so this game will be decided by the matchup of the two best defenses in the AFC. This is a tough one, but my gut feeling is pushing me to go with the Chargers.

St. Louis (0-4) at San Francisco (3-1)
The Rams better find some answers, and quickly, for only one 0-4 team has ever made the playoffs. Faulk has had a dismal start, averaging only 47 rushing yards a game. With Warner out for the next few weeks with a broken finger, the Rams look as if desperation may be setting in soon. After averaging 31 points last season, they are averaging only 15 so far. That is great news for the Niners, whose offense hasn't seemed to click yet either. (The Rams have more passing yards than the 49ers have total yards.) This game will be decided by the Niners defense, which ranks in the top 5 in the NFC in total defense and turnover margin, while the Rams have the second worst turnover margin in the league. Rams remain winless.

Green Bay (3-1) at Chicago (2-2)
The Bears need to win this game to prevent falling back early to their divisional rival Green Bay. Chicago is currently on a two-game losing streak, after winning their first two due to a defensive slump that is most apparent in the secondary. Their defense has got to step up against Favre, who is second in the NFC's in passing yards. And the man to lead them is Rosevelt Colvin, who is the current NFL sack leader. The Pack win.

Womens soccer falls 0-2

By Dave Cohen
Senior Writer

The Bucknell women's soccer team dropped its second consecutive Patriot League game on Sept. 29 to the Lafayette Leopards, 2-0. The Bison, still without a league victory after a torrid non-league start to the season, have not scored a goal since their 1-0 victory over Long Island at the Marist Tournament on Sept. 15.

Lafayette struck in the 24th minute of the first half with a goal by Emily Mayers, and the Leopards proceeded to take a 1-0 lead into the locker room at halftime. Lafayette then put the game away with an additional goal in the 69th minute of the game. Laurie Purse '03 went the complete 90 minutes of the game and saved 11 shots on goal.

Despite another offensive scoring drought, the Orange and Blue actually outshot Lafayette 23 to 15. The team just could not find the net. Tara Utchel '03 had four shot attempts on the afternoon, while Lauren Schwartz '03 and Meghann Chipko '05 had three each.

Chipko believes that the team is perhaps overanalyzing what it needs to do to win, rather than just playing loose.

"After the game it was pretty disappointing to lose again," Chipko said. "After the game we couldn't figure out why we're losing. We feel like we're working hard but we're not winning. We have many capable players of scoring, but nobody has really stepped up in the past few games. We are overanalyzing things. Maybe we need to just go out there, act on instinct and have fun."

Tyler Kidder— The Bucknellian

The Bison have not scored since their 1-0 victory over Long Island at the Marist Tournament on Sept. 15.

Ashley Dincher '05 feels the same frustration. She knows that defending a league championship is no easy task, even though the team this year is comparable to last year's and there should be no reason why it cannot defend its title.

"It's a sensitive time right now. We have had huge expectations this year. Last season we were the underdogs. This year we have realized that every game is going to be a battle," Dincher said. "Everyone is out to get us because we are the defending champs. The way things are going right now is definitely a surprise, but we are still the same team and there is a very good chance that we can make it into the tournament. We need to just go out and play."

Melissa Lawson '03 is confident that strong team chemistry will help the team pull through eventually.

"We are going through a tough time right now. We started off last season in a similar fashion. But because of the team chemistry that we have, I am not too worried. We have lost two of our leading scorers from last year. We have a lot of shooters on our team, but we do not have finishers," Lawson said. "It is not something that is going to come overnight. Honestly, the biggest thing that we have going for us right now is our chemistry. We are not playing bad soccer. We have actually dominated most of the games. We are just not putting the ball in the net."

Lawson is working on what she can do individually to produce better results.

"Personally, I can look to be more of an offensive threat," Lawson said. "I am a conservative defender and I should definitely look to go forward more often and be a threat."

Bucknell's record fell to 5-4, 0-2 following the defeat.

sprain that occurred while defending a shot in practice over a week ago. Tim Faneck '06 has come off the bench to fill the stopper position.

"This was Tim's second start in place of an injured Alex Far. He did a very solid job on defense and also made very good decisions on when to come forward," Nash said.

"Having Far get injured last week was a big loss. But he's been helping me all season in the back getting adjusted to our style and system," Faneck said. "I just tried to play my game, get the ball up the field to the midfielders and forwards, and win every head ball possible. Having support from your entire team helps out a lot and that's been the key to our success this year."

The Bison improve their record to 8-1-1, as they approach the second Patriot League match of the season. Bucknell will travel to American University on Sunday for a 1 p.m. kickoff.

Mud makes for interesting meet

By Evan Honeyfield
Writer

The men's and women's cross country teams took their first real test of the season by traveling to North Carolina to duke it out with some of the top-rated schools in the nation at the Great American Cross Country Festival this past weekend. Heavy rain turned the course into a mud pit with ruts nearly half a foot deep. The men struggled through the mud to an 11th place finish in the seeded race while the women finished 3rd in the unseeded race.

Bucknell's most consistent top runners, Greg Costello '03 and Bryan Johnston '03, led the Bison men finishing the 8k in 27 minutes 1 second for 16th place and 27:18 for 31st. Nick Mousetis '04, Eric Furst '03 and Stephen Schaefer '04 rounded out the scoring. Costello initially enjoyed the conditions, but soon found them difficult to handle.

"After running in the mud, I realized how much harder it was to get moving," he said. "It made the race a lot slower."

Even though the Bison men finished below expectations, the meet wasn't a complete waste, Head Coach Kevin Donner said.

"As a team, I was disappointed with our overall 11th-place finish," Donner said. "Greg and Bryan ran very well and proved to me that they are national-caliber runners. However, it takes five people to place high in these types of meets and we did not have that. Our guys are very persistent and I do expect us to bounce back off this meet and prove that we are a national-caliber type of team."

"Greg and Brian ran very well and proved to me that they are national-caliber runners."

—Kevin Donner, head coach

Bucknell's inconsistency at the three through five spots appears to be the only thing holding them back. A strong day could have easily pushed the men up to 7th or 8th place.

"We now need to work on packing up in races and try to close the gap between our second runner, Bryan Johnston, and the rest of the team," Costello said. "If we do this, we are a team to watch out for."

Heath issues and injuries sidelined a number of the women's top harriers. Since the lady Bison lost four of five scorers from last season, the loss of two key individuals in a rebuilding year was definitely noticed.

Theresa Dennis '03, the top returning runner from last year, finished in 20:20 to take 7th. The first-year foursome of Alison Cole, Jamie Gow, Julie Jakoboski and Rachel Tutmaher completed the scoring for the Bison.

In other weekend cross country action, the men's junior varsity team gave Messiah a beating to remember, taking five of the top eight places. Juniors Sean McCarthy and Kevin Walsh led the effort with a one-two finish.

The junior varsity women narrowly lost to Messiah on a course that also saw significant deterioration from the hurricane-like rain.

The Bison's next challenge will be on Saturday as they play host to the Gulden Invitation. Central Michigan leads the list of eight teams and looks to be a good challenge. Fans are encouraged to support the Bison on the Mods Fields.

Sanchez's poetry delights audience

By Meghan Ball
Writer

A petite woman walked up to the podium. The red handkerchief that covered her gray-black dreadlocks barely peeped over the tall wooden box. Yet from this small, older woman came a voice so strong and harmonious that the entire audience fell into a dreamlike state listening to her rolling words. More than the beautifully crafted words that she spoke, it was the way in which they tumbled across the hall that captivated the audience. Her poetry morphed into a song as she read poems about freedom, love, family and the future of this world to a Bucknell Hall audience last Friday night.

Civil rights activist, professor, author, women's rights advocate, mother, international lecturer, peace proclaimer and poet, Sonia Sanchez has wasted little of her time here on earth. As an African-American female born in 1934 in Birmingham, Ala., Sanchez has seen a lot of change during her lifetime. She earned a bachelor of arts degree in political science from Hunter College in Harlem, N.Y., in 1955. She then pursued postgraduate work at New York University, where she also studied poetry with Louise Bogan.

Sanchez has been active in many campaigns over the decades, fighting for equality and peace among all people. Her campaigns have resulted in visits from both the FBI and the Black Panthers, but she never gave up the fight. Her poetry has received much acclaim, including the Peace and Freedom Award from the Women's International League for Peace and Freedom, the Langston Hughes Poetry Award, the Pennsylvania Governor's Award for Excellence in Humanities and a National Endowment for the Arts award. She has lectured in over 10 different nations and has published more than 16 books.

"I have read Sanchez's work previously but not heard it read," Professor of Art and Art History Mary Brantl said. "Listening to the modulations in her voice, the turns and twists of sound and morph and meaning, I was caught up in both the pictures painted—how they speak to experience and present, age and promise—but equally in her means—voice and word—part music, part brushwork. A poignant reminder of the power and the too often forgotten relevance of the poet and the crafted word."

After her reading, many lingered in the hall, buying Sanchez's works and waiting for a chance to speak with the poet. People waiting in line to offer praises and obtain an autograph within their book were proof of how well the audience received the presentation. In addition to those in line, more lingered among the pews, waiting for the numbers to dwindle. Above the murmurs of those waiting their turn, Sanchez's voice could be heard, as melodic and clear as it was when she was reading, greeting and encouraging her "brothers and sisters."

Listeners were eager to offer their praises of Sanchez's reading.

"The way her poetry read, it sounded more like prose," Mike Mellas '05 said. "It was so lifelike."

"I especially liked it when Sanchez broke free from speaking and began to sing her words because it gave more feeling and emotion to the poetry and made it more personal and unique," Rachel Charow '06 said. "I also love listening to music so I could relate and connect to her poetry more."

Sanchez is a poet-in-residence at the University. Staying in Lewisburg for the semester, she teaches an advanced poetry workshop and can be seen wandering around campus. In addition to her one class, the poet-in-residence is asked to give two poetry readings and visit several area high school English classes. This was the first of Sanchez's two readings, the next being on Nov. 17. Her works can be found in the library and the Bookstore.

Orchestra concert well-attended

The Philharmonia Virtuosi perform four distinctive works

By David Allen
Writer

The Weis Center for the Performing Arts hosted a concert Saturday night by Philharmonia Virtuosi, a highly-skilled and well-respected chamber orchestra based at Purchase College in Westchester County, N.Y. Under the direction of conductor Richard Kapp, the group performed four distinctive works. Kapp prefaced each piece with a short description of its history, high points and featured musicians.

The first piece the Virtuosi performed was "The Schoolmaster," symphony No. 55 by Franz Joseph Haydn. Kapp said that, although the piece was not visually descriptive, elements of a schoolteacher tapping his pointer and delivering his lecture could be detected if concertgoers knew what to listen for. He praised Haydn's compositional skills and his ability to make a simple melody so effective. He also said that the melody of the symphony's second Adagio movement "would almost be stupid if it weren't brilliant." The orchestra gave an inspired performance of the piece, playing with energy in both fast and slow sections. Principal cellist Dorothy Lawson played a solo during the Trio of the third movement, and the piece closed with a fast-paced Presto movement.

The second piece had an interesting story behind it. Listed in the program as a work by Wolfgang Amadeus Mozart, the "Adelaide" violin concerto in D major, K. 294a has an interesting and controversial history. Discovered in 1935 in Paris and billed as being composed by Mozart at age eight on his way to London, the piece received intense scrutiny, but found a receptive audience in a performance by Yehudi Menuhin, a well-known violinist. The piece was revealed to be a fraud 25 years later, when a noted French musician, Marius Casadesus, confessed on his deathbed that he had written it and passed it off as Mozart's work.

Kapp inquired before beginning the piece whether members of the audience would enjoy the piece more or less if they thought it was by Mozart. Regardless of who composed the piece, violin soloist Mela Tenenbaum delivered a remarkable performance. She executed complicated passages with tremendous skill and played melody lines with style and beautiful tone.

At the concert's end, Peter Van '03 said that he not only enjoyed the presentation of the "Adelaide" Concerto, but also that he thought it was "real Mozart."

"I don't think it mattered [if Mozart composed it], it was still a great performance." Safiya Abouzaid '04 said.

The orchestra began the second half of its concert with "Valse Triste," Op. 44 by the Finnish composer Jean Sibelius. Kapp's comments before this piece were more brief than those he made previously, but he encouraged the audience to take note of the piece's shifting tonality and strange, almost fluid, structure.

"[The piece] is just slightly twisted, and it's wonderful," Kapp said.

The piece indeed seemed irregular, with constant fluctuations in tone, tempo and volume. The dynamics rose and fell quickly, and the chord changes followed very strange progressions. The "Valse Triste" was performed by a small wind section of two oboes and two French horns, with very little force in many passages and dynamics that rarely rose beyond a forte level. The piece came to an unceremonious end, and though the Virtuosi had given a subtle and effective performance, the audience was left not quite knowing what it had heard.

The program closed with an obscure and very eccentric piece: "Sinfonietta," by the Spanish composer Ernesto Halffter. The work is very seldom heard in performance; Kapp estimated that it had not been performed in 30 years. Though it is not widely known, "Sinfonietta" is a rare example of a piece evoking scenes of Spain that is actually by a Spanish composer.

Kapp cited Georges Bizet's opera "Carmen" as a piece often thought of as being "Spanish music," despite the fact that Bizet was French. He also noted the work's length, saying that, "if Halffter had been 30 years older [when he wrote the piece, it] would have been 20 minutes shorter."

The piece featured a full wind section, including trumpet and trombone, and three percussionists. Throughout the piece, the string players exhibited a very aggressive playing style, bowing with short, quick strokes and sometimes even hitting the strings of their instruments with their bows. These short, accented attacks were often layered against smooth legato passages in a creative and diverting use of counterpoint. The brass players frequently interjected muted notes, but closed the Adagio movement with a broad flourish.

The first, third and fourth movements displayed crisp, accented playing with clashing harmonies giving way to seemingly disjointed rhythms and attacks. The second movement was the most traditional, with an opening trio of violin, oboe and cello and the gradual addition of flute and French horn. The entire piece veered between standard orchestral playing and very unconventional techniques.

After the concert, Dhaval Petel said that, although he enjoyed what he viewed as "influence from the big-band era ... with very deep bass" in the Halffter piece, he thought, "it was way too long."

The concert had every appearance of a success; it was both well-attended and well-received. The musicians performed at a consistently excellent level, more than living up to the group's title of Virtuosi. Kapp served as both a charismatic emcee and an impressive and dynamic conductor. The program was diverse and inventively constructed, with the second half's more modern and irregular pieces serving as a perfect counter to the first half's traditional works.

Cute movie a smash hit

"Sweet Home Alabama" grossed $37.5 million last weekend

By Stephanie Nickse
Senior Writer

"Sweet Home Alabama" is indeed a sweet movie! It was also a huge hit last weekend when it finally came to the big screen. The box office raked in $37.5 million, which comes to the greatest dollar total of September opening movies ever, according to MSN Entertainment News.

With romantic innuendos featured in its previews, this "girly movie" definitely lived up to expectations.

Movie Review

"It was a bit of a chick flick, but it was fun to watch and I'd see it again," Kathy Morgan '03 said.

Reese Witherspoon stars as Alabama belle Melanie Carmichael. She appears focused on her career in New York while dating the handsome and prominent politician Andrew Hemmings (Patrick Dempsey). Carmichael loses her composure when Hemmings proposes and she has to return home to Greenville, Ala., to inform her family and friends. She must face her past ... and her marriage.

Josh Lucas plays Jake Perry, the husband she left behind when she relocated to New York. Nothing was finalized when she left, and this adorable, dimple-faced man shows no signs that he will give Carmichael a divorce.

Confrontation and passions build up as Carmichael finds herself in the sticky situation of keeping her fiance and city friends from finding out about her family and humble roots.

Carmichael is forced to choose between two men, and two very different lives. Dempsey's performance makes the decision a tough one. Hemmings not only shows genuine admiration and care for Witherspoon, but he forgives her lies and understands that her past is important to any future they might have.

Jessica Sherry '05 makes firefighting as easy as pie

By Leah Cunningham
Staff Writer

Behind the scenes at the football games, taking injured athletes' blood pressures, ready to throw on her gear for a downtown Lewisburg fire and performing as a full-time student, Emergency Medical Technician [EMT] and firefighter, it's hard to find a moment when 19-year-old Jessica Sherry '05 isn't on call.

"Jess is very dedicated to helping those in need in the Bucknell and Lewisburg communities. Most Bucknell students don't know many people in Lewisburg outside of the Bucknell 'bubble,'" said Barbara Black, University alumna and physician assistant in pediatrics at Geisinger Medical Center. "As a member of the William Cameron Engine Company, Jess has been able to see and learn much more about the Lewisburg community than the typical Bucknell student. Jess cares a lot about people—Bucknellians and 'townies' alike."

As an active member and Chief of Operations for the campus' Student Emergency Response Volunteers (SERV), Sherry is responsible for supervising all personnel at emergencies and stand-bys.

In addition to training all of SERV's new members, Sherry is also in charge of the recruitment and orientation for SERV. When not responding to EMT calls, she is volunteering as a qualified firefighter for the local fire department William Cameron Engine Company.

"Joining SERV was just the next logical step for me. I was thrilled when I applied to Bucknell and found that they had a campus EMS group and a volunteer station in town. Helping others is a very important part of my life and always has been," Sherry said. "Being an EMT and firefighter has just allowed me to extend that even further."

Mike Purcell, adviser to the SERV group, explains that the main objective of SERV is to have quick response in any type of medical emergency on campus, any time of the day or night. All SERV members that respond are qualified EMTs for Pennsylvania, as well as other states.

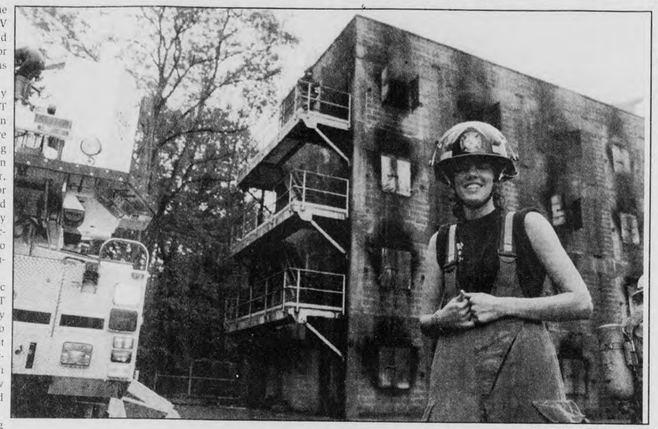
Sherry initially became a certified EMT at age 16 in Union Township, N.J., where she grew up. Valuing her experiences as an EMT and firefighter, Sherry is responsible for coming to the aid and rescue of not only University students, faculty and staff, but also her hometown community and Lewisburg.

"It's sort of ironic that I became an EMT before I could drive. My mom had to drive me to calls," Sherry said. "But no matter what, my parents have always been very supportive. I know they are proud and admire me."

Humbly describing only a few of her feats in coming to the rescue of others, Sherry said that she reacts on impulse and many of her experiences become a blur. She has performed what many believe is impossible. Sherry has brought a 16-year-old, post-drowning victim back to life by administering CPR, has revived a 7-year-old boy, bravely put out many fires and even helped deliver her former high school teacher's breached baby on July 4, 2000.

Recalling her most dramatic call last year, Sherry said a double fatal accident off campus just blurs together, but just being there to help others was an indescribable feeling.

"I act on instinct ... I'm an inherently calm person. I've found as long as you take a minute when you get on an emergency scene and figure out exactly what's going on and what you need to do, everything runs smoothly. Being confident in your skills and training also helps you to remain calm," Sherry said.



Eric Graham—The Bucknellian

Sherry balances her time as a full time student, an EMT and a firefighter. Sherry is an active member and chief of operations for the campus's Student Emergency Response Volunteers (SERV). Sherry first became a certified EMT at the age of 16.

In one of her more recent experiences as a firefighter, Sherry found herself reacting to a call for the campus house on 6th Street a week ago.

"When we got the call, we first went to the station to get on our gear and apparatus. We were the first attack team. My crew and I were pulling a line [hose] into the basement to finally knock down the fire in the wall," Sherry said.

Sherry's contributions and level of commitment follows her wherever she goes.

"Prior to Jess' freshman year, SERV was a failing organization in terms of membership, leadership and activity. Jess has been instrumental in the revitalization of the group. At Bucknell she recognized the potential of the SERV organization and its members' ability to provide services to the Bucknell community," Black said.

Even throughout Sherry's countless hours spent on call and volunteering, this EMT and firefighter squeezes in time to focus on her current secondary education, biology major and English minor, work in Admissions as a tour guide and with Volunteers in Service to Admissions, as a host and soon as a University representative at her hometown high schools. She also organizes substance-free programming with her residents in Harris as a CHOICE [Choosing Healthy Options in a Community Environment] fellow.

"When I'm not being a firefighter/EMT, I spend time doing lots of other little things. I love to be outside swimming, skiing, hiking or doing anything to keep me busy," Sherry said.

Sherry's good friend and former hall mate, Gwen Foult '05, said that Sherry is a committed and all-around great person.

"Jess is one of the most dedicated people I have ever known. She can manage time so well between the two worlds as a college student and SERV volunteer," Foult said.

"The dedication that Jess has does not stop at just the SERV group. She is always willing to go that extra mile in the fire station as well as working in the Admissions Office giving families of prospectives campus tours. Jess does not have just one strong point," Purcell said. "There are multiple points of interest with her. She is a very well-liked person in the peer group that she is around and always makes people feel welcome."

Sherry plans to continue working on SERV and volunteering as an EMT and firefighter. She is highly regarded as a hard worker, positive role model and even an excellent cookie chef.

"Jess is well-known in the fire department for her cookie-baking skills," Black said. "After returning to the station from every fire rescue call, Jess immediately runs to the kitchen to make a fresh batch of cookies for the tired firefighters."

In addition to taking continuing education classes to maintain her certification, Sherry trained 120 hours to be certified as EMT, 88 hours for firefighter certification and spent over 300 hours in class and training since her first year of college. Black can see Sherry being a diplomat for the United Nations and traveling to other countries to help when disasters hit an area; Sherry has other ideas.

"My great debate has been to teach or go to medical school," Sherry said. "But I know either way I'll be working with people. Even when I'm volunteering, it's that hands-on difference I can make that keeps me coming back over and over."

> "It's sort of ironic that I became an EMT before I could drive. My mom had to drive me to calls. But no matter what, my parents have always been very supportive. I know they are proud and admire me."
> —Jessica Sherry '05

Whether Sherry is investing her energy in saving lives, giving student tours, putting out fires or simply baking cookies, her underlying motive will always be in the attempt to help others.

Annual Lewisburg House Tour on Saturday

The annual Lewisburg House Tour, "Under the Three Ball Lights," will be Saturday, Oct. 5. The architectural walk will leave from the Packwood House lobby beginning at 10 a.m. Tours will leave on every hour; the last tour departing at 3 p.m. The tour will include homes from the 19th and 20th centuries, as well as the Himmelreich Library.

Tickets are $10 and can be purchased at Brushstrokes, Dogwood Hill, Gingerbread House, Pennsylvania Mercantile and the Wardrobe, as well as at Parents Weekend registration. On Saturday, tickets will also be available starting at 9:30 a.m. at Union County Courthouse, in front of the Lewisburg Hotel and in the Packwood House lobby.

Investigation into the dangers of antibiotic overuse

By Nate Ivanick
Senior Writer

One of the most serious problems facing the medical world today is antibiotic resistant bacteria. The problem has only recently gained worldwide attention. Despite doctors' best efforts, it is a battle the medical world is losing badly.

In 1996, the World Health Organization (WHO) said, "Too few new drugs are being developed to replace those that have lost their effectiveness. In the race for supremacy, microbes are sprinting ahead."

Tuberculosis, long thought to be a disease of the past, is now rampant in American prisons and inner city slums. To understand the significance of this problem, you must first understand the history of antibiotics and a bit of the science behind antibiotic resistant bacteria.

In 1928, Alexander Fleming changed the course of modern medicine with his discovery of the first antibiotic—penicillin. Fleming accidentally discovered this when he noticed the bacteria would not grow on some of his moldy old bacteria plates. The use of penicillin grew dramatically until it was considered the "wonder drug" of the 1950s, capable of curing anything from a runny nose to aches and pains. Even when scientists began to warn of the potential dangers of penicillin's overuse and proved its inability to fight viruses, such as the common cold, people continued to waste this precious resource.

In the decades following this overuse, doctors began noticing profound changes in the effectiveness of penicillin. Bacterial infections that should have been eliminated by penicillin were no longer affected by it. The world had experienced the first antibiotic resistant bacteria.

Instead of studying how to counteract this problem through different practices, scientists worked to develop more antibiotics. Since then, the story has not changed. Scientists and pharmaceutical companies continue to develop new antibiotics that, within a few years, will be obsolete because bacteria will have gained a resistance to them. Pharmaceutical companies are no longer willing to manufacture antibiotics due to the lack of returns and the expense of developing drugs that will be useless in several years anyway. For those of you who don't believe in evolution, look again, it's staring you in the face.

Today, the overuse and misuse of antibiotics continues despite knowledge of the dangers. Much of the American meat and dairy industries treat their animals with continual low doses of antibiotics—possibly the most harmful practice for building antimicrobial resistance. People repeatedly ask their doctors for antibiotics for aches and pains and for colds and mere viral infections. To make matters worse, many people do not take the entire regimen of antibiotics prescribed, serving to speed along antimicrobial resistance. The question for many people is how bacteria manage to evolve so quickly as to develop such resistance.

Picture this scenario as presented by University of Texas Professor of Biological Sciences Julie Palmer: bacterium can replicate itself into a perfect clone by splitting in half once every 20 minutes. After 40 minutes, one bacteria can have created four bacteria and in one hour, 16 bacteria. This ability for exponential growth means that in eight hours, 16 million bacteria have arisen from that one bacterium. Now picture an antibiotic attacking these bacteria. In the beginning, and almost every time an antibiotic is used, each bacterium is destroyed. Eventually, the antibiotic will encounter a population of bacteria in which one single bacterium, by a freak mutation, is resistant to the antibiotic. By eliminating every bacterium except the one with the mutation, that bacteria will replicate, and in eight hours, it will have created 16 million antibiotic resistant progeny.

To make matters worse, bacteria can transmit the gene for resistance to other bacteria through sexual reproduction with their F plasmid. With such rapid reproduction and ability to transmit their genes, it is no wonder that bacteria have rapidly become resistant to everything we can throw at them. This includes Vancamycin, which was for a long time viewed as our secret weapon against bacterial infection, but is now ineffective against some types of bacteria.

Hope in the fight against antibiotic resistant bacteria may be coming from another enemy of the human race—the virus. While it might seem counterintuitive to treat people who are already ill with viruses, it is important to realize that different viruses infect different organisms. Some viruses, called bacteriophages, infect bacteria only. In principle, bacteriophages have the potential to be as significant in fighting disease as penicillin was in the 1940s and 50s. First, bacteriophages can be administered to humans and livestock without danger, and only the risk of very small side effects.

likely

Also since viruses can replicate even faster than bacteria, it is that if such methods were employed responsibly, bacteria would have a difficult time gaining resistance. Finally, the prepared virus could be made relatively cheaply and its genome could be changed if antibiotic resistance evolved. Such viruses could be easily shipped and stored, enabling transport and use in developing countries. Such bacteriophage antibiotics are still in the developmental stages in United States. Are these the future of antibiotics?

People disagree as to what role bacteriophages will play in the future of antibiotics. Omar Zalatimo '03, a biochemistry major who has done some research on the subject, believes bacteriophages can be effectively used.

"For the past 50 years, Russia and the Republic of Georgia have used bacteriophages in the same way that people have used antibiotics in the West," Zalatimo said.

In addition, since the bacteriophages used in the former U.S.S.R. come from naturally occurring populations they incur two benefits. First, such drugs are extremely cheap, costing a fraction of U.S. antibiotics. Second, because the viruses occur in naturally occurring populations, they have evolved together with the bacteria, so the bacteria are not resistant to them. Zalatimo also explained that bacteriophages may soon be used to treat people infected with staphylococcus and enterococcus, both of which are resistant to Vancomycin.

Others are more hesitant in their support of bacteriophages. Assistant Professor of Biology Marie Pizzorno outlined some of the problems with the bacteriophages.

"First, the bacteriophages would have to be tailored to target specific pathenogenic [disease causing] bacteria. Next, such viruses would have to be injected into the blood stream because they would be unable to enter the blood by ingestion. Such an injection could cause an immune response, although it would probably be minor," Pizzorno said.

Pizzorno predicted that the use of bacteriophages as antibiotics might have more use for sterilization purposes in hospitals and on surgical equipment.

"While the immediate effects of bacteriophages would be beneficial, I worry about the long-term problems that may arise from the killing of helpful bacteria [such as the bacteria in the large intestine that help us absorb key nutrients] and the possibility of further microbial resistance," said Jeff Cesario '03, a cell biology major.

Whatever the future of antibiotics is, it is clear that with any new advancement must come a profound change in our use of drugs. First, we must change the misuse and overuse of antibiotics by many Americans, including many people on this campus. Do not take antibiotics for a runny nose, it won't help you; it will hurt you. When prescribed antibiotics, you should take the entire prescription, not just part. Next, it is imperative that we practice prevention methods in our hospitals to avoid the spread of such bacteria. Finally, we should avoid the use of products like antibacterial soaps that are equally harmful to the spread of resistant bacteria.

Applying knowledge at Fair

University takes students to Bloomsburg Fair for a hands-on learning experience

By Rachel Gold
Senior Writer

This year many students made their way to the oldest fair in Pennsylvania, the Bloomsburg Fair. Besides the fact that there is enough fried food to fatten up an entire village—pumpkin waffles, Kohr's ice cream, rice pudding, apple dumplings with cinnamon ice cream, bloomin' onions and even deep fried Oreo cookies—the fair has a lot to offer its visitors. Students learned about agriculture and horticulture while enjoying the industrial exhibition buildings, arts and crafts, games, rides and entertainment.

This past Saturday C.A.L.V.I.N. & H.O.B.B.E.S., the substance-free activities group on campus, organized a trip to the fair. Free transportation was offered with only a $4 admission fee. Lina Nandy '04, the publicity chair for C.A.L.V.I.N. & H.O.B.B.E.S., thought the fair was fantastic.

"We had 30 students or so come along, and I think everyone had a really good time," Nandy said.

Having never been to the United States before arriving at the University, Lina had never attended a fair before and did not know what to expect.

"I had no idea the fair was going to be so enormous! It amazed me to see the variety of things they were selling. I've never eaten so much fried food in my life," Nandy said.

Nandy felt that she learned a lot about the culture of central Pennsylvania after attending the Bloomsburg Fair.

"Granted, we did walk around and look at all the cute puppies, lambs, sheep and horses, but as an international student I found the atmosphere and crazy booths that sold things like fried Oreos so fascinating," Nandy said. "There was lots of stuff I'd never even heard of, much less ate! I think I gained about 60 kilos on Saturday from all the fried foods."

Professor of Geography Ben Marsh took his Food and the Environment class to the Bloomsburg Fair last week for its lab.

"I'd never done it before, but I wanted students to get the sense that agriculture is an integral part of community life, not just a job," Marsh said.

Marsh feels the fair, with its agricultural exhibits and displays of rural life, is a time when the community defines itself within a culturally important moment.

"County fairs are the focus of much of the year for farm families. Teenagers show their 4-H projects and other prize animals," Marsh said. "The Bloomsburg Fair gives kids the opportunity to learn about competition, breed standards and meet other kids with the same interests."

Students in Marsh's class participated in a scavenger hunt in which they answered questions regarding the important cultural values and methods used within the agricultural industry of Pennsylvania.

Students observed the pride farmers had in their jobs, farming as a family operation, ongoing selection of productive breeds and strains, the role of government in agriculture, influence of chemical companies, the increased concern for biosecurity and certainly the dominance of high calorie foods.

For some, fried food is just as, if not more, important than agriculture. Marsh has a personal favorite food of the fair.

"Funnel cake is, of course, the perfect food. It consists of equal parts sugar, starch and grease," Marsh said.

He further argues his belief on his Pennsylvania Food Texture Analysis Diagram, which can be found on his public space.

For those students who weren't lucky enough to experience the Bloomsburg Fair this year, Marsh sums it up quite vividly.

"You have to love the big stuff. The display of the 2,700-pound ox named Bubba, the world's biggest pig, an enormous rat and Buffo, the strongest clown. The solemn show of dairy cows in the arena was great with the huge poster of steak at the end. The little pigs in the "junior show" raced in circles until their owners snagged a leg and tripped them so they fell into the straw," Marsh said.

"The safety stickers on the display farm equipment showing big cartoons of how arms, legs and eyes could be taken out by the machines, the Mt. Carmel High School band playing their hearts out on a Billy Joel medley to an audience of about 15 people," Marsh said. "The fried-everything stands: apple rings, potatoes (of course), Oreos, dough, an entire onion sliced and fried into a grease-laden rose."

Abroad perspective: Rome, Italy

By Elisabeth Hulette
Contributing Writer

Courtesy of Elisabeth Hulette

The Colosseum, built by the Flavian emperors in the first century AD, was a gift to the Roman citizens. Gladiatorial games and hunts were popular in the now 1,922-year-old amphitheater.

I went abroad and fell in love. With whom, you ask? Say rather with what, for it took an entire city—I fell in love with Rome. The whole city, from the beautiful cathedrals to the classical ruins, from the incredible food to the unbelievable views. The Euro, the lira, the street vendors, the Renaissance art. I fell in love with the Italian people, the Italian culture and the pace of a world so remarkably removed from everything I had ever experienced before.

But it wasn't always this way.

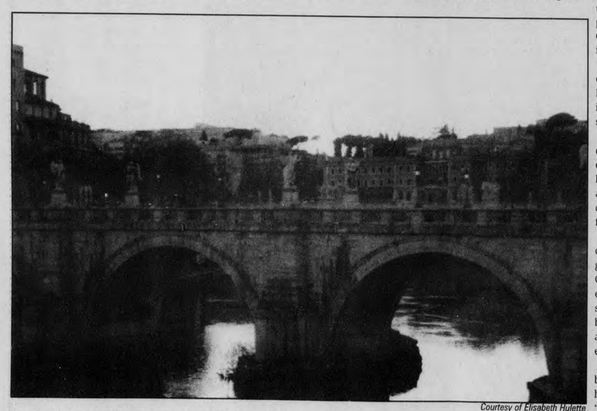
I decided to go to Rome because I am a classics major (for the engineers, that means I take classes in Greek, Latin, archaeology and ancient history). The two study abroad options for a student such as myself are typically Athens or Rome. Athens, I had been told, is a rather frightening city, and so I determined to go to Rome.

I would have the opportunity to visit all the places I had studied in my classes but had never seen for myself. Images of the Roman forum, the Circus Maximus and the Colosseum all mixed in my head along with scenes from "Gladiator" and "Ben Hur," complete with orchestrated soundtrack bites and video clips of sweeping ancient landscapes. After four years of Latin in high school, it was about time I experienced Rome, the Eternal City, with my own eyes.

Unfortunately, I overlooked the part where actual Italian people now live among my ancient ruins. Latin, sure, but Italian? The full impact of my nearly complete ignorance of Italian culture did not truly hit home until I felt my heart freeze at the thought of ordering so much as a sandwich.

Never before had I been in a place where English was not the primary language. I had been warned that this could be difficult, but I never believed it. So what did I do with my terrified, jet lagged, American heart? Yes, I cried. More specifically, I cried over a collect call to my parents at 2 in the morning. The later financial consequences of this were not pretty.

Things began to improve the next day with the start of orientation. Yes, I was a stranger in a strange land.



Courtesy of Elisabeth Hulette

The Ponte San Angelo, made in the second century B.C., is lined with 10 angel statues made by Bernini in 1669.

But like our esteemed dean told us over and over again, we were study abroad students and as such we had to be tough and flexible. I could do that, right? So I leapt into orientation with renewed spirits.

Good thing, too, because orientation was a lot of fun—a whirlwind tour of everything Italian. We were given lessons in how to cook with true Italian finesse and how to match wines with food. Our Italian professor gave a presentation on Italian culture (for the girls, also known as Lessons In How To Evade Overenthusiastic Italian Boys).

The art history professor, a classical archaeologist from Belgium, took us on The Wall Walk, an eight-hour, 13-mile hike around the entire ancient wall of Rome, complete with history lessons from 2,500 years of Roman blood and glory.

The best part of orientation came at the end, when the whole school made a two-hour trek by bus to the hilltop town of Todi, located in the Tuscan countryside. Many of you may recall Todi as the set for Franco Zeffirelli's film version of "Romeo and Juliet," the one from the '60s that is most often shown to sleepy high school English students. We were allowed to explore the gorgeous medieval sites of Todi, and were then taken to a castle overlooking the city for a traditional five-hour Italian meal. My vegetarianism went straight out the window and I began to think, Italians aren't so bad.

Aha, therein lies my second mistake. As classes began, I started feeling more at home in the city. I knew how to get to school and how to ride the metro system. I had started learning a handful of Italian phrases in my Italian class and I was less afraid of the inhabitants of the city.

I became too trusting too soon, and despite the warnings I had heard from previous study abroad students, I started carrying my wallet in my backpack. Everyone else in my program was doing the same, but somehow I was among the first to have my wallet stolen right off my back—somewhere between the metro station and my flat.

I lost about 150 Euro, both my credit cards, my BU ID, my international student identity card [ISIC] and a Nine West wallet that I really liked. Fits of tears followed, and since there was no one else around, they were directed at Fabrizio the doorman, who comforted me as best he could. "Doan worry, eez only money," he said.

Getting back on my feet from that was quite a challenge—trips to the American Express office followed, along with the filing of a police report in a scary building guarded by huge Italian guys in uniform. I had to get a new ISIC from the student travel office, and had to cancel and replace my debit card through a phone system where I couldn't use 800 numbers. Oddly enough, once I had almost everything straightened out, I began to feel somewhat empowered. Resourceful. After that, I could handle anything.

Armed with a money belt that strapped my passport and credit cards around my waist, I ventured out into the city. The Vatican was the first stop on my list, and believe me when I say that stepping into Saint Peter's basilica for the first time was an awe-inspiring experience.

Under the colossal dome of the cathedral I found Michelangelo's sculpture of the Pieta (straight out of my Art History 102 textbook) along with marble sculpture after marble sculpture and tombs of Catholic popes, several of whom are currently bronzed and lying in glass boxes.

I walked through the Roman Forum and stood in front of the Curia (senate house) where Cicero delivered the very same speech I had translated in Latin 201 the previous semester. I stood exactly under the oculus of the concrete dome in the Pantheon, and believe me, it was infatuation at first sight.

I circled the Colosseum, put my hand in the Mouth of Truth, ran through the Circus Maximus, walked under the Arch of Constantine and photographed the Baths of Caracalla—and it was all just as I had imagined it would be.

Then I began to see another side of Rome. There was much more in Italy's capital than I had ever realized, and a piece at a time the city slowly let me in.

Trionfale Market was located just down the street from my apartment complex, and once I learned my Italian numbers I was able to put up a good-natured fight with the vendors over fruit, pasta, vegetables and flowers.

When Rome began to win at soccer I realized how crazy the Italians get about their teams (think of Quidditch in "Harry Potter"), and for every game the city was packed with spectators while maroon and orange banners sporting S.P.Q.R. (the senate and the people of Rome) hung from every window.

My favorite part of the city became not the ancient quarter as I had anticipated, but Trastevere, the "medieval" section whose inhabitants fiercely defend their standing as the last true Romans. Here I found the most charming winding streets, the friendliest people and the best restaurants in the entire city, as well as the church, Santa Maria in Trastevere which had the most incredible mosaics.

The best part of the city was in a spot many people never even see. There is a part of the Villa Borghese park that overlooks the Piazza del Popolo (plaza of the people), which is a beautiful open space in its own right. From this overlook, there is a view of the entire city where the sun sets directly opposite where you stand.

I had never seen anything so beautiful as the domes and terracotta roofs of the city as they glow in the late sun, and I doubt I ever will. Love? Oh, yes—swept off my feet and completely infatuated. I was hooked.

I learned a few things as well. No matter where you are or what you are buying, Romans always demand exact change. I believe this is because of their dislike for the many small coins of the Euro system, and so every person who you deal with will roll their eyes at you in the same way if you don't have change, and grin at you in the same way if you do.

A poor economy somehow leads directly to public displays of affection, and since most young adults in Rome are still living at home at the age of 35, romantic encounters take to the streets. This took some getting used to, as did the use of military time (this one baffled my underdeveloped math skills for quite awhile).

Just because a given public bus will take you quickly and efficiently from one place to another does not mean it will do the same in the opposite direction. I learned this the hard way, by riding the same bus for an hour and a half when I expected it to take 10 minutes. Also, you should never expect to accomplish anything between noon and 3 or 4 p.m.—the entire country will be napping.

It is true that the Italians enjoy life more than we do. Their pace of life is slower, their appreciation for good food, wine and conversation is greater and when things don't run as efficiently as they could, it just means someone somewhere is stopping to enjoy the sweet life.

The street vendors who sell The Wall Street Journal Europe, the shopkeepers who practically attack you while trying to make a sale, the accordion players who periodically invade your subway car and the Italian boys who can instinctively sense a girl is American from miles away all took some getting used to, but they have all infiltrated my heart in their own ways. And I never saw it coming.

I did travel during and after the semester in Western Europe, Eastern Europe, and the United Kingdom. Six countries, more than 20 cities, five foreign languages and I still tell anyone who asks that Rome was the best place I visited while abroad.

Rome and I, we took our time in getting to know each other. Over long walks, getting lost and finding my way, we bonded. And I like to think Rome loves me, too.

Administration does not approve speaker

Thor Halvorssen, the executive director of the Foundation for Individual Rights in Education (FIRE), will be speaking for free on campus Oct. 24. The University refused to fund the conservative speaker.

By Rachel Laskow
Editor-in-Chief

Executive Director of the Foundation for Individual Rights in Education (FIRE) Thor Halvorssen was scheduled to speak at the University on Oct. 24, using money appropriated to the Conservatives Club from the Student Activity Fee. He will now be addressing the campus for free because the University would not approve the funding.

The Conservatives Club received money from the Bucknell Student Government (BSG) to fund Halvorssen, but when the Conservatives Club asked the University to approve the speaker, it was denied approval. General Counsel Wayne Bromfield reviewed the Conservatives Club's proposal and recommended that payment be disapproved and the President's Staff approved that recommendation.

According to BSG President Amir Sadaghiani '03, all organizations on campus must get approval from the University before any speaker can come to campus.

Bromfield said the University received a letter from FIRE that the University interpreted as a threat of lawsuit. The letter was regarding a University incident last spring in which a student was accused of biased-related harassment.

"In early August, we received correspondence from FIRE. That letter threatened the use of legal resources to challenge and attempt to overturn a decision of Bucknell's Community Judicial Board (CJB)," Bromfield said.

According to Greg Lukianoff, director of legal and public advocacy of FIRE, FIRE did not threaten to sue.

"This situation is made completely absurd by the fact that we, as an organization, do not sue anyone. It is true that members of our legal network are interested in the case but those are independent, pro bono attorneys and would ultimately be responsible for handling any litigation themselves," Lukianoff said.

Although Lukianoff said that FIRE does not sue, Dean of Students Richard Ferraro says the University does not fund people who threaten to sue the University.

"Our refusal to allow funding of his speech was based on the principle

Athletics center opening in phases

Fitness center generates rave reviews, with pool and natatorium to open soon

By Andrew Burr
News Editor

With last Friday's opening of the fitness center, and plans for the pool and natatorium to open later this month, a new age in University athletics facilities has begun.

"We are excited to have been able to bring the new fitness center portion of the Recreation and Athletics Center (RAC) project on-line this fall semester as promised to the campus community," Athletic Director John Hardt said. "Having been involved with the RAC from the project's initial design stages, it's very exciting and gratifying to see the ideas and concepts for this facility become an active, functioning reality with the opening of the fitness center. The overall quality of the new fitness facility is first rate, and the initial feedback from both the campus and community has been

Slated to open at the end of this month, the new pool is a big reason why Athletic Director John Hardt believes the University has gone from the bottom of the Patriot League, in terms of athletic facilities, all the way to the top. Ad brews controversy among college newspapers

PETA targets universities with campaign claiming beer more nutritious than milk

By Sandi-Jo Galati
News Editor

People for the Ethical Treatment of Animals (PETA) has recently targeted college newspapers nationwide with its advertising campaign entitled "Got … Beer?!"

The organization has reportedly targeted the top 10 party and stone-cold sober universities, as ranked by "The Princeton Review," opening a can of worms among university newspapers.

"I love controversial advertising: somebody actually paying a newspaper to do what we're supposed to do—stir up trouble," said John Wilson, adviser to The Indy, the student newspaper of Illinois State University.

Editorial boards are continually challenged with such controversial issues forcing college publications to weigh their journalistic right to freedom of press versus the ethical implications surrounding the issue in question.

"I think it's just judgment and experience that proves to be successful in dealing with these situations," said Pete Van Emburgh '02, a former editor-in-chief of The Bucknellian. "One typically has to examine whether a certain ad or article is potentially offensive, that certainly draws a clear line of ethics."

When the first "Got … Beer?!" campaign kicked off in March 2000, the public uproar led by Mothers Against Drunk Driving and dairy farmers prompted PETA to remove these ads from the public within days.

PETA objects to milk consumption because of forced pregnancies, genetic treatment and hormone infusion techniques that dairy farmers use to enhance milk production of cattle.

The ads displayed a beer bottle and the slogan "Got … Beer?! Better

University celebrates 10th National Coming Out Day

By Alyson Walker
Features Editor

National Coming Out Day is being celebrated throughout not only the University but other campuses, churches and businesses around the nation. This year, the Office of Lesbian, Gay, Bisexual and Transgender Awareness (LGBT), a programming office under the deans of students, will host "High Tea, High Camp, A Wilde Buffet," in conjunction with the Weis Center Performance Series presentation of Oscar Wilde's "The Importance of Being Earnest."

Tickets are $14 for students and $20 for the public and includes dinner prior to the play, a ticket to the performance and dessert afterwards. The dinner begins at 6:30 p.m. in Walls Lounge. Reservations are required and, according to Fran McDaniel, coordinator of the Office of LGBT Awareness, the response rate has been incredible, with very few tickets remaining to the dinner.

"I think this event will be very successful, especially thanks to the help of Committee on Campus Diversity and Tim Tenon of Dining Services by underwriting the event," McDaniel said.

"The Importance of Being Earnest" was a fortunate scheduling by the Weis Center.

"Although unplanned, it was wonderfully appropriate that a play written by gay playwright Oscar Wilde was scheduled in the Weis Center Series to be performed on National Coming Out Day," McDaniel said. "We had to do something special and it's going to be a great evening."

The comedy is about two characters, Jack Worthing and Algernon Moncrieff, who have created imaginary companions to add excitement to their lives. These companions then cause turmoil in their romantic lives.

Public Safety Log

Wednesday, Oct. 2

CRIMINAL MISCHIEF—A student reported to Public Safety that unknown person(s) threw eggs on his vehicle while it was parked on Seventh Street across from the Farm Lot. The incident is under investigation.

CRIMINAL MISCHIEF—A student reported to a Public Safety that unknown person(s) threw eggs on his vehicle while it was parked in the lot behind the Sigma Phi Epsilon Fraternity. The incident is under investigation.

INDECENT EXPOSURE—A student reported to Public Safety that a male was sitting on a walk way bench between the Gateways and Loomis Street masturbating. No suspects could be located in a search of the area. Lewisburg Police were contacted. A Public Safety alert was issued. The incident is under investigation.

Thursday, Oct. 3

UNDERAGE DRINKING / PUBLIC DRUNKENNESS / THEFT / DISORDERLY CONDUCT / FAILURE TO IDENTIFY ONESELF—While on routine patrol, Public Safety stopped a male walking with a staggered gait and carrying a folding chair in front of Smith Hall. When the male would not identify himself, the Lewisburg Police Department (LPD) was contacted and responded. LPD arraigned the male as a "John Doe" in front of the duty magistrate and subsequently committed him to the Snyder County Jail. He was later identified as a student under the age of 21, who had consumed alcohol. He was cited for disorderly conduct, failure to identify oneself, theft, underage drinking and public drunkenness.

MEDICAL TRANSPORT—A student contacted Public Safety and requested transportation to Evangelical Hospital Emergency Room for treatment of a possible kidney infection. A Student Health Services driver responded and transported the student to the hospital. The individual later returned to campus.

Saturday, Oct. 5

VANDALISM—Public Safety responded to Newman House for the report of vandalism to the building. A piece of spouting was found on the ground at the rear of the house. The spouting was replaced and a work order filed to secure it. No witnesses or suspects were located in a search of the area.

INDECENT ACTS—Public Safety reported to the corner of Walker and Loomis Streets for the report of a male and female inside a truck engaged in sexual acts. The vehicle left as the student was contacting Public Safety. Lewisburg Police were notified. No suspects were located in a search of the area.

MOTOR VEHICLE ACCIDENT—Public Safety responded to Spratt House for the report of a vehicle damaged while parked in the lot. A message had been left on the windshield of the damaged vehicle.

MEDICAL TRANSPORT / UNDERAGE CONSUMPTION—Public Safety responded to Seventh Street near the Langone Center for the report of a male lying in the street. Upon investigation, it was determined that the male was a student who was diabetic, had consumed alcohol and was in need of medical treatment. The student was transported by ambulance to Evangelical Community Hospital Emergency Room for treatment and later returned to campus.

Sunday, Oct. 6

CRIMINAL MISCHIEF—Public Safety responded to Roberts Hall regarding a person with a hand laceration. Upon investigation, it was determined that a student had punched through a window causing a severe laceration to his right hand. The individual was transported by ambulance to Evangelical Community Hospital Emergency Room for treatment and later returned to campus. Citations were issued for property violations and creating a hazardous condition.

DISORDERLY CONDUCT / UNDERAGE CONSUMPTION—While on routine patrol on Fraternity Road, Public Safety met with brothers from Lambda Chi Alpha Fraternity who reported that a male had struck another male at the house and was running towards Delta Upsilon Fraternity. Public Safety located the individual and identified him as a student. The student was cited for disorderly conduct and underage consumption. East Buffalo Township Police responded.

Monday, Oct. 7

CRIMINAL MISCHIEF—A student reported to Public Safety that someone scratched the passenger door of his vehicle while it was parked on campus either at Swartz Hall or in the new student parking area near Phi Kappa Psi Fraternity. The incident is under investigation.

INFORMATION—A student reported to Public Safety that a sign was posted on her Smith Hall room door that advertised a Klan meeting. A student did admit to posting the sign as a joke. University officials are following up.

Tuesday, Oct. 8

FRATERNITY VIOLATION / UNREGISTERED SOCIAL EVENT—While on routine foot patrol, Public Safety observed loud music and the odor of alcohol coming from the basement of Delta Upsilon Fraternity. Public Safety spoke with the house president and was permitted to access the basement, where approximately 45 individuals were mingling with many empty beer cans present. As Public Safety attempted to exit the fraternity house, a male, later identified as a student, spoke disrespectfully to a Public Safety officer. A citation was issued for an unregistered social event with beer pong violations.

MEDICAL TRANSPORT—A student contacted Public Safety and requested transportation to Evangelical Community Hospital for treatment of an allergic reaction to a flu shot. A Student Health Services driver transported the student and later returned her to campus.

Fall concert falls silent

University devoting resources to spring show in new pavilion

By Jolene Hart
Managing Editor

It appears that the University will forego its annual fall concert, with the hope of arranging a spectacular event to be held in the new athletic center during the spring semester.

Associate Dean of Students Kari Conrad, adviser of the University's concert committee, explained that the elimination of the fall concert is not definite, though no performance opportunities have presented themselves so far.

"Bids have been put in. We're not 100 percent sure. We [the Concert Committee] decided that, if we cannot get an artist that is really good, we want to save money for a spring concert in the new athletic pavilion," Conrad said.

Many students speculated that Fall Fest, featuring Howie Day, was substituted for the annual concert, though Conrad assured that is not the case.

"The concert committee co-sponsored Fall Fest, contributing some of its funds, because we were interested in an outdoor event," Conrad said.

The Concert Committee is enthusiastic about the opening of the new athletic center, as the facility will better accommodate future concerts. Conrad cited the improved acoustics and seating as fundamental benefits of the new venue. Concert Committee co-chairperson Perry Ratcliffe '03 said, "It's going to be an amazing venue. There will be seating as well as standing room with the option of seats on the floor. We want our spring concert to be a great opener for the new venue."

Although the Fieldhouse has a capacity of 4,500 people, which is 500 more than the facility currently under construction, it is flawed in several important areas. The Fieldhouse does not have the means to 'fly,' or suspend, sound and lighting equipment from above a stage, and has required a much more expensive construction of equipment to accommodate artists such as Shaggy and Busta Rhymes.

Past concerts have not been profitable, most often yielding a significant loss of funds.

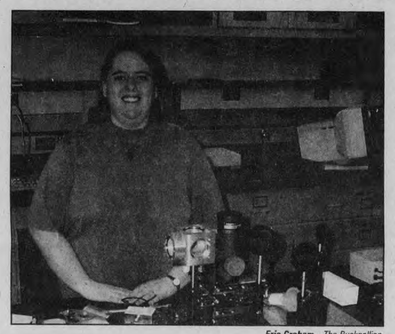
"Due to our enormous production and labor costs, our goal is to break even," Conrad said.

In the past, the committee has also struggled with the limited availability of the Fieldhouse, which is used for a wide range of events. This severely limits the number of artists that can possibly be booked by the committee. The hope is that the new venue will alleviate many of these obstacles.

The spring concert has not yet been selected, and the Concert Committee, though having recently completed a campus e-mail survey, is still taking suggestions for possible artists.

Professor receives research grant

Professor of Chemistry Castle given 20K for experiments



Eric Graham—The Bucknellian

Assistant Professor of Chemistry Karen Castle was given a $20,000 grant by the Camille and Henry Dreyfus Foundation for research experiments at the University. Grants were given to only nine of 62 nominees this year.

By Aly Rentrop
Senior Writer

Assistant Professor of Chemistry Karen Castle recently received a $20,000 grant from the Camille and Henry Dreyfus Foundation. Grants are awarded to first-year faculty members at undergraduate institutions. Nine professors out 62 nominees nationwide were given grants, which will be utilized to fund the laboratory equipment and the high start-up costs of Castle's research experiment. In addition to the Dreyfus grant, the project is funded by start-up funds from the University and a grant from NASA's Geospace Sciences program.

Castle's research includes laser spectroscopy, atmospheric chemistry and aeronomy, the study of Earth's atmosphere and other planets. Her present research project measures vibrational energy transfer in collisions between carbon dioxide molecules and oxygen atoms, and this experiment is being done in conjunction with the Air Force Research Laboratory. Castle currently has two research students involved in this project, Katie Kleissas '04 and Betsy Staudt '04.

"I think that this research is interesting because it deals with real chemistry in the atmospheric environment. Our data will help others when dealing with the heating and cooling of the upper atmosphere and it will be fun to use lasers in the experiment," Kleissas said.

Castle received her undergraduate degree in chemistry from the University of California at Irvine, and she obtained her doctorate in physical chemistry from Oregon State University. Before beginning her career at the University this fall, Castle did postdoctoral research with the Air Force Research Laboratory, Space Vehicles Directorate in the Boston area.

Her research with the Air Force is similar to what she is currently working on at the University.

The lasers used in this diode laser absorption spectroscopy are scheduled to arrive next week. Castle encourages any undergraduate students who are interested in doing research in laser spectroscopy and atmospheric chemistry to contact her. Research opportunities are available during both the academic year and during the summer.

Castle is currently teaching inorganic chemistry during the fall semester and will be teaching physical chemistry in the spring.

"In my short time here at Bucknell, I have been impressed with the quality of our students and their interest in learning," Castle said.

The performance will be by The Aquila Theatre Company.

The Office of LGBT Awareness, in conjunction with Friends of Lesbians and Gays & Bisexuals, Transgenders (FLAG & BT), a student organization funded by Bucknell Student Government, will also be holding another National Coming Out Day event. The LGBT Walk-in Closet will be from 12-2 p.m. in the LC Forum.

Its purpose is to provide people with an experience of what it is like for those who are in the closet. One of the goals of this program is to provide understanding and to combat the climate on campus, making it safer for people to come out.

"When people can't say who they went to the movies with, that's sad," McDaniel said.

McDaniel also emphasized that it is an individual's orientation, not behavior that makes them LGBT.

"I am proud to support Coming Out Day because the freedom to express one's sexuality seems to me to be a basic human right and it is an undeniable fact that gays and lesbians suffer discrimination and abuse solely on the basis of their sexuality," Assistant Professor of the Comparative Humanities Program John Hunter said. "This is as cruel and unjust as discrimination based on race or gender or any other arbitrary criterion, and is a sign of our culture's ongoing inability to deal with genuine difference."

Along with the programs for National Coming Out Day, there is a list of over 200 faculty and staff who are supporters of LGBT students.

"The list of supporting faculty and staff was a contributing factor last year in two first-year students deciding not to transfer from the University because they saw the list and realized that someone did care," McDaniel said.

The list is another attempt to make the campus environment more conducive to students coming out of the closet.

"I have seen and felt the effects that ignorance has had on people very important to me and constantly wonder how anyone could possibly gain from making people different from them feel less than or fearful or unable to fully realize themselves," Assistant Director of Admissions Paula Cogan said. "It seems like this type of support should be a given, but it's not and that's hard to swallow. This isn't the sole responsibility of the LGBT community, but the responsibility of the entire community. If there's any way that my support can be a small help to even one person, then of course I'm going to show it."

"I have seen and felt the effects that ignorance has had on people very important to me and constantly wonder how anyone could possibly gain from making people different from them feel less than or fearful or unable to fully realize themselves."
—Paula Cogan, assistant director of admissions

McDaniel said that the physical signs of support, such as the list, safe zone signs and Public Safety posters about harassment are all incredibly important to the LGBT community feeling safe and welcome.

"Everyone should have an opportunity to reach his or her full potential without hindrance, harassment or fear for one's safety. Narrow-minded prejudice should have no place here," Professor of Biology Gary Sojka said.

Some of the faculty and staff on the LGBT support list for National Coming Out Day feel that being on this list is only natural and a privilege.

"It's important to me that all students feel supported and welcomed at Bucknell and I want all students to feel comfortable coming in to talk to me. In an atmosphere of acceptance, students can feel free to be who they are, and sexuality is one part of our identity," Associate Dean of the College of Arts and Sciences Elaine Garrett said.

"I am also proud to support Coming Out Day because it is a way to express my solidarity with all of the gay and lesbian friends, colleagues and teachers whom I have known over the years," Hunter said. "Homophobia is a nightmare from which our culture is slowly beginning to awaken. When we are fully awake, we will discover that we are all liberated as a result."

This will be the 10th year that the University has celebrated National Coming Out Day. It is always on Oct. 11 to honor the anniversary of the 1987 march on Washington, D.C. for gay and lesbian equality.

Alpha Lambda Delta Honor Society proves campus presence with scholarship opportunities and activities

By Chris Styers
Senior Writer

The National Alpha Lambda Delta Honor Society (ALD) announced it would award 23 graduate fellowships for 2003-2004. Members pursuing graduate or professional studies can apply for these scholarships, ranging from $3,000 to $7,500. Just as steps to improve education opportunities increase on the national level, the local chapter of ALD is trying to enrich the academic and social experience of ALD members on campus.

ALD is a national honor society that recognizes and encourages academic excellence for first-year students. There are over 230 chapters of ALD in the United States and more than 650,000 students have been inducted since the organization's conception in 1924.

The purpose of the society, as stated in its constitution, is "to encourage superior academic achievement among students in their first year in institutions of higher education, to promote intelligent living and a continued high standard of learning and to assist women and men in recognizing and developing meaningful goals for their roles in society."

To become a member of the society, first-year students must earn a scholastic average of 3.5 or better. Once they join the organization they are lifetime members. Membership in the society enables students to apply for scholarships made possible through the organization's Perpetual Fellowship Fund.

Receiving one of these scholarships is very difficult due to their highly selective and competitive nature. Last year, several University students went through the application process, but without success.

Information on the ALD Web site states "In 2002, there were 287 applicants for the 23 Alpha Lambda Delta Fellowships. The most important quality was the impact that these winners had and the potential for their futures. Fellowship winners tended to be very active in ALD and other campus organizations. Over 40 percent of the winners held an ALD campus office. Additionally, although these are not cut-off scores, the average undergraduate GPA of the 23 winners was 3.95, and their test scores tended to be above the 90th percentile."

In past years, ALD has not been very active at the University. Many of the fellowship winners have come from active ALD programs, and in many institutions ALD's presence is strong. Campus ALD members concluded they wanted to change the organization's role in the campus community and make it more involved.

"Last year we decided we wanted ALD to be more active on campus and in the community," 2002 ALD Chapter President Jessica Clark '04 said.

Although last year's organization did not have a lot of participation, the organization did send out study tips to the first-year class before finals, held a study break at the library with food and drink for the entire campus during finals week and sent a list to local high schools of University students who were willing to tutor.

"In the past, ALD has mostly been inactive, but last year's group decided to organize some activities and try to raise the organization's profile on campus," said Associate Dean of Arts and Sciences Elaine Garrett, one of the advisers to ALD.

Clark and others hope that the organization will continue to grow this year. ALD is currently in the process of selecting new officers and Clark said the number of students striving for leadership positions is already encouraging. Plans are still in the works for what the organization will try to do this year and in its future.

"As Bucknell gets more involved in service learning and volunteerism, I think that ALD will have an increasingly important role to play," Dean of Students and ALD Adviser Richard Ferraro said.

ALD is holding its first interest meeting on Sunday night to try to get a better idea of what the group intends to accomplish. In several weeks, Clark plans to travel to Indianapolis to attend the ALD National Leadership Workshop to come up with even more ideas for the University's ALD chapter.

Breast self-exams come under fire

Study says detection comes too late to reduce risk of cancer

By Jaclyn Carr
Staff Writer

Within the last two weeks, a study has revealed that self-examination probably does not help in the detection of breast cancer. A decade-long study of 260,000 women in Shanghai shows how self-exams do not detect tumors early enough to reduce the risk of death from breast cancer.

Breast self-examinations were previously thought of as a beneficial procedure, where women periodically search for a thickening or a lump that may signal cancer. Self-exams had an important role in developing countries where mammographic screening is not available.

The study that appeared two Wednesdays ago in the "Journal of the National Cancer Institute" suggests that physicians should concentrate more on clinical exams than on self-exams.

In the study, 260,000 female Shanghai women factory workers were split into two groups. Women in one group of 133,000 were taught to perform self-examinations, while the other 133,000 received no information about searching for breast cancer.

Dr. David B. Thomas, a cancer researcher at the Fred Hutchinson Cancer Research Center in Seattle, found that after more than a decade the researchers discovered there was no difference between the two groups in the rate of death from breast cancer. There were women who found benign lumps due to a self-exam, but the self-exam did not reduce the rate of breast cancer.

"I feel that BSE [breast self-exams] combined with regular exams and mammography as practiced here in the States is still the best option at present."
—Dr. Don Stechschulte, director of Student Health Services

Even though the study appears legitimate and accurate, people are still doubtful and the debate carries on.

"I think it is still valid and does work and I would rather have women continue using self-exams, for every little bit helps," Assistant Professor of Biology Josef Novak said.

Statistics show that this little bit is needed. If a lump is detected early, the five-year survival rate exceeds 95 percent.

"I feel that BSE [breast self-exams] combined with regular exams and mammography as practiced here in the States is still the best option at present," Director of Student Health Services Dr. Don Stechschulte said.

Doctors recommend that women start getting mammograms when they are 40, so self-exams remain an excellent option for younger women.

Statistics show that breast cancer is still a prevalent problem for both women and men. Each year, 182,000 women and 1,600 men are diagnosed with breast cancer and 43,300 women and 400 men die from it. One woman in eight either has or will develop breast cancer in her lifetime.

"The area that warrants further investigation is what effect do environmental factors play in the etiology of breast cancer," Stechschulte said. "Why are certain chemicals like dioxin found in the breast tissue of women with cancer compared to women who do not have cancer? For too long we have bet the ranch on early detection, not the investigation of what may be causing this condition."

very complimentary."

Student reactions have been very favorable so far, with only a few minor complaints.

"Although the RAC is still missing free weights, the new gym is so much better the old annex. There's a lot more cardio machines to use and the hammer strengths are great," Warren Long '03 said.

"I really like how they have TVs set up so that you can listen to them on your walkman while you workout, but I wish the TVs were set to better stations," Chase Carpenter '04 said. "Other than that, I'm really impressed with the gym and I think Bucknell is doing a great job."

Hardt reminds the campus that although facets of the RAC are currently open or close to be being opened, ongoing construction on several major components of the RAC may present inconveniences to patrons this semester and early next semester.

"These major project components include bringing the new natatorium and swimming pool online later this month, and then opening the new Pavilion in January at the start of the spring semester," Hardt said. "In addition, we will progressively open other areas of the facility (e.g., locker rooms, offices, the strength & weight training room, etc.) as soon as construction is completed."

Dr. Patch Adams returning to campus for third time

Dr. Hunter Adams, the revolutionary doctor on which the feature film "Patch Adams" is based, will be speaking on campus Oct. 29 at Rooke Chapel. A student favorite, Adams has visited the University every two years since his initial visit in 1996.

By Meghan Fox
Staff Writer

Dr. Hunter "Patch" Adams, the man portrayed by Robin Williams in the Hollywood drama "Patch Adams," is coming to campus on Oct. 29 to share his philosophy, dreams and experience in the field of medicine.

During his years in medical school, Adams envisioned a medical system that addressed the problems of care delivery. He wanted to create a hospital where health care would be free to all patients, where the doctor/patient relationship was revived to an intimate friendship and where all healing arts were welcome to treat both the body and the soul.

"I think his approach is pretty important. It treats the person rather than just the disease and there is a focus on prevention, which is also extremely important," said Alyssa Bishop '04, a pre-med student. "I am incredibly excited about hearing him speak. I've been set on being a doctor since day one, so I think he has a very valuable perspective."

Dr. Donald Stechschulte, medical director of Student Health Services, is organizing Adams' upcoming visit, and has coordinated Adam's past three visits to campus. Adams has come to the University every two years since 1996.

"Now, the first time he came was for three days; that is 72 hours. He was engaged with students for 60 hours. When he comes, he is busy with students every minute of the day," Stechschulte said.

According to Stechschulte, Adams is "back by popular student demand." He will be visiting as many classrooms as possible, and will be speaking with the Science and Technology Residential College.

That evening at 7 p.m., Adams will speak at Rooke Chapel, which will be followed by a book signing. Sigma Chi Fraternity will also host this guest speaker in a free forum at 10 p.m.

"Health care is a major issue in our society today and Patch Adams has a singular and emphatic philosophy on both the administration and practice of health care which many consider unorthodox," Professor of Biology John Tonzetich said. "Speakers such as Adams provide a valuable opportunity to hear these different perspectives firsthand and challenge students to determine what positive values might be inherent in a seemingly radical point of view."

Adams is the founder and director of the Gesundheit Institute, a project spanning more than three decades in order to create a hospital/healing community that fully embodies his medical philosophy.

Funding has been a major obstacle in the attainment of this dream. Since Adams does not believe in malpractice insurance on principle, very few people have been financially supportive of his project along the way. Many potential investors are afraid that the money would be a waste due to the likelihood of a lawsuit against the hospital.

"Patch would say, 'You don't sue your friends and if I am your doctor, I want to be your friend,'" Stechschulte said.

"I've paid to practice medicine for 29 years. I say that to tell you just how much fun it is to give," Adams said during his 2000 visit to campus.

Adams has not actively practiced medicine since the late '80s, Stechschulte said. Instead, Adams has been traveling around the world brining joy and humor to the suffering and oppressed.

Adams has visited the orphanages in Russia, the war zones in Bosnia and numerous other poverty-stricken nations, bringing his clowns and his comedy to lift the spirits of others.

"He is always outrageously dressed," Stechschulte said. "He makes you smile just looking at him."

"Not only is Adams a doctor, but also a political activist.

"He engages people no mater where he is an his ways are infectious. He has a message of peace, brotherhood, joy, curiosity and he spends his whole life living that message," Stechschulte said.

PETA

Than Milk. Find Out More at MilkSucks.com." In their advertisements, PETA claimed that beer was more nutritious than 2 percent milk, having fewer calories, less fat, less sodium and cholesterol, citing the United States Department of Agriculture Nutritional Information for both.

The PETA campaign was revived last month after a two-year absence in response to mounting evidence that this claim is true.

An article printed by The Wall Street Journal in August said that beer "delivers protection against major ailments such as heart attacks, stroke, hypertension, diabetes and dementia."

Additionally "Eat, Drink and Be Healthy: The Harvard Medical School's Guide to Healthy Eating" (2001), reported that consuming alcohol in moderation "protects against heart disease and ischemic strokes, and mounting evidence [shows] that it protects against diabetes and gallstones."

According to The New York Times, after the age of weaning, the lactase gene in humans is no longer transcribed, meaning that the body is incapable of breaking down lactose, the principle sugar in milk.

Milk and cheese consumption are also linked to obesity, heart disease, prostate cancer, breast cancer and osteoporosis, since excess dairy proteins tend to strip calcium from healthy bones.

Despite the biological evidence that refutes the old adage of the healthfulness of milk, the ethics of advocating beer in its place has the potential to stir the debate of whether or not the ad promotes irresponsible or underaged college drinking.

The Daily Collegion, Penn State's morning newspaper, made the decision to run the ad in conjunction with an article and has since received no backlash.

"The business manager, who is the final authority on this matter, alerted us in advance that the ad would be running and who would be speaking on behalf of the newspaper if there were any questions," said Gerry Lynn Hamilton, general manager of The Daily Collegion. "As far as I know, there is no uproar so far."

Other newspapers are more cautious, having learned the hard way the expectations a community places on the editorial board of its paper.

Two years ago, college newspapers were bombarded with an ad sponsored by the Committee for Open Debate on the Holocaust (CODOH), claiming that there was no proof that gas chambers were used for race-related executions in Nazi concentration camps.

The Bucknellian inadvertently published the CODOH ad on Nov. 2, 2000. The ad was overlooked and printed due to a miscommunication between ad representatives and the editorial board, which was preoccupied with ensuring a smooth transition to completely digital production. The Bucknellian was one of two papers to print the ad, an oversight that infuriated and offended many members of the community.

In response to the overwhelming campus-vide response to the ad, Co-Editors-in-Chief Van Emburgh and Heather Napolitano '01 sent a campus-wide e-mail stating that "the inclusion of this outrageous advertisement was in no way a movement to support free speech nor was it, of course, in support of such a horrific claim," but the damage had already been done.

"My personal belief and experiences have caused me to believe that the correlation between free speech and a college campus share a very fine border," Van Emburgh said. "I don't think a college newspaper shares the same immunity privilege that national publications enjoy in regards to free speech because of a lot of complex political issues."

Van Emburgh and Napolitano also wrote a front-page article and devoted the entire Opinions section of the following edition to letters written by members of the community in response to the ad.

"The Holocaust crisis was extremely trying and taxing—but in the long run, I will always look back in a positive light on my experiences and how we handled it and the lessons I learned from the experience," Van Emburgh said.

Despite the efforts of Van Emburgh and Napolitano, this experience has heightened the sensitivity of The Bucknellian in similar issues such as the PETA ad. Van Emburgh said that had he been faced with the decision whether or not to run the ad, he probably would have decided on the latter.

"The PETA ad seems controversial in the fact that they are targeting college students with the notion of alcohol. This comes awfully close to the fine line of what is considered free speech, an accusation we received about the Holocaust ad," Van Emburgh said. "Many people thought we purposefully included that ad in order to make a statement about free speech."

Wilson suggests that making such decisions is where the responsibility of the editorial board lies.

"Whatever you do, you have an obligation to write an editorial explaining it to your readers," Wilson said. "If you run ads from bars, it might seem odd to bar an ad for advocating beer drinking. If it's the anti-milk part that's the problem, you need to explain that, too."

The Editorial Board of The Bucknellian makes decisions based on the content of the newspaper.

"When a controversial issue arises, the editorial board of The Bucknellian meets and discusses the issue," said Rachel Laskow '03, The Bucknellian editor-in-chief. "By debating all aspects of the issue, the staff concludes what best suits the needs of the newspaper and the campus community and implements that into the publication."

that we do not suppress speech, but we also do not subsidize antagonistic suits. It would be foolish to contribute legal fees to an organization whose avowed intention is to use their legal resources against us," Bromfield said.

Lukianoff believes that if the University extended this policy to any organization that threatened to sue, the University would have to exclude many of the most distinguished social justice speakers of our time.

"It is unacceptable even if we were suing them. If the University won't allow any member of a civil rights organization to come speak any time there is the potential of a law suit, that is really frightening," Lukianoff said.

Conservatives Club President Denise Chaykun '04 said the Conservatives Club wanted Halvorssen to speak at the University because he could help the University deal with current issues.

"He brings up some points that are really unique and we thought that the campus could benefit from him coming," Chaykun said.

According to Chaykun, Halvorssen will still be coming to the University on Oct. 24.

Bush faces skepticism in Senate

President George W. Bush speaking in front of congressional legislators on the current situation in Iraq. Bush faces strong opposition from the legislature concerning a war on Iraq.

By Michael Dudzinski
Staff Writer

A nervous President George W. Bush warned Tuesday night that Iraq could attack the United States with biological and chemical weapons any day. According to The New York Times, Bush, though well aware that many Americans do not want a war, asserted that confronting the threat Iraq poses is crucial to winning the war on terror.

The purpose of Bush's speech was not only directed toward swaying moderates to support his war effort, but also delivering a stern plea to the international community to support the United States. The president has only received full support from Great Britain, while other allies have shown a great deal of skepticism toward the removal of Iraqi President Saddam Hussein. CNN reported Wednesday that the allied standpoint on Iraq has remained unchanged, regardless of Bush's plea for help.

Trying to build his case, Bush expressed a more complacent view that aimed to ease the tensions that many Americans and allies have towards his proposal to use force. A few weeks ago, Bush wanted to topple the Iraqi dictator, but now pledges that force will be used only as a last resort, according to CNN.

The main obstacle that Bush faces with regard to his Iraqi initiative has been in the Senate. Faced with a request from the president to use all means necessary to oust Hussein, Senate Democrats have expressed skepticism.

Many citizens have been flooding the phone lines, faxes and mailboxes of senators demanding peace with Iraq.

MSNBC revealed that many top senators are concerned that the president's demand for unlimited authority over policy towards Iraq would threaten the security of the United States.

CNN reports that Rep. Mike Thompson, D-Calif., expressed opposition to Bush's consideration of a pre-emptive strike against Iraq. He stated that such action would place the international community in an unfavorable situation, in which there appears to be no immediate danger to Americans. Many lawmakers have questioned the credibility of Bush's accusation that Iraq possesses biological and chemical weapons, citing that the president has yet to provide proof of their existence.

In favor of Bush, Sen. John McCain, R-Ariz., advised his colleagues that the president has gone through all the appropriate measures to ensure that military action is the last option in Iraq. CNN highlighted McCain's argument that Bush is going through Congress to get an endorsement and has received a resolution from the U.N. Security Council, exhibiting that the president is not seeking military action as a first option in battling Hussein.

Many lawmakers still maintain that there is no need for military action against Iraq and that the conflict can be resolved through diplomatic channels.

Citing the escalating domestic instability and economic woes, Sen. Robert Byrd, D-W.Va., threatened to veto Bush's demand for military action. According to CNN, Byrd was adamant in his belief that the president is determined to get a vote on the war resolution by election time in order to take attention away from the real problem of the economy.

Sen. Dianne Feinstein, D-Calif., told CNN that she felt that the president has made a persuasive argument against Hussein, but warned that the president should reconsider his proposal of military force as the solution. She questioned the immediacy of the threat because Iraq has not used any chemical weapons in over a decade. Feinstein expressed certainty that disarming Iraq could be done peacefully through the supervision of the United Nations, and stressed this action as a first-line defense.

The debate among lawmakers about whether they should grant Bush a resolution that would allow him to attack Iraq has faced much criticism from the president. MSNBC reported that Bush demands immediate action due to the mounting threat from Iraq, which escalates with each day that Congress withholds its decision.

Byrd hinted that the Senate would use all procedural methods necessary before proposing a resolution to the president, which may not materialize until next week.

Economic concerns lead to reopening of ports

By Jim Leahy
Senior Writer

With the economy in a tenuous situation, a port shutdown is not what Wall Street was looking for. The American economy was losing between $1-2 billion each day thanks to a shutdown at 29 of the West Coast's ports over the past 11 days. Cranes remained idle and ships moored offshore, allowing their cargoes to sit and wait for processing at the docks.

On Tuesday, President George W. Bush invoked the Taft-Hartley Act of 1947, its first use in 24 years, to put a temporary end to the shutdown and to force workers back to their jobs. A Federal Court agreed late Tuesday, and workers were expected back at the docks on Wednesday to begin the process of unloading the backlog of ships and getting goods sitting at the port onto ships for their voyage abroad.

There is a specific method of operation for the president when he acts under the authority that Taft-Hartley gives him. According to The Wall Street Journal, Bush must follow a five-step process. Initially, the president creates a board to investigate the terms of the dispute. Following the board's report, the president can ask a court for an 80-day cooling-off period during which workers return to their jobs. Throughout that period, mediators work on brokering a settlement. After 60 days, the National Labor Relations Board will poll workers on the last offer that their employer gave them, and if the employees reject the offer, they can go back on strike or the employer can lock them out.

According to the White House, the president, when making his announcement on Tuesday, said, "Because the operation of western ports is vital to our economy and to our military, I have determined that the current situation imperils our national health and safety. I have appointed a board of inquiry to investigate the issues at stake. Today, the board submitted an official report stating each party's position."

"I'm now directing Attorney General Ashcroft to seek an injunction under the Taft-Hartley Act, ending the lockout and requiring work at the ports to resume at a normal pace," Bush said. "This dispute between management and labor cannot be allowed to further harm the economy and force thousands of working Americans from their jobs."

The report of the board of inquiry included some of the problems that the lockout is causing. According to the report, available from the U.S. Department of Labor, "West Coast ports are crucial to U.S. trade, handling over $300 billion in trade a year. These ports handle more than half of all containerized imports and exports. Layoffs have already begun in multiple industries around the country, and millions of dollars in produce, fish, meat and poultry are rotting on docks and ships."

The question to ask is how did it all start. According to MSNBC.com, "The Pacific Maritime Association, which represents shippers, says it was forced to halt operations after a work slowdown they described as the equivalent of a 'strike with pay.'" The International Longshore and Warehouse Union "acknowledged slowing operations by refusing to work overtime and adhering to contractual restrictions in a 'work-to-rule' job action."

A San Diego port for automobiles stands empty. The shutdown of West Coast ports has cost the U.S. economy billions of dollars a day.

MSNBC.com reports that technology is another central issue in the dispute between the port management and longshoremen, who can make as much as $100,000 a year. Management wants "to make use of new technology, including computerized information systems to track cargo." The longshoremen "want to ensure that any new technology-related jobs are unionized."

What does Wall Street think about the president's decision? "Bush's decision to intervene, which reversed the administration's prior stance, was the main factor accounting for today's broader market advance," said Steven Massocca, president of Pacific Growth Equities in San Francisco in a report on RealMoney.com. "With the economy on the brink [of recession], the port strike was not exactly a vitamin pill."

The bottom line is that strike was hurting the economy. Goods coming into the country included seasonal consumer products destined for store shelves as part of the holiday shopping season. Car companies and other manufacturing outlets that rely on a steady flow of goods to keep plants open were feeling a crunch in their supply chains. There is the real possibility that perishable goods sitting on ships or on the docks will go bad and will have to be destroyed.

The president will take heat from labor in the coming days, as unions will complain that his actions were uncalled-for. Bush had to weigh angering organized labor and angering the American public that thinks he has not done enough to help the economy. A report in The New York Times said that Bush's "use of Taft-Hartley shows him taking aggressive action to remove a serious threat to the economy. By seeking an 80-day cooling-off period, he will also remove the threat of grave economic damage well before the elections."

That same Times report also said, "now that the president has acted, labor leaders are saying they are furious. Unions dislike such back-to-work injunctions, viewing them as improper meddling in contract disputes and weakening labor's hand. Richard Trumka, the A.F.L.-C.I.O. secretary-treasurer, said unions were so angry about Bush's move that many union members would consider it in deciding whether to vote Democrat or Republican this November."

Iraqi obsession does not come without expense

By Mike Neibauer
Senior Writer

Last Friday the stock market was taking another beating. As the trading day began, the Department of Labor made a disturbing announcement—that instead of the expected increase of 6,000 payroll jobs in September, there was a decrease of 43,000. In normal times this would be a very minor one-month-only economic bump in the road. However, these are not normal times economically. While the Iraq "war talk" has become the daily diet and ratings grabber for the news channels, the financial section of most newspapers has become a horror show.

Friday's sell-off leaves the Dow Jones Average near a five-year low. TheDow Jones and the S&P 500 averages are headed for their first consecutive three-year decline since 1941.

The worst of corporate criminals, (former and soon-to-be former) executives, can stay out of handcuffs only if they can make a deal with the law by implicating their former colleagues. The 27-year-old broker that handled Martha Stewart's questionable trade of ImClone stock has turned prosecutors' evidence concerning her insider trading case against her. Stewart has subsequently resigned her position as a board member at the New York Stock Exchange. The Enron, WorldCom, ImClone, Adelphia and Global Crossings of the world are giving markets and investors headaches while previously downward-revised corporate earnings are under-whelming in most cases. This does not inspire trust in corporate America in the least. The list of corporate felons-to-be is growing long as financial markets fail to maintain momentum and as the large and small investor doubt market credibility. The billions lost are not all attributable to one cause, but attention to the economy has not been the primary focus of this president.

B & P Commentary

When asked and pressed by a CNBC reporter about downplaying the impact of the lacking employment numbers, Labor Secretary Elaine Chao stiffly said that "she went to Harvard Business School and didn't need to be reminded of the meaning of the numbers." Her terse attitude toward the reporter and disingenuous remarks about the ease of regaining employment helped to inspire the Dow to a loss of 188 points for the day. Actions like Chao's and (as some would say) the slow reaction of the administration to the corporate scandals expose the White House's lack of attention to economic matters. Many financial analysts are questioning whether the White House has the same quality of personnel handling the economy as it has running foreign policy.

Word is that after situations with Iraq begin to show resolution, many economic advisers now in place will leave. Perhaps we should not wait. We need more immediate stimulus, and employment programs cannot wait since current policies are not effective even with extremely low interest rates. If the increase of expenditures for homeland security, the widely dispersed war on terror and the now-emerging buildup of forces against Iraq have not impacted markets yet, the disruption and uncertainty have. Oil prices already have a war premium factored in as supply has tightened as the winter heating season begins.

Former Vice President Al Gore made an economic speech this week, though it did not receive the attention of his foreign policy speech. This may stem from frustration and the general disgust that the American public feels concerning the country's economic situation. As the United States moves toward a new desert operation in Iraq, the White House has enjoyed a groundswell of support, as did the first President Bush. It will be a mistake for the White House to take its eye off the economic ball as reservists are called up for service and away from the work force. There is no economic stimulus from the kind of war we waged 10 years ago or will wage today. The president is banking on a short, sharp attack with a quick victory over Iraqi President Saddam Hussein, but, even if this occurs, the long occupation afterward has open-ended costs and its duration cannot be easily guessed.

The financial and political outcome of operations in Afghanistan is not encouraging as President Hamid Karzai is complaining that the promised funding has not arrived and many government officials and his army are not being paid. The fact that Karzai must be guarded by U.S. troops is telling, and United States allying and dealing with the drug producing Afghan warlords outside of Kabul and Kandahar rankles Karzai as it dilutes his authority. Iraq will be a much larger case than Afghanistan in every way.

The idea of an easy or inexpensive Iraqi operation must be dismissed. We can only hope that our Afghan operations will not be the pattern for potential action in Iraq. It remains to be seen if the Bush White House will make the mistake of the former Bush administration and bungle the economy while being obsessed with Iraq. There is no mistake that the U.S. economy will be paying the price of the president's decisions long after he leaves office, regardless of the outcome. The economy must not be pushed aside now, because it will need serious aid later.

Free speech necessary at University

In the past week, freedom of speech has been a prevalent issue on campus. The limits of this right, guaranteed by the First Amendment, have been questioned more since last week's release of the "Counterweight." This edition contained many controversial articles, several of which caused a stir among certain groups on campus. The Bucknellian supports the "Counterweight's" decision to exercise its right of free speech and to provide a conservative viewpoint on localized topics.

The "Counterweight" covered a diverse selection of topics, many relating to freedom of speech. The "Counterweight" is not a news publication; however, some articles appear to be fact-based in content while still expressing the authors' opinions.

Although The Bucknellian believes that the "Counterweight" has the right to publish the articles, we do not necessarily agree with what the articles are saying. Furthermore, there is a line that can be crossed with freedom of speech—we do not believe that the "Counterweight" has crossed that line with its most recent publication.

When publishing an opinion, both the writer and the readers have specific responsibilities. In general, writers have a freedom of speech, but at the same time must be respectful of their audience. Also, they need to make sure that they fulfill the purpose of an opinion. For example, an opinions article should cause readers to seriously consider the point of view opposite from what they are accustomed to.

Likewise, it is the responsibility of the reader to keep an open mind when reading, or even listening to, an opinion. At all times, readers must remember the reciprocal side of freedom of speech: They do not have to believe everything that they read and they do not have to read anything they do not want to read. The "Counterweight" was published with the intention to provide a convincing argument and start discussion—it did not force everyone to adapt a new point of view.

The debates over freedom of speech and the "Counterweight" clearly indicate that the University has diverse viewpoints.

The Bucknellian feels that the division on campus exists between those people who do not think the University is diverse enough and those who think it is fine. Those who do not think it is diverse enough should praise the "Counterweight" for bringing a minority perspective to the community (we are calling it a minority because few people openly express their opinion, not necessarily because conservatives are the minority). Those who do think it is diverse should praise the "Counterweight" for keeping this campus well balanced and intellectually stimulated, something that it often lacks.

The Bucknellian looks forward to future issues of the "Counterweight," "The Catalyst" and others that wish to practice their freedom of speech in a responsible manner.

Conservative speaker denied opportunity at University

To the Editor:

I received an e-mail on Oct. 1 from the University's General Counsel, Wayne Bromfield, stating that the University has defunded a speaker that the Conservatives Club is bringing to campus. The speaker in question is Thor Halvorssen, the executive director of the Foundation for Individual Rights in Education (FIRE). FIRE is a civil liberties group that works for the protection of free speech rights of students and professors across the country.

Bromfield stated that the University does "not subsidize those who threaten to sue us." He is referring to a letter that FIRE sent to University President Steffen Rogers this past August with the concern that the administration violated the rights of a member of the University community last year. Bromfield claimed that the letter sent by FIRE "contained a threat of litigation." Interestingly, Halvorssen has stressed to me, "FIRE does not litigate. FIRE has never sued any college or university." It seems to me that FIRE's executive director might know better than Bromfield whether or not his agency has ever sued a school.

The University's decision that commanded the Conservatives Club to uninvite Mr. Halvorssen not only put the club into an embarrassing situation, but also trampled upon the authority of the Bucknell Student Government Appropriations Committee, which already voted to fully fund the lecture. Why would the University, a place that supposedly upholds the value of free speech, try to prevent a lecture by someone who most certainly does?

Everyone should be asking the administration why the University is being confronted by a civil liberties group in the first place. Perhaps Bromfield's time would be better spent making sure that his fellow administrators do not violate students' civil rights instead of telling the Conservatives Club what it can or cannot do with student activity fee funds.

Sincerely,
Adam Hersperger '05

Different beliefs does not mean gay basher

To the Editor:

This is a response to Phil Martoma's Sept. 27 article.

I am a Christian that believes homosexuality is against God's will. Don't hold that against me and accuse me of being a gay-basher trying to oppress you. It's possible for me to disagree with that aspect of your life and still be civil. You started a peaceful communication with Christians that I'd like to follow up on in a respectful manner.

As a Christian, I presume you read the Bible and hold its teachings to be true above all else (2 Timothy 3:16-17). The Scriptures are very clear that man and woman were created for each other (Genesis 2:18-24). Adam and Eve were in the Garden, not Adam and Steve. How would Adam and Steve follow God's command to "be fruitful and multiply" (Genesis 1:27-28)? Even Jesus said: "Haven't you read 'that at the beginning the Creator made them male and female. For this reason a man will leave his father and mother and be united to his wife, and the two will become one flesh'? So they are no longer two, but one" (Matthew 19:4-6).

Romans 1:24-32 is quite explicit about the sin of sexual immorality. [Of course every person is sinful against God and deserves death (Romans 3:23, 6:23). Yet our sins have been paid for and we can be saved (Romans 5:8, 10:8-13)] Other Scriptures support God's intent for men to be with women, (Leviticus 18:22, Proverbs 5:18-19, 1 Corinthians 6:18-7:40, 1 Timothy 1:10).

Notably, the work of Jesus Christ demonstrates that we are not to hate one another, but "love your neighbor as yourself" (Luke 10:26-37) and show love "with actions and in truth" (1 John 3:11-24). Hate is inexcusable. God ultimately judges our souls, and therefore we are not to condemn anyone (Romans 2:1-2). Still, Christians are told to "hold firmly to the trustworthy message as it has been taught, so that you can encourage others by sound doctrine and refute those who oppose it" (Titus 1:9). The Scriptures reveal very clearly that homosexuality opposes God's plan for mankind.

Please study the Bible. Read Romans 6-8 to see how God provides a way to overcome our sinfulness. Check out the Web site http://www.answersingenesis.org and search under "homosexual" or talk to a pastor who truthfully teaches the Scriptures.

Sincerely,
John Zengel '98

"Counterweight" not welcome at multicultural meeting

To the Editor:

Last Friday, there was a meeting held discussing the latest issue of the "Counterweight" and how students were affected by it. There were administrators and faculty present, along with a host of students.

The members of the Bucknell University Conservatives Club (BUCC) were not invited because we, as a group, felt they weren't going to help in providing a positive discussion (they didn't, but I'll get into that later). Because the BUCC was there, however, we utilized this and asked questions.

Our main issue was about free speech and how it was presented in their articles. I was disturbed with the fact the blackface incident, which happened last semester and was pretty much over with, was brought up again with the overall idea that, even though people were hurt and upset by this, it was a form of free speech, and to hell with whoever was affected by it.

Emotions started to heat up due to the lack of respect by BUCC toward the students. There were no signs of emotion by any of the members, and I even caught the editor-in-chief playing with his shoe when someone was expressing (even crying) how they felt.

There were tears from anger and feelings of disrespect. One student obviously didn't understand because they showed no feelings. Others said they didn't feel safe because if one group of students felt this way, how many more are walking around on this campus?

By this point, an administrator asked the editor-in-chief, "if you could do it all over again, knowing how these students felt, would you print the publication again?" After beating around the bush for a minute or two, he responded with a "yes." At that point we felt they should leave the meeting. We (the students) asked them to leave. They did not budge, so an administrator asked them to leave. After complaining about the house (the Seventh Street House) being University-owned, they left, only to sit on the outside bench of the house.

This meeting would have been more productive without the BUCC. Their presence only caused more harm to the students who attended the meeting. As a woman of color on this campus, this has played a major role on my view of the student body. On the other hand, I could just be another complaining minority, and in need of one of those "minority crutches."

War will not achieve peace

To the Editor:

I am the president of Bucknellians For Peace (BFP). Recently, this organization has come under public attack, and there are a few misconceptions that I would like to clear up. First, it is not possible to achieve peace through war. This has been shown in many historical contexts. The Hundred Years War, World War II and Desert Storm come easily to mind. In each of these cases, violence has bred violence. I believe Gandhi put it best when he said, "There is no way to peace, peace is the way."

As a group, we were also attacked for our chalk talk a few weeks ago. It was said that we did not put forth any alternatives for the war that the Bush administration is so eager. The reason we purposely did not include alternatives is that we believe it is important to first get people's attention, and then talk to them. That way they will actually listen. Two weeks ago, BFP had a table in the LC Mall where we made it clear to many people what our alternatives are. First and foremost, use Iraq's invitation to allow weapons inspectors back. It could either confirm the accusations that the White House has been making about Iraq having weapons of mass destruction (WMD), or it could show that no, in fact they have none. If Iraqi President Saddam Hussein does prove to have WMD, the inspection teams would then continue to carry out the disarmament that they abandoned in 1998.

I would like to finish by saying that the problem relevant to the United States is not the nation of Iraq, it is Hussein. The real issue is disarmament, and that Iraq has not followed through on the U.N. resolutions regarding its WMD. However, the Big 5—the United States, Russia (then the U.S.S.R.), the United Kingdom, France and China—signed the Nuclear Non-Proliferation Treaty in 1970. This treaty stated that in 25 years, these nations would be completely disarmed and possess no nuclear weapons. In 1995, that deadline was extended indefinitely. The United States has also decided to void the Anti-Ballistic Missile Treaty it had with Russia. Here are two examples of the United States not following what it said it would do, yet there are no nations attacking us because of it. Disarmament is not something that should be limited to one nation. It is something that is vitally important for safety around the entire world.

Sincerely,
Jon Hoyle '04

Living wage issue affects real people

By Tim Hinkle
Writer

If you walk around the University campus, you are likely to see one of many different posters espousing varying political views on the living wage issue. On one side, you've got the Bucknell University Conservatives Club (BUCC), which opposes the implementation of a living wage at the University. On the other end of the spectrum, there is the Bucknell Caucus for Economic Justice (BCEJ), which fights for the living wage.

If it seems like this is just some big ideological clash between the conservatives and the liberals over some lofty political issue, you have been deceived—it is more than that. The living wage actually concerns real people here at the University. It is an issue upon which the very livelihoods of real people and real families depend greatly.

A living wage means, believe it or not, paying somebody enough money to actually live on—a wage that is "sufficient for basic nutrition, housing and other necessities."

The BCEJ estimates that somewhere around 230 employees of the University, the people who work hard all day preparing your food and cleaning up after you, are not paid a living wage. The BCEJ thinks this is ridiculous, and especially hypocritical for a university with a mission statement claiming that the University's policies should be executed with "compassion, civility and a sense of justice."

This does not ring true with a university that just spent $64 million on a new athletic center and $250,000 to renovate University President Steffen Rogers' house, installing a climate-control system in his garage for his car collection, while still not paying its staff the $10.54 an hour with benefits, calculated as the bare minimum salary needed to live and support a family here and in the surrounding area.

Since its reincarnation two years ago, the BCEJ has fought and rallied the faculty, administration and student body to approve the living wage, not because the group has something to gain politically from the campaign, but because it just seems like the decent and honorable thing to do for the people who make our lives of luxury here at the University possible.

On the other hand, BUCC is the student group that somehow finds the gall to oppose this measure. I absolutely respect the right that the BUCC has to hold its own opinions on this or any matter, but it deeply saddens me that any University student would rather continue to bathe in luxury than to pay the people who literally run this university enough to live.

If the BUCC ever, even once, in any of its refutations of the living wage campaign, mentioned the conservative economic doctrine of non-interference with market forces, then I would accept their viewpoint and politely disagree.

What is their argument you ask? The BUCC opposes a living wage so that we can have cheaper hamburgers in the cafeteria, air conditioning in the dorms and other luxuries.

Personally, I find this logic morally repugnant and downright offensive. Instead of embodying a respectable, principled political group, the Conservatives Club comes off (albeit perhaps inadvertently) like a bunch of spoiled brats who feel like complaining when they see any remote possibility of their luxury being diminished. This selfishness disgusts me, and it should disgust you, too.

When I came to the University just a few weeks ago, I was shocked to see not only that the conservatives lacked the compassion that seems to be all the rage among the conservative leadership these days, but that they opposed the living wage issue for purely self-serving reasons.

Their selfish argument and ubiquitous orange flyers so disgusted me that I decided to start my own campaign in opposition to theirs without any knowledge of the BCEJ. So if you noticed the signs around campus that read, "The BUCC does not support a living wage for the staff because we like eating hamburgers more than they deserve to feed their families," which the Conservatives Club was so quick to denounce, know that they were put there by me.

If you need any more convincing of how apathetic the Conservatives Club is regarding the conditions of the University's staff, simply read their response to my flyers on the last page of the latest "Counterweight."

I apologize for "misrepresenting" their organization, but if the Conservatives Club is so offended by the message on my flyers, I suggest they consider their own ideas pertaining to the living wage issue, which affects real people with real problems, which one far greater than a lack of air conditioning in the dorms, or putting a cheaper hamburger on your plate.

University's President's Council missing important component

By Michael Boland
Senior Writer

Through a series of incidents big and small, it has become obvious to anyone paying attention that there is a great gulf between conservatives and non-conservative "minority" students on this campus. Some minorities feel that conservatives are peddling hate speech, while conservatives are convinced that some minority students—and their allies in the faculty and administration—are out to censor them and their unfashionable ideas. More dialogue would be constructive, but what's lacking is the proper forum for that dialogue. My humble suggestion as a reasonable starting point would be to give campus conservatives a seat on the President's Multicultural Council.

According to its Web site, the council exists to "serve as a voice for Bucknell minority students and students of color." Depending on what the council means by "minority," one could easily argue that conservatives are, in fact, a "minority," in that they are a small subset of the student body with a unique perspective on campus and world events. But one doesn't even have to accept this reading of the word "minority" to see why campus conservatives deserve a seat.

According to the Article 2, Section 1 of the council's constitution, the "constituents" of the President's Council are "individual multicultural organizations," which would seem to put this body outside of the reach of a group like the conservatives. After all, conservatives define their membership not by who they are by birth, but what they believe about the world around them.

The only problem with this argument is that the current membership of the President's Council includes other groups that define their membership exactly the same way. The President's Council Web site lists Sirens as a member, even though Sirens is a campus group that exists to raise awareness of "women's issues." It is open to both men and women.

Sirens defines itself not by who the members are, but by what they believe about how the world should be. The same could be said for FLAG & BT, another council member. That's fine; the President's Council has every right to define the terms of its own membership. But including a group such as Sirens broadens its own definition of "diversity" in such a way as to preclude any serious argument about whether a group of conservative students qualify.

Sirens has a vision of how the world ought to be and they engage in various activities to advance that vision; so do campus conservatives. If you classify the former as contributing to campus "diversity," then you have to agree that the latter does as well. As the inclusion of Sirens as a multicultural organization illustrates, the most useful conceptions of "diversity" take into account people's perspectives, not just the color of their skin.

The only potential obstacle to conservatives' membership on the council is Article 3, Section 2.3 of the council's constitution. It stipulates that adding a new member requires a two-thirds vote of approval by existing members. In other words, you can't just proclaim yourself "multicultural" and show up at a meeting. It's a club they have to let you join.

Given the furor over the most recent "Counterweight," it's almost certain that campus conservatives are going to ask. Their request should be granted, both in the interest of fairness, and providing a forum where conservatives and other "multicultural" students can come together, sit down to discuss calmly what the other side is doing that bothers them and, if necessary, respectfully agree to disagree on most every issue there is.

To slam the door in their face would be heavy-handed, petty and contrary to the council's own standards for membership heretofore. One might even call it, well … intolerant.

Ends don't always justify means

By Aaron Hanlon
Staff Writer

The ethos of utilitarianism rests upon the notion that all ends justify their means. According to this ethos, one ought to act in such a way that affords the greatest amount of happiness for the individual, and so, through the aggregate happiness of all individuals, the entire community. Likewise, all actions that produce suffering are immoral according to the utilitarian.

The University community is currently undergoing tremendous suffering as a result, directly or indirectly, of the conflict between viewpoints conveyed by the "Counterweight" and those of its opposition. Many of those in the latter group are calling for an end to the "Counterweight," or a drastic reformation of its current style and content. This argument is inherently utilitarian; the "Counterweight" produces suffering, therefore, it is immoral. The suffering that it produces can only be logically interpreted as an end, as causing a community to suffer is certainly not, in this case, a means of attaining some higher goal. Some have implied that those behind the "Counterweight" are indeed publishing to divide the campus through suffering. This fictitious apocryphal "higher goal of division" is a rather extreme notion that demands of anyone who adopts it an unusually bleak view of human intentions, or at least those of the conservatives on this campus.

It is ironic that I am unable to construct a utilitarian argument without mentioning the concept of intentions, as utilitarianism ultimately disregards intentions in delineating its ethos. But I have often found that, in arguing from a utilitarian standpoint, it is natural for us to ask ourselves the question; "What about intentions?" Where ends justify means, regardless of intention or methodology, we run into serious moral (or in the case of utilitarianism, amoral) dilemmas. Bombing Iraq would most likely result in happiness for many in both the United States and Iraq, but is it moral to destroy Iraqi President Saddam Hussein and possibly innocent civilians as well? Is it moral to risk the lives of American soldiers in so doing? If war in Iraq would produce the greatest amount of happiness for the world community, is war a moral action? Finally, would war in Iraq even produce the greatest amount of happiness? This last question is of extreme importance, as it introduces yet another serious flaw in the utilitarian ethos: How might we quantify happiness? Were there a mathematical formula, this might not be a problem. But in reality, it is impossible to quantify the abstract. I am not going to use this essay to speculate over the morality of these acts in question, but I do intend on using the issue of war in Iraq as a paradigm of the flaws of utilitarianism.

There are merely nuances between the deconstruction of a utilitarian argument for war in Iraq, and that of the utilitarian argument for the abolition of the "Counterweight" as it stands. Both arguments are flawed in that they disregard the very realistic and undeniably essential entity of intent, as well as the utilitarian paradox of somehow calculating the total happiness accrued to the community should the "Counterweight" be abolished or the United States decide to attack Iraq, versus the total happiness yielded should it or Iraq remain as it is, while simultaneously valuing those unknown amounts of happiness as ultimate ends.

In spite of the fact that many took offense to parts or all of the "Counterweight," the intention of those who contribute to it is not to offend. It is a publication that sets out to provide balance (hence its title) to liberal and "politically correct" ideology, and foster diversification of political ideologies on campus. Though it has had some unfavorable effects on the campus community (which are not all necessarily borne out of its rhetoric any more than the ardent means of disagreement by its opposition), banning or restricting it is immoral. This is the case because we cannot always judge an action by its effects. There is inherent value in actions themselves that are borne out of good intentions. Though many may assert that the intentions of those who publish the "Counterweight" are bad, we should all keep in mind that many of us also know nothing about the individuals behind the "Counterweight." Those who are making negative assumptions about the character and intentions of these individuals are only adding the total suffering on campus, whatever that total may be.

Dean Ferraro takes inappropriate actions

By Tom Elliott
Senior Writer

Last Thursday the new "Counterweight" came out. When Dean of Students Richard Ferraro read it, he wasn't pleased. In fact, he called leaders of the multicultural groups into his office and to discuss the articles about blackface and the "What's up, my negro" incident. The displeasure soon grew. An emergency forum was then scheduled for the following evening in the Seventh Street House. And this is when it really got interesting.

What followed was unusual. Ferraro became increasingly detached from the role you would expect of a person in such a position—acting not as a source of arbitration, but rather, as an antagonist to such efforts.

An e-mail was circulated among the members of multicultural groups, informing them of the forum. It included a small memorandum towards the end; it was requested the meeting stay on the hush-hush. The conservatives were not invited.

Now by definition, a "forum" isn't a "forum," if its merely a one-sided venting session that neglects any sort of exchanging of ideas. But as it would soon become clear, this is what was intended—in this manner, they could figure out what to do about the "Counterweight."

Some members of the Bucknell University Conservatives Club (BUCC) happen to also be members of multicultural groups. Many conservatives were interested in attending a forum that discussed the latest publication. It was obvious that it wasn't by mistake that conservatives didn't receive any invitations. Instead, three BUCC members ended up attending so they could simply sit in the back and listen. The rest were told not to come so that chances of conflict would be minimized.

The stated topics of discussion were "campus climate, effects of campus climate on targeted groups and articles in the 'Counterweight.'" The moderator, Danielle Smith, head of Multicultural Affairs, opened the forum by stating its purpose and requesting that people remain calm.

Ferraro was the first to speak. He immediately began attacking the latest "Counterweight." The article about blackface was his immediate focus; he admitted it was true that technically such expression of speech is constitutionally-protected, but then informed the participants that "it doesn't matter."

Others were quick to join in. People expressed that the various aspects of the "Counterweight" that had made them uncomfortable. Someone said the "Word on the Quad" section made him or her uncomfortable—it had been corrupted by too many white people (even though only two of the four were Caucasian). The group laughed at the BUCCers when they said they understood multicultural issues. The "Counterweight" had apparently disrupted the campus climate. A popular opinion was that the BUCC should have asked permission from the minority population on campus before printing articles dealing with race. The complaining carried on in this fashion.

It would seem, from all this, that offending students was against the student Code of Conduct. Yet this isn't the case. You can read the code in and out, yet will see absolutely nothing to this effect.

The only times the BUCC members spoke, were in defense of themselves. Between the moderator and Ferraro, no one requested that the hostility toward them be quelled. Instead, Ferraro added some of his own.

Ferraro stated that the members of the Conservatives Club take "joy of hurting others" and that the "Counterweight" was written with "malice" and the intention of hurting people. He then asked the editor of the "Counterweight," Charles Mitchell '05, that after seeing how upset people were, if would he still would have printed these articles. Mitchell felt it an unfair venue for such a question. It was pushed further, until Mitchell decided to answer, regardless of the question's propriety, and stated that yes, he would run them again. Ferraro then turned his head and said that he had expected this, and it meant Mitchell printed the "Counterweight" with the intent to hurt people. Ferraro said this even more clearly when he labeled the BUCC members in attendance, "sewers of discord."

Forum participants became upset that the conservatives were not overly apologetic, and requested that they leave. Ferraro then also asked them to leave. When Michael Boland '03, of the BUCC, questioned, "Isn't this University-owned housing?," Ferraro responded that he would call Public Safety and have him removed, if he didn't leave on his own. At this point, BUCC President Denise Chaykun '04 insisted it was best they all leave.

It would seem, from all this, that offending students was against the student Code of Conduct. Yet this isn't the case. You can read the code in and out, yet will see absolutely nothing to this effect.

Some forum participants even threatened to petition an end to the "Counterweight." And so the irony thickens.

In the Student Code of Conduct, under Category 1 Violations, it reads, "(2) Freedom of Speech. Deliberate interference with the freedom of speech of any segment of the University community." It would seem the only people who have committed a violation, are those who have signed a petition carrying an intent that clearly violates the Student Code of Conduct.

"You, as the dean of students, have a responsibility to treat all students, even those you disagree with, in a respectful and evenhanded manner. We feel that you failed to do this on Friday night, and in so doing, hurt us each deeply," Boland wrote Ferraro several days later. "You impugned our characters, with zero evidence and little if any knowledge of us as people."

Boland wasn't the only one who asked Ferraro for the specific texts in the "Counterweight" that were offensive. I, as well as others, asked the same thing. Typically, the question wasn't answered.

"I don't know how to explain to you how hurtful the last 'Counterweight' was if you can't see it, then you just can't see it," Ferraro said in an e-mail to Boland. "I am sorry that you and other staff members crashed that meeting."

Boland requested Ferraro apologize. He did not, instead asking Boland to apologize to those who were hurt.

Ferraro even said that he was sad the BUCCers were not apologetic to those who claimed to be hurting, "especially when they spoke to you so kindly." For the record, no brash statements were made on behalf of the BUCC. However, statements directed towards the BUCC included that "the members of the Conservatives Club are lucky that they were not attacked over printing what they did." Another student stated that he wanted to punch Mitchell. Another student stated that one couldn't print such articles in the inner city because they would be lynched for doing so. "Spoke to you so kindly"?

Throughout all of this, at no point was any specific text ever cited that was "malicious" in content. Yet this lack of evidence didn't stop multiple students, and the dean of students, from insulting without remorse. .

Christy's a Parents Weekend favorite

By Ken Holroyd
Writer

Tyler Kidder—The Bucknellian

The newest members of the Silhouettes show their spirit and energy before they sing at Christy's. The concert, which featured performances by Two Past Midnight, the Bison Chips and the Silhouettes, is a popular event during Parents Weekend.

"Christy's," a concert featuring the University's three a cappella groups, was held last Friday and Saturday nights to two sold-out crowds. Named after the famed alumnus and baseball hall-of-famer Christy Mathewson, "Christy's" provided audiences with humorous banter, interesting history and, of course, lively and beautiful music.

The concert kicked off with the performance by the Silhouettes, the University's all-female a cappella group. When they first came out on stage, there were only seven women—making the audience think that their numbers had dwindled considerably from last year. As they began their first song, a group of six newcomers performing expressive dance moved up the center aisle. The group became more serious during its performance, which included popular songs such as Mariah Carey's "Always Be My Baby" and LeAnn Rimes' "Can't Fight the Moonlight."

The night continued in similar style, with members of Two Past Midnight, the co-ed group, acting out a "Charlie's Angels" skit. They then performed several contemporary songs, including crowd favorites "In the End" by Linkin Park and "Eternal Flame" by The Bangles.

They were followed by the Bison Chips, the all-male ensemble, who turned Saturday Night Live's "Da Bears" skit into "Da Chips," with the other a cappella groups as the opposing teams. The Chips ended the concert with a mixture of musical styles, ranging from Guster's "Either Way" to the group's signature piece, Lou Reed's "Coney Island Baby."

"I thought the performances this year were great," Director Sara Mastrony '03, a member of the Silhouettes, said. "[We] had a lot of fun working together. We were confident and excited about our performance."

"I thought all the groups did a really good job this year," Sarah Mayson '03 said. "I enjoyed listening to their new songs."

All-male cast to explore relationships

"Glengarry Glen Ross" depicts the struggles of real estate agents in a money-oriented world

By Melinda Kummer
Senior Writer

"Glengarry Glen Ross," an independently produced play, is the product of the work of seven University men. Wanting to create an acting forum for themselves, Adam Ahuja '05, Jason Cherok '05, T. Patrick Halley '05, Adam Hargus '03, Alex McCausland '03, Mike Moran '03 and Timothy Grant Wojton '03 will present the contemporary show on the stage of the Harvey Powers Theatre on Oct. 12-13 at 8 p.m.

Set in the 1980s, "Glengarry Glen Ross," written by David Mamet, explores the intricate relationships between men and how these relationships fall apart when their focus becomes money. The all-male cast members transform into real estate agents worshiping the almighty dollar. The main character, Shelley Levene (Hargus), is an older real estate agent struggling to survive in the newer, younger and crueler world of business.

The cast described the essence of the show using such adjectives as "backstabbing" and "two-faced." Moran said the purpose of the play is to reveal the "brutal reality of the cutthroat lives led by real estate agents" who live by the motto, "always be closing."

Self-producing a show proved to be a unique experience for each cast member. Ahuja said that the small cast lent itself to a unity that he had not encountered before in his theater career at the University.

"I never participated in theater due to my involvement in sports," Cherok said. "When I got hurt, it opened the door to theater. I've enjoyed exploring the stage."

"'Glengarry Glen Ross' has been a refreshing change of pace in that I was able to approach a production outside of the strict confines of the department," Halley, a theater major, said.

"The show is perfectly cast," Hargus said. "And it's just us—we're making it happen. I cherish this opportunity."

"After so much improv and comedic acting, it's fulfilling to act dramatically for the sake of presenting a meaningful view to the audience and having the opportunity to work on my own technique," said Moran, president of We Brake for Nobody, the University's comedy improv group.

The show is meant to be an intense look into the emptiness that a lack of integrity and morals in a business environment produces. The cast members learned more than their lines and themes of the play during rehearsals. They also felt a deep satisfaction and developed a strong bond through working together.

"They're dedicated," stage crew member Jen Sloan '04, said.

Due to the inclusion of adult language and themes, parents are warned that the show may be inappropriate for children. Tickets will be available at the door or in the Langone Center Mall for $1.

Orchestra concert invigorating

By Kang Tchou
Senior Writer

The University orchestra treated road weary parents to a delightful evening of music during parents' weekend . The performance, held in the Weis Center last Friday, began with an overture highlighting the talents of the entire ensemble and continued with three solos showcasing individual talents of the senior class. The concert came to a rousing conclusion with the ever-popular theme from the film "Titanic."

Conductor and Associate Professor of Music Christopher Para opened the evening with the overture to "Semiramide" by Gioacchino Rossini. Like other works by Rossini, the composer's love of life and robust, jovial nature carry over into his composition. The overture was comprised of what Rossini considered the best tunes in opera, and he filled the composition with waves of his famous crescendo. The audience was hammered by undulating waves of music until it was overwhelmed by the gradual buildup to the climax.

Students liked this opening to the performance.

"This was such wonderful music that it reminded me of how much I love classical music," Taylor Chase '05 said.

The evening continued with Neal Lutz performing an alto saxophone solo accompanied by the orchestra. He chose the Concerto for Alto Saxophone and String Orchestra by Alexander Glazunov. This piece reflects the mixed influences of Glazunov's Russian homeland, as well as influences of France, where this piece was composed. This concerto was certainly a treat for the audience because it is rare that the alto saxophone has its moment in the limelight. Lutz shined under the attention from the audience and showed the variety of voices of his instrument, filling the music hall with notes ranging from the mellow to the sensual.

Rachel Crane followed up with a performance of Samuel Barber's Concerto for Violin and Orchestra, Op. 14. This is one of Barber's representational works that displays the composer's romantic style and keeps true to his love of the use of tonality in his compositions. Crane gave a superb performance that showed both her expertise on the violin and her ability to take advantage of the accompanying orchestra.

The final soloist was Daniel Sitomer, who performed Carl Maria von Weber's Concertino in E flat major for Clarinet and Orchestra, Op. 26. After just a few notes, the audience was mesmerized by the artist's mastery of both his clarinet and the intricacies in Weber's composition. Sitomer amazed the audience with his dexterity in playing the clarinet and the amount of individual expression that he accomplished while remaining faithful to the composer's intention for the piece.

Julia Woodard '05 and her parents enjoyed Sitomer's performance.

"We loved the last solo; his performance certainly allowed us to appreciate the clarinet as an individual instrument but it also showed us how wonderful it can be as a solo instrument leading an accompanying orchestra," Woodard said.

The evening finished with a romantic rendition of the major themes from the movie "Titanic." The final piece began with "Take Her to Sea, Mr. Murdoch" and ended with the now famous love tune "My Heart Will Go On." This familiar tune displayed the orchestra's full musical potential. The superb performance by the members of the orchestra allowed parents and students to leave the Weis Center soothed, refreshed and ready for the exciting weekend to come.

BOOK REVIEW

Alice Sebold's first novel, "The Lovely Bones," has been a bestseller on The New York Times book list for over 13 weeks. Since the success of this book, Sebold has taken on the task of writing a memoir, entitled "Lucky," now fourth on the best-selling non-fiction list.

"Lucky" is Sebold's account of being brutally raped and assaulted at the end of her first year at Syracuse University. She calls the book "Lucky" because after the rape and beating, police told her that, in comparison to the another young girl who was killed in the same tunnel in which Sebold was raped, she should consider herself lucky.

For most of the book, Sebold does not think of herself as lucky. She suffered a severe beating to the face and, even more harrowing, a loss of innocence, as she was a virgin at the time the rape took place. Fortunately, she does not keep quiet about her rape as she promised her rapist, who told her, "You're going to have a baby, b—-h. What are you going to do about it?"

Sebold chooses to be vocal about what happened to her, in part because she wanted to catch her rapist and see him punished for committing this horrifying act, and also because it was a way for her to heal. At one point in the memoir, she tries to describe the rape in detail to her mother, who can barely stand to hear more than a few words. Although her parents were supportive of her, it was difficult for them to hear about their 18-year-old daughter being forced to commit sodomy.

Sebold tells her story with a searing honesty and an observant eye. Her memory serves her well here, and she recalls what Thomas Wolfe, author of the memoir "This Boy's Life" and one of her professors at Syracuse, told her when he learned that she'd located her rapist five months after the rape.

"Alice, a lot of things are going to happen and this may not make much sense to you right now, but listen," Wolfe said. "Try, if you can, to remember everything."

Sebold's memoir is an obvious example of following Wolfe's advice, for the details in which she describes her journey from rape victim to survivor are illuminating.

"Lucky" is undoubtedly a brave book, one that proves Sebold's determination and success as a writer and as a person. Despite its disturbing subject matter, it is an inspiring, courageous memoir that readers can walk away from stunned and satisfied.

Downtown store is unique

The Magpie, a gallery-style store, is a great place to find a one-of-a-kind gift and enjoy a cultural escape

The Magpie is a small gallery-style shop located on Market Street in Lewisburg. The store has been open for less than a year but has already made much progress and change. The Magpie is the perfect place to shop for that unique present, one-of-a-kind collectable or even just to window shop.

The store, which opened last December, has been successful and has also been supported by other local businesses and patrons. The Magpie offers an escape from regular shopping. It allows shoppers to find a unique present and to enjoy a cultural escape.

The Magpie is unique in the fact that owners Paula Swett and Beth Aten began by displaying their art and selling individual pieces, but soon featured pieces by other artists. The store now shows works from artists all over the area and continues to have new artists come in and ask for the inclusion of their work. The store sells a variety of pieces, including clothing, scarves, bowls, plates, jewelry, paintings and mobiles, all of which are handmade and one-of-a-kind.

One outstanding quality of the store is that it is fun to walk around in. It is also nice to admire the work and dedication that the artists put into their pieces. This area has so many talented artists who, until now, may not have had access to a gallery that would display and sell their works.

The newest piece that the Magpie is promoting is a handmade pillow that incorporates pictures, which are scanned and then sewn onto it. This creates a scrapbook on a practical pillow. That way you can look at your pictures and have a throw pillow—a great gift for a student going abroad or for your family at home who won't stop calling.

The Magpie also offers a variety of workshops and classes that are held at the store and conducted by one of the many local artists. The next workshop is on Sunday, Oct. 27, on Suminagashi marbling.

American continues dominance with 3-0 win

By Tara Utchel
Senior Writer

The men's soccer team suffered a 3-0 loss to 13th-ranked American University on Sunday, Oct. 6. Bucknell had a few chances to score, but allowed the American offense to capitalize on a few mistakes. The score did not reflect Bucknell's talent. They were facing one of the top programs in the nation.

"American is 3-0 in the Patriot League and 10-2 overall, playing one of the toughest non-conference schedules in the country," Head Coach Brendan Nash said.

Unfortunately for the Bison, it was American's day to win. The Bison gave the defending Patriot League champs a run for their money, but did not play to their full potential.

"I feel that we can play much better than we showed on Sunday. This game is not indicative of how we feel we are as a team," Greg Buzzell '05 said. "We had a couple letdowns that resulted in goals that were very disheartening. I know we will bounce back."

American scored its first goal of the afternoon in the 16th minute of the game. Larry McDonald and Andrew Herman connected an airborne pass, which sailed over the Bucknell defensive line. Herman received the ball ahead of the Bucknell defender and then scored to the right of Bucknell's goalie, Adam Edwards '06.

"American was able to capitalize on our mistakes. All three goals were the result of a breakdown we made on our half of the field. [They are] very talented on offense and can create many chances. We did not help ourselves by creating some chances for them."
—Brendan Nash, head coach

The Orange and Blue had chances to tie the game, but were unable to capitalize on their opportunities. In the 58th minute, Scott Visnic '06 took a shot from outside the box, only to be robbed by the diving American goalkeeper, Michael Behonick. Ori Adrabi '05 collected the rebound, but his shot was also denied by Behonick.

A minute after Bucknell's scoring attempts, American counterattacked and retaliated with the second goal of the game. Herman received another air ball, drew Edwards off his line and then shot it into the net. American sealed the game in the 66th minute with its third goal.

Bucknell fought well, but the American offense was able to punish the Bison's defense for some of its mistakes in the backfield.

"American was able to capitalize on our mistakes. All three goals were the result of a breakdown we made on our half of the field," Nash said. "We have not been making many mistakes back there, let alone paying for them. American is very talented on offense and can create many chances. We did not help ourselves by creating some chances for them."

The defeat was Bucknell's second Patriot League loss, but was only its only second loss overall. The 8-2-1 record of the 2002 season is the program's best start in decades. Despite these two crucial losses, the Bison still have the chance to make the league playoffs.

Bucknell's next match is at Sacred Heart at 2 p.m. on Sunday, Oct. 13.

The Bucknell women's soccer team snapped a three-game losing streak on Oct. 6 as it tied Robert Morris 3-3 in double overtime. Bucknell's overall record went to 5-4-1 following the game.

It took only nine minutes for Robert Morris to get on the board. The Bison quickly responded and in the 22nd minute Meghann Chipko '05 evened the game up at one apiece. She was relieved that everything the team had worked on at practice had come together.

"Coach had been saying before the game for the outside hash to saw the ball back to people running at the goal," Chipko said. "I was in the right place at the right time. It seemed like everything that coach had been saying came together. I would say that we knew that someone needed to step up and I was fortunate enough to be the one to do it."

When Ashley Dincher '05 scored in the 31st minute, Bucknell took a lead 2-1 into the half. Chipko thought that the Dincher goal was an indication that the team would take ultimate control of the game. Outstanding plays by Robert Morris kept the Orange and Blue from achieving this goal.

"We were dominating the game, and when Ashley scored we really felt like we would win the game, but they had some amazing shots that there was nothing we could do about," Chipko said.

When Tara Utchel '03 tallied her fourth goal of the season in the 55th minute, the Bison looked to be cruising to a victory. Just three and a half minutes later Robert Morris cut the lead to 3-2 with a goal. With about one minute remaining in regulation, a clutch goal by Robert Morris's Angela Story from outside the box tied the game at 3. Utchel expressed her disappointment that the team squandered its lead, but she remained optimistic about the offense returning to life.

"We were up 3-1 and we really thought we were going to pull it away," Utchel said. "It was disappointing that we didn't win, but on the other hand, we scored three goals, which we hadn't done in a while. We solved our scoring problem, but I guess that wasn't enough to win. We have been having a problem connecting passes to each other, losing the ball in the midfield when we shouldn't and we are not executing all the simple aspects of the game. If we can put the simple things together I think we will be able to do well."

Emily Keber '03 expressed her frustration as well, but she is optimistic about the positives that emerged from the tie.

"It was frustrating because we were really happy because we hadn't scored in a while," Keber said. "It felt like we were out of our rut of losing until they tied it up. I guess you can look at it positively that we did score and we didn't lose. I think the last shot was unfortunate and so that was a letdown, but to not give up any goals in overtime showed that we can stop people, we just need to have that mindset throughout the game."

Through two grueling overtime periods, both defenses indeed took over and the game concluded with an even score.

Utchel tallied 13 shots on the day, while Chipko had seven attempts herself. The Orange and Blue outshot the Colonials by a lopsided 43-14 margin.

Bison take 13-10 OT loss in Patriot League opener

By Cory Nadler
Senior Writer

The Bucknell football team lost its second overtime match-up of the year on Saturday in a defensive struggle against league rival Colgate. Wide receiver Jim Horan '04 garnered player of the game honors, hauling in four passes for 68 yards and a touchdown in the 13-10 losing effort.

From the looks of the first few drives of the game, it seemed as though this grudge match would end in a scoreless tie. Finally, on the last drive of the first quarter, Colgate began to move the ball. The team drove down the field, going 80 yards in eight plays, and the scoring drive was capped off by a 25-yard touchdown pass to give the Raiders a 7-0 lead at the end of the first quarter.

On the ensuing drive, the legs of running back Blamah Sarnor '06 and the arm of quarterback Todd Wenrich '03 combined to move the Bison into the Colgate red zone. After going 74 yards in 14 plays and chewing up over six minutes off the clock, the Bison had to settle for a 22-yard field goal by Chris Lundberg '03 to make the score 7-3 early in the second quarter. Both defensive units took over for the remainder of the first half and the Bison went into the locker room with a 7-3 deficit.

The Bison took the ball first in the second half, but were unable to produce any points. On Colgate's first possession of the half, Anthony Lewis '05 forced a fumble following a Raider reception, and Mike Leatherman '04 picked it up and ran 15 yards to the Colgate 23-yard line. On the next play, Wenrich connected with Horan for a 23-yard touchdown pass to give the Bison a 10-7 lead with nine

Women place first at Gulden Invitational

Sunny skies and mild temperatures welcomed eight teams to Lewisburg for the second annual Gulden Cross Country Invitational, including 19th-ranked Central Michigan on the men's side and division II power Indiana University of Pennsylvania (IUP) on the women's side. Bucknell's women's team used strong pack running to win the meet, while the men's team was once again troubled by inconsistency, resulting in a third-place finish.

The Lady Bison, with 33 points, handily defeated their nearest competition, IUP, with 68 points, which was last ranked 12th in NCAA division II. Theresa Dennis '03 led the team with her third-place effort. Although IUP's top runner won the individual title, a 13-second spread from the Bison's second to fifth runners gave Bucknell the team trophy.

"Theresa ran her best race of the season and we had a pack of five ladies running together for the first three miles and moving up in their placing minutes remaining in the third quarter.

The Bison defense held the Raiders for the remainder of the third quarter. On its first possession of the fourth quarter, Colgate made its way down the Bison 3-yard line.

Bucknell's red zone defense continued to play strong and forced the Raiders to settle for a game-tying field goal from 20 yards out. The score was tied at 10 with exactly nine minutes remaining in regulation.

Following a Wenrich interception, the Bison defense was put to the test yet again when a defensive holding penalty kept the next Colgate drive alive. The Bison forced a Colgate punt. Frank Lazio '05 capitalized on a bad snap and blocked the punt, which was recovered by Jared Marsilio '04 at the Bucknell 49-yard line.

Three plays later, Wenrich fumbled the ball and it was recovered by Colgate at the Raider's 27-yard line. Colgate moved the ball well into Bison territory, but Adam Minggia '03 picked off a Colgate pass at the Bucknell 10 yard line. The Bison could not capitalize on the turnover and were forced to punt.

The Raiders moved the ball 39 yards in six plays, to the Bucknell 21-yard line. With five seconds remaining in the game, the Raiders had a 38-yard field goal attempt to win the game. Joe Massey '03 surged through the line and partially blocked the kick to send the game into overtime.

"I just got lucky; we got a good push up front and I got the hands up," Massey said.

Bucknell had the first try in the extra period and was able to move the ball to the Colgate 9 yard line, thanks to a 20-yard pass from Wenrich to Horan on a third down and long play. Wenrich finished the day completing 17 of 32 passes for 204 yards and one touchdown. The Bison were not able to punch the ball into the end zone and Lundberg came on to attempt a 26-yard field goal. A poor snap led to Lundberg's kick coming up short.

"The ball never really got placed down properly. Chris never got a chance to kick it," Head Coach Dave Kotulski said.

Colgate was able to move to ball to the Bucknell 7-yard line during its overtime possession. The Raider's kicker came on and knocked through a 24-yard field goal to give Colgate a 13-10 victory and drop the Bison record to 2-3 so far this season and 0-1 in the Patriot League.

It was obvious that these two teams were very evenly matched on Saturday afternoon.

"We are very similar football teams, we play good defense and like to run the ball," Colgate Head Coach Dick Biddle said.

"It's a great rivalry, both teams pride themselves on being physical football teams," Kotulski said.

The Bucknell defense was impressive for the fifth straight weekend, keeping a powerful Colgate team to just 13 points.

"We did well up front, and battle on every down," Massey said.

"The kids played their hearts out, but they made more plays than we did at the end," Kotulski said.

The Bison offense moved the ball effectively throughout the game as well, but were unable to capitalize when they needed to.

"We expected to have difficulty, and they caused some problems for us," Kotulski said. "They came at us from a lot of different directions, their scheme was a little different than what we saw."

After a bye week this weekend, the Bison travel to Towson University on Saturday, Oct. 19.

"We still have six Patriot League games to play, and now we have to get ready for Towson," Kotulski said.

Adam Edwards '06

By Josh Herwitt
Writer

Though just 18 years old, the presence of Adam Edwards '06 in goal has contributed largely to the success of the Bucknell soccer team. His outstanding play has made a huge impression on teammates, coaches and soccer fans alike.

Edwards grew up in Downingtown, Pa., a typical suburban area, located 30 miles southwest of Philadelphia. Edwards began playing soccer at the age of six and moved to goalkeeper around the age of nine.

Attending a large, public high school with a graduating class of 642, he earned four varsity letters in soccer as well as an array of other team and individual awards, including back to back PIAA AAA High School State Championships (1998 and 1999 seasons), Adidas/NSCAA High School All-American, 2001 Philadelphia Inquirer Player of the Year, Daily Local News Player of the Year and ChesMont League MVP.

Courtesy of The Bucknell Online Directory

Edwards has already become a staple of Bison soccer.

High school and college have different levels of play and focus on academics.

"Play at the college level is much faster than high school," Edwards said. "The players are much more physical and stronger than those at the high school level. The stress placed on academics is much greater as well."

Even with this new pace on the field and expectation inside the classroom, having Edwards in goal has strengthened the Bison defense.

"Adam's play this year has been outstanding and is a huge factor in our success so far this season," Michael Lookingland II '05 said. "He has come up with many key saves. He also brings good leadership, nobody looks at him as being a freshman and he has already matured a lot and will definitely be one of the leaders of this program for years to come. It's great to have someone in goal that you have confidence in, and you know can come up with some great save when it counts."

Edwards said there are many significant factors that have led to a successful season so far.

"The key to the team's success, in my opinion, has been our hard work," Edwards said. "It was apparent from the beginning of preseason that our team was intense. We take pride in our fitness and our hard work and hope that when we play a team with better skill than us, we will be able to outwork them."

Through this hard work, the defense has recorded seven shutouts out of the 10 games this season.

Edwards' outstanding performance in goal has many noticing him already as one of the best goalkeepers. He was named Rookie of the Week twice and been nationally listed with the third-lowest average for goals allowed.

"Adam has solidified our [defense] this year. Right now Adam is getting a lot of attention. Other teams talk about his presence in goal," Head Coach Brendan Nash said. "Adam is big, strong and very confident during a game. Each time he goes out there he expects to win and get a shutout. His confidence is now starting to branch out to the rest of the team. We feel very comfortable with Adam in goal and feel like we have a pretty good present and an even better future with him."

With these awards comes the pressure of maintaining a certain caliber of performance. Being a first-year student and playing in goal has definitely brought Edwards attention as well as pressure to perform at this high level. Edwards said that he credits his defense for relieving some of this pressure.

"I do feel there is pressure being a freshmen goalkeeper, but there's always pressure on the goalkeeper," he said. "However, the defense has been playing exceptionally well and that has helped take pressure off of me. They are often overlooked when it comes to statistics and the likes."

With Edwards' presence in goal and the defense's strong performance, it could be very difficult for any team to score on the Bison this season.

Field Hockey shuts out Lehigh

By Ashley Hall
Writer

The Bucknell field hockey team shut out Lehigh 2-0 on Saturday, Oct. 5, bringing its overall record to 5-6, and 2-2 in Patriot League play. This was the second shutout for goalie Sonja Wettergreen '03, who stopped five shots.

The game was scoreless until the final nine minutes when Cara Turner '05 scored her first goal this year with 8 minutes, 56 seconds left in the half. Amy Marvel '03 scored the next goal off a penalty corner with only 33 seconds left to play, putting Bucknell ahead by two before the half. Bucknell had 15 penalty shots this game, while Lehigh had six.

"Saturday was an awesome game. I think it was one of the first games recently that the team has gone out with such intensity and drive," Turner said. "I just want to make sure the team keeps going out strong the rest of the season, as we have been, so that we get a chance to play in the Patriot League Championship."

The Lady Mountain Hawks of Lehigh were outshot 23-7 in the match. Only one of these shots was allowed in the first half, in comparison to Bucknell's 15 shots before the break. Lehigh keeper Jeanine Hoff had 14 saves overall, with 11 of them in the first half.

"Our win over Lehigh was critical in our being able to stay alive in the league. More importantly though, it was a great confidence builder for our entire team to get a big win over a Patriot League school," Marvel said. "We played hard for 70 minutes and battled the entire time. The win felt so good and we are going to take this positive energy into the rest of our games."

This win for the Bison in Patriot League play brings Bucknell's record to 2-2 in the league and 5-6 overall.

Following the victory was a Tuesday-night showdown with tough competitor Penn State. The 6-ranked Nittany Lions proved to be a handful for Bucknell, as they ran away from the Bison in an 8-0 victory.

Five of Penn State's eight goals came about in the first half, while the Bison did not manage any shots in the opening portions of the game. Although they still couldn't score against the potent Penn State defense, the Orange and Blue did manage three shots in the second half. Kirstin Nilsen '06 was responsible for two of them, while Meiko Boynton '05 took the other. Wettergreen had 11 saves during her time in the net.

While the final score was not exactly what the team wanted, the game was a valuable experience for the Bison, as many of the younger players got a chance to go up against a top-10 team for the first time.

The Bison fell to 5-7 with the loss, but did not scar their .500 Patriot League record.

The Lady Bison hope to return to their winning trend at home against Quinnipiac this weekend. Game time is at 7 p.m. on Friday, Oct. 11.

Fortune from hell; match made in heaven

Gene Mauch must be proud. After all, this year's American League Championship Series will be contested by two franchises he once managed during his infamously tumultuous reign over the world of misfortune. Some people say that Mauch was cursed. If that's true, then perhaps it would be accurate to say that some of his damnation flaked off onto the Twins and the Angels.

When it comes to the Anaheim Angels, foul luck has nestled itself deep beneath the languid roots that constitute the team's past. For the Minnesota Twins, misfortune is infesting and suffocating the bright green buds that were once poised to bloom into the franchise's future.

One team has a past from hell; one has a future of nightmares. It's difficult to decide which team's circumstances cry out the most for salvation.

The Angels' miscues began in 1982, when they squared off with the Milwaukee Brewers in the five-game ALCS. The outlook was bright for Mauch's crew after the first two games, which the Angels won 8-3 and 4-2. With a 2-0 lead in the series, all they had to do was win one game out of the next three. One victory, and the California Angels would have been exalted to World Series status for the first time in their 22 years of existence. But this was Gene Mauch's team—the same Gene Mauch whose 1964 Phillies dropped a six-and-a-half game lead in the National League pennant race in the last 12 games of the season, largely in part to a stupefying 10-game losing streak.

The Angels did their best Phillies impression during the final three games of the 1982 ALCS, dropping all three and shutting themselves out of a World Series berth. They put the corks back on the champagne and crawled away with their tails between their legs.

They were back, Mauch and all, in 1986. This time around, they'd be facing the Boston Red Sox, a team that was the undisputed champion of bad breaks, close losses and embarrassing downfalls. Surely no team could be more adept at bungling guaranteed victories in the final moments than the Red Sox. Surely no one could out-fumble them at their own specialty.

Well, the 1986 Angels managed. This time they had another juicy lead—three games to one—on their table and, again, they'd need to win just one of the final three contests. Still reeling from the 1982 incident, California took care of business early in 1986. Almost.

In an eventful game five, the Angels were ready to barge into the World Series, and this time the celebration couldn't possibly be premature. They had a 5-2 lead going into the ninth inning, and a lot of reason to believe they could keep it. Maybe things got a little shaky when Don Baylor lobbed off a home run to drag the Red Sox within one run, but relief pitcher Donnie Moore seemed to get things back on track against Dave Henderson. Two outs, two strikes. Now all the Angels needed was one pitch to get to the Series.

Instead, Moore gave up two runs. Henderson awkwardly dunked the pitcher's forkball over the left-field fence, and just like that, all hell broke loose for the Angels. They offered one last flicker of hope with a one-run rally in the bottom of the inning to send the game into extra innings, but Henderson had a little misery left to inflict upon the battered Angels, winning the game with a sacrifice fly in the 11th inning.

Sure, the Angels had two more games during which they could feasibly win the series. But it was too late. Their wings were shattered, their halos crushed; the next two games were simply a long, slow death for California. Then they went back home, losers again, and left the suffering to the Red Sox.

Since then, the Angels have been moved to Anaheim and purchased by Disney, a company that owns the market on happy endings and everything else. Mauch is long gone; Mike Sciosia now holds the steering wheel. For the Angels, optimism is poking its way through the dark clouds that line the past.

Amazingly enough, though, the Angels may not be the most desperate team competing for the American League pennant this year. For the Twins, it's the future—or lack thereof—that puts a damper on the team's accomplishments. The franchise, which has been a part of Minnesota since 1961 and a part of the American League since its inception, is one of two that has been scheduled for execution, a.k.a. contraction.

Sure, the Twins made it to and won the World Series twice in the past 15 years, and, despite the overall abysmal background from their Washington Senators days, they haven't exactly experienced the unpleasant twists of fate that the Angels have endured. They've made up for it in the past year, though. The 2002 season, for the Twins, was simply 162 days of borrowed time, and you can bet they'll try to scrape every last game from their rapidly evaporating lifeline.

So who deserves to win this battle of the bruised? Who is more desperately in need of deliverance? The Twins have had their day in the sun, but then again, the Angels will at least survive to see another sunrise. It's almost impossible to decide which team the almighty whims of justice ought to swing in favor of.

That these two teams should end up squaring off in the ALCS is so improbable that it's a bit benumbing. It's hard to say which is worse: a past of blunders and blown opportunities or a future of haunting irresolution.

Either way, in 2002, one team's painful past combined with another's bleak future has oddly produced a perplexingly enjoyable present.

Thus spake Zarathustra

So I really took a pounding in my predictions last week. I haven't seen picks that horrendous since the casting for "Lake Placid." Let's get one thing straight, Bill Pullman's career ended after "Spaceballs": stop hiring that man. Besides, who would have thought the Yankees would go down faster than pets.com stock and that the Minnesota Kontraction-Kids would survive against an Oakland pitching staff that has more notches on its belt than the "Ladies Man" and the Kennedys combined?

Now before I go into some real, cutting edge, original and insightful analysis of the teams still in the hunt, I want to address some rumors I heard about the remaining teams and the economics of baseball. People have been saying that the success of these low payroll teams proves that money has no effect on the success of a team. To you people, I implore that you not be ignorant followers of conservative-minded corporate goons who like to spread lies with the frequency of a cheap ham radio. Money still remains one of the central diseases that preys on major-league baseball.

I don't claim that the Yankees buy championships, but I would claim it buys them a dynasty. I don't think that anyone will say that if you put down $4 million a game, you're going to win it bar none, save maybe Pete Rose. But the important distinction that I'm drawing here is between a dynastic team and a winning team. The New York Yankees fall under the former category, the Oakland Athletics under the latter. New York is the Ming Dynasty to Oakland's Deng Xiaoping. The Yankees monetary flexibility allows them to resign the players they want and to keep their team intact as they see fit.

Now, for stingier teams, this isn't an option. When Miguel Tejeda's, Tim Hudson's and Barry Zito's contracts expire and the Oakland front office refuses to pay their high asking prices, you will see this team collapse with the rapacity and frenetic diligence of a coke-addicted squirrel the morning before the winter solstice, causing a team-wide evacuation the likes of which haven't been seen since Chernobyl. When Giambi left, they lost a key component, but certainly not everything. Rest assured, if a team can't make high salary commitments to elite players like Tejada and Mulder, they can't succeed. A good team balances youth and experience.

These teams may have successful years, and indeed may win the Series, but where will they be in three years? Pumping gas outside outside Texaco with Uni-brow, the lazy-eyed squeegee operator with an affinity for raspberry swizzle sticks and putting his hands up a muffler, that's where.

Now this argument is NOT a condemnation of the Yankees (or other upper payroll teams). This is merely to prove that Minnesota, Oakland and Anaheim may have successful years, and indeed may win the Series, but where will they be in three years? Pumping gas outside outside Texaco with Uni-brow, the lazy-eyed squeegee operator with an affinity for raspberry swizzle sticks and putting his hand over the end of the muffler, that's where.

Just to elucidate this point a little better, out of the 16 teams in the top half of payrolls, 10 of those teams had winning records this season. Out of the 16 teams in the bottom half of payrolls, only three had winning records, those teams being Oakland, Minnesota and the Montreal Expos (and two of those teams are contraction candidates). Now try to tell me money has no effect on the competitive balance of the game.

Anyway, I think I've said my piece and I'll thank you very much not to get me all riled up like that again. Before I get into the matchups I just want to make vividly clear my intense and utter dislike for Barry Bonds. I do not know where this animosity began, nor do I care. It has become a perfectly healthy eccentricity. Perhaps it is because of his truculence with the media, his suspected steroid usage, his one-man-team philosophy, his easy-to-manage hairstyle or his thick, humongous bat that would be enough to make Ron Jeremy's face go green with envy. Regardless of my reasoning, I plan on continuing this resentment until either he retires or his team wins.

Now with that said, let us point the critical magnifying phallus at our four contestants. Vanna, who do we have this year?

The Anaheim Angels showed some great poise against the Yankees in their last series. Their offense was sparked, their pitching was on and they capitalized on miscues and a weak bullpen. No one thought they'd make it this far and the same goes for the Twins who out-dueled one of the best starting rotations in baseball. But then again, the Angels did as well. This will probably be the most exciting of the postseason serieses … eses … es.

I'm banking on some sort of quarterback controversy bringing the now-stumbling New England Patriots to an early exit … wait, baseball … right. Uh, let's saaaaay … Twins, because they wear pinstripes and October is all about pinstripes right? Yeah, the Yanks are taking credit for that too, I'm sure. Cretins.

In the NL, I couldn't think of a duller series. The Giants are uninspired and the Cardinals aren't anything to write a poem about either. I will say that Pujols has to be the coolest name in all of baseball though. It works with everything … "park your pujols right there mister," "May I have a kiwi and pujols please?" or my personal favorite, "your pujol seems to be leaking."

"I'm a great believer in luck, and I find the harder I work the more I have of it." Words spoken by a true champion, Thomas Jefferson.

There we were, out on the tennis courts for the first time in years. DT, "I want Mel," "Tillie-Me" and I trekked up past the new gymnasium, (which, by the way, has a sweet view of the swimming facilities) on our way to an important realization. While we were smashing the tennis ball over the net, it came to me that luck has EVERYTHING to do with it!

My teammate and I were the amateurs facing the seasoned vets of "I want Mel" and DT, and no matter how clever we tried to be with our drop shots and forehand line shots, there was an inexplicable force, kind of like hitting a ball against a wall, returning each and every shot back in my court in most unpleasant spots.

You see I realized that talent alone is not the deterministic force in sports at our level, but practice. Sure heart can take you so far, but the repetitive motion of practicing and polishing your skills relaxes the body under pressure situations thereby increasing your luck factor! With that in mind, who got lucky this weekend?

America's pastime is getting down and dirty with four teams left in the 2002 season. It's the misfit, "Excuse me, where is your invitation?," final four of baseball with the Anaheim Angels, Minnesota Twins, San Francisco Giants and St. Louis Cardinals representing the few and the proud.

Did you notice who will be watching from the 50-inch screen this playoff—yep, Derek Jeter, Raul Mondesi and the New York Yankees. That's right, kiddos, the Decker Effect prevailed and all $120 million-plus of the Yankees' salary couldn't break the bank to the World Series. Hmmm, makes me believe that the "Angels in the Outfield" movie was a premonition of this year!

Let's get right down to predictions for the granddaddy of them all, the World Series. Personally, I'd like to see a matchup between the Twins and Cardinals. First off, I side with the Cards because of all they have had to endure this year with the passing of pitcher Darryl Kile and announcer Jack Buck. I ran into one of my hallmates at the Bison's Subversions. When we stopped watching ESPN on the huge television, he told me that he was from St. Louis and that there was something mystical taking place there. How can you not agree with that?

The Minnesota Twins are among the four unlikely ALCS teams.

As for the Twins, well, they have simply smacked commissioner Bud Selig in the face. I mean, he tried to force baseball out of Minnesota by contracting the Twins from the major leagues, but justice prevailed and now he is sipping down the Pepto-Bismol to the tune of Fuel's "Bad Day."

The Minnesota Twins include the defensive prowess of Tori Hunter and surprise batting sensation Jacques Jones, who used his summer of hitting instruction from future hall of famer Tony Gwynn well.

To the gridiron. Another week of football and another loss for the Rams. Now I'm well aware that Catholic girls start "waaaayy" too late, but the Rams need a kick-start. Unfortunately, there is no light at the end of the tunnel with Kurt Warner out for 6-8 weeks.

The undefeated Raiders look like they are for real, and with a defense that gives the offensive a run for its money with scoring points, opposing teams are crying, "Cheaters!" The Pats are coming back to reality and the Dolphins, with newly acquired running back Rickey Williams and former Dallas Cowboy offensive coordinator Norv Turner, have orchestrated a winning combination in a city that cashed in frequent flier miles at the hand of Dan Marino for years past. And watch Bills quarterback Drew Bledsoe, who is averaging near 400 yards passing per game. If he keeps up this pace, he will set the single-season record.

Down the stretch. A Houston television station reported that Chinese basketball giant Yao Ming has signed a three-year contract with the Houston Rockets. The 7-foot-5-inch No. 1 pick in the June draft will look to fill the shoes of all-star Hakim Olajuwon. The NHL season has officially begun so turn your televisions to FOX and ESPN. Maybe we will see that red highlighted puck again!

Well, it's been a pleasure sharing with you some personal moments and update you on the major sports headlines from the week past. Until next week!

NFL Predictions

Justin McCarthy
Senior Writer
(13-12)

Pittsburgh (1-3) at Cincinnati (0-5)
The Steelers need to stop one person in order to defeat the Bengals . . . Corey Dillon. the Saints' rushing attack beat Pittsburgh last week, so they better hope they addressed that problem or they will face the consequences. Cincinnati has been blown out in all but one of their games; which bodes well for the Steelers. They are led by Tommy Maddux, who had a strong game last week, in his first start since his 1992 rookie season. The Steelers' rushing attack showed some signs of revival last week, so as long as they build on that progress, the Steelers will continue Cincinnati's victory drought.

Kansas City (3-2) at San Diego (4-1)
With all the horrible teams in the league who would think that the Chiefs at 3-2 would be last in their division? The Chiefs have been putting up sick numbers offensively, scoring the most points in the league and averaging just over 34 points a game. However, their defense is as soft as a down pillow; they are allowing just over 31 points a game, and turning any game they play into an offensive shootout. So the question is, can K.C. afford to get into a shootout with the second best defense in the AFC? NO!

Miami (4-1) at Denver (4-1)
Miami is ranked in the top 5 in many offensive categories, led by the NFL's second leading rusher, Ricky Williams. This matchup will certainly test that offensive power, going up against the AFC's leading defense. Denver held the NFL's leading rusher, LaDainian Tomlinson, to 48 yards on 14 carries last week. Expect Williams to face the same harsh defense. Both teams are coming off huge wins last week, so expect them to enter the game with lots of momentum. The Dolphins have won the last 5 meetings between these two teams, and expect that trend to continue.

Green Bay (4-1) at New England (3-2)
After starting hot, the Patriots have dropped two in a row and don't look as formidable as they once did. The Packers possess the NFC's leading offense, led by Brett Favre and supported by Ahman Green, who rank first and second in the NFC for total yardage at their respective positions. The spotlight is on ex-Patriot WR Terry Glenn, who I'm sure would love to have a huge game against the team that snubbed him last season. Flack's Patriots are going down to the Pack, cause the Pack ain't cuttin' the Patriots any slack!

San Francisco (3-1) at Seattle (1-3)
Do I even need to say anything about this game? Ok, so the Seahawks have Shaun Alexander, but the Niners have a RB duo in Hearst and Barlow that has rushed for 431 yards in its last two games. This game will be dominated by the runningbacks, but the 49ers defense will be the deciding factor, for they have allowed the fewest points in the NFL. Niners should win quite comfortably.

throughout the race," Head Coach Kevin Donner said. "They fed off of each other's energy and enabled us to easily win the team title."

When the pace heated, only Kayla Halloran '06, Niki Piper '03, Jamie Gow '03 and Alison Cole '03 were able to stay together. The foursome's effort was more than enough for the win, but Rachel Tutmaher '06 and Katie Pfeifer '05 also gave strong performances that would have compensated had the pack faltered.

"It was by far our best team race of the season," Donner said.

Although the men faced a much stiffer challenge in Central Michigan, they could have learned something by watching the effect of the pack in the women's race. Running without top runner Greg Costello '03, the men, with 58 points, fell not only to CMU (26 points), but also to Canisius (53 points).

Even though they ran below expectations as a team, many individuals performed well. Bryan Johnston '03 continued a fine season by placing third, losing only to Shawn Algiers and Shane LeBeau from CMU. Wes Rheinhart '04 rebounded nicely after a sub-par performance last week by finishing 10th and Lou Palma '03 finally broke into the top five on the team by finishing 12th. The Bison's fourth and fifth runners each had big individual days.

"We received big races from Eric Furst '04 and especially Dan Lounsbury '05," Donner said.

The season outcome of the men will largely be based on getting Costello healthy and running consistently in the second half of the season.

"We have not had a race where our projected top five have run to their potential. It seems like we always have one or two that have bad races. With the intense schedule that we are running—the inconsistencies become very exposed," Donner said.

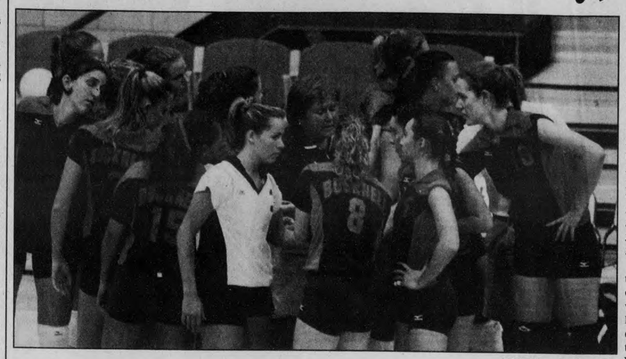
The women's future success will be based on keeping a number of injury-prone girls healthy and the synergistic effects of the pack.

The Bison travel to the Pre-National meet at Indiana State on Oct. 19. As always, this meet gives the teams a chance to see how they compare to the rest of the country and to pick up valuable at-large points should they be on the bubble for nationals at season's end.

Volleyball defeats Navy, 3-0



Eric Graham—The Bucknellian

The women's volleyball team was victorious over Navy, 3-0. It gave Navy its first Patriot League loss of the 2002 season.

The Bison volleyball team has hovered around the .500 mark the entire season, and this past week has been no exception. After being defeated by last year's Patriot League champion, American University, on Friday, Oct. 4, Bucknell rebounded to defeat Navy, 3-0. With the win over Navy, Bucknell improved to 8-8 overall and 2-2 in the Patriot League.

"I feel that if we play our game, we will be very successful in the Patriot League. We have to go into our next matches with confidence and prove to everyone how good we actually are. We have a very tough league and are going to have to play together as a team to be successful," Chelsea Anderson '06 said.

Bucknell women's volleyball was victorious over Navy, 3-0, on Saturday night and gave Navy their first Patriot League loss of the 2002 season. Melanie Ghiz '03 led the team with 15 kills and added 4 block assists for the night, while Brandi Trapasso '04 led the team in digs with 16 and added nine kills in the winning effort.

Bucknell won the first game in a close 33-31 victory. In the first game, Ghiz and Brandi Trapasso had five and four kills, respectively. In the second game, Bucknell defeated Navy 30-26, and in the third game, the Bison easily defeated Navy 30-22. Jennifer Wrigley '03 had 11 digs in the win and Breean Trapasso '04 averaged 11 assists in the match. The team worked together to make a total of 12 block assists.

On Friday night Bucknell were defeated by American University, 3-1. Brandi Trapasso led the team with 25 digs, while Jackie Leahy '05 marked 14 kills for Bucknell.

"Both American and Navy are really good teams and they have been difficult competition in the past," Anderson said. "They are the type of teams, that if we let up at all, they are going to take advantage of it."

Bucknell came out hard against American, but fell to American in the first game of the night with a score of 30-28. The Bison came back and played a tough second game which they lost by a score of 36-34. Bucknell came back and won the third game 30-27, but lost the fourth game, 30-26.

American University is the defending Patriot League champion, and the games were extremely close but the Bison were unable to come out on top. Leahy '05 led the team with 14 kills, while Wrigley and Brandi Trapasso each marked 13 kills. Ghiz completed 11 kills and four solo blocks for the Bison. Brandi Trapasso led the team with 25 digs and Anderson added 12 digs to the Bison effort.

Bucknell relied on a number of different players in their game against American. Chelsea Robertson '05 added 11 digs and Breean Trapasso added 10 digs to go with her 49 assists for Bucknell.

The Bison now hold an 8-8 overall record and are 2-2 in the Patriot League. Bucknell will face Patriot League opponent Holy Cross on Friday, Oct. 11 in Worcester, Mass., and then travels to West Point, N.Y., to face Army on Saturday, Oct. 12.

Reverse abroad perspective: Lewisburg, Pa.

By Eduardo Shinichi Maeyama
Contributing Writer

As an international student, I did not have much of a problem adapting to the new American culture that I now live in. This is probably because I have traveled a lot around the United States and have experienced the way of life and how the people are here. Even then, there were two things that were really different from my home country that have challenged me: the focus on time and the idea of living in a politically correct society.

It has been hard for me to adapt to the strict concern over political correctness. It is a really strange thing to see people trying to be politically correct about sex, race, class, economic opportunity and so many other things all the time. From an extremist view it seems like everyone in this society is paranoid about speaking appropriately.

After analyzing this concept, I agree that it is good to be politically correct. As I come from a country where this idea of political correctness is not highlighted, it sometimes seems really weird and uncomfortable.

Many times it just seems that people are complicating things too much when they try to make an argument or a statement in an acceptable manner.

This has become a challenge to me, as back in Paraguay I had almost no boundaries or limits in the things I could or would say. Coming from a society where people speak without any real concern for being sued for not being politically correct, it was quite an effort to get used to censoring my statements. I am still not completely used to this concept, but I am trying and learning to be as correct as possible.

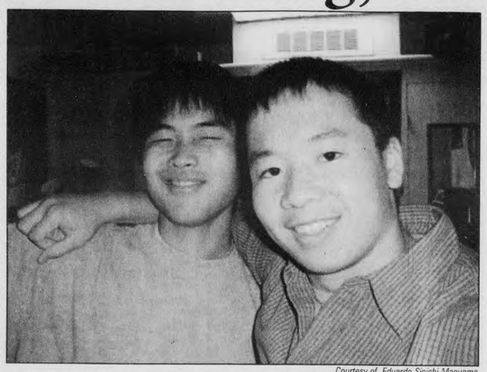
The second thing that has challenged me in this new environment is the different idea of time. Since I was young, I have heard the saying "time is money," but I never learned or cared to know what the real meaning and importance of this saying was until I came to study at the University.

Courtesy of Eduardo Sinichi Maeyama

Maeyama (far right) and his first-year hallmates live in Smith Hall. Originally from Paraguay, Maeyama adjusts to the American culture.

Living in South America, time was relatively important, but in most cases activities were done in a manner where time was less of a concern. In other words, things were done in a laid-back way. We took our time and did things in a much more relaxed manner. An extreme example that represents this is how people scheduled events. If events were scheduled for 9 p.m., people started to come at about 10-10:30 p.m., and events were often extended about an hour or two from its scheduled ending time.

The change from an environment where time was of secondary importance to an environment where everything is strictly reliant on time was a big leap. The University, and probably U.S. society, show the other side of the coin where time management is concerned. On campus, I have strict schedules and programs.



Courtesy of Eduardo Sinichi Maeyama

Eduardo Shinichi Maeyama '06 (left) taking a break with a fellow University student. Maeyama has learned the value of time in American culture.

Often, when I have to follow these schedules, I feel rushed trying to do something, even while eating my meals. Every day, my daily plans have to take into consideration the time that things take (classes, homework, exercise, social life, food, sleep, shower, etc.) in order to pack them in and be able to manage my time and accomplish everything.

As part of this school's demanding engineering program, I have to be especially organized when planning my day. In certain ways, I have become very cheap about time. I am always pressured and concerned about doing things, and often find myself looking at my watch, making sure that I am not taking too much time in that activity.

People seem so stressed by time in this society that many times I think to myself, "No wonder the heart attack and stroke rates in the U.S. population are so high."

On the other hand, I am grateful to be able to experience a life where time is considered even more valuable than money.

Here at the University, I have learned to be more organized when planning activities. Before coming here, I did not need to manage my time wisely. Fortunately, I have learned the importance of time management and, as a result, I have learned to use my day in a more efficient manner.

I am grateful that I have gained this skill because I know that in the competitive real world, the importance given to time is similar to here rather than to Paraguay. The time management skills I am developing here are going to help me not only to succeed in school, but also in my future goals.

These are the main differences that have made a great impact in my life here at the University. They have become quite a challenge to get used to, and have many times contradicted my philosophy of doing or saying things. Both time management and political correctness are important skills and requirements that I will have to meet in order to live and in this competitive world.

Tune your dial to WVBU

University's radio station plays a variety of music

By Ashley Maliken
Staff Writer

Many college students feel of completely disconnected while living on campus. Since most lack the luxury of cable TV and many do not have the drive to pick up the newspaper every day, the happenings of the world around us become completely unknown.

Radio is one thing that many students still have access to, and the University offers its very own radio station—90.5 FM, WVBU, one remaining comfort of the technological revolution. Though it may not keep you entirely up- to-date on the current status of the nation, it does create the comforting illusion that you are still a part of mainstream society.

WVBU, managed by Garry Thaniel '04 and located in the basement of Roberts Hall, has been around for a long time.

"My father was a student here, class of 1973, and he was a DJ back then," second-year disc jockey David Meilleur '04 said.

The station offers an eclectic medley of songs, but is categorized as a modern rock station and is therefore required to play a certain number of the genre's tunes daily. During the morning and afternoon hours, the station generally plays an automated play list, interrupted by the occasional hosted show.

Evenings are much more popular, as every night offers a different voice and medley including more popular styles such as techno, rap, and, of course, rock. Most shows tend to sample more album cuts than mainstream hits. There are up to six shows a day right now. That number is on the rise, offering something for everyone.

As is true for all college radio stations, the hours between 10 p.m. and 6 a.m. are considered "safe harbor," meaning that uncut versions of songs can be played. To the chagrin of some staff members, WVBU has been experiencing some technical difficulties and has lost the three second delay most stations have as a buffer against anything particularly offensive.

> "In its prime WVBU had 90 DJs on staff, and we're not too far from that now."
> —Garry Thaniel '04

Most of the shows featured by WVBU are strictly music and disc jockey commentary, yet there are a few talk radio-esque shows. Not only do students have the opportunity to listen, but they too can become disc jockeys.

"In its prime WVBU had 90 DJs on staff, and we're not too far from that right now," Thaniel said.

Remaining slots are limited and filling rather quickly, but the training process is relatively painless. After a general orientation, three sit-ins with a board member and a brief test on the technical aspects of "running the boards," you can sign up and become the next Casey Kasem.

"I wouldn't say it's all the rage, but it is fun," Meilleur said.

Listeners of WVBU used to consist mainly of a few dedicated fans and other disc jockeys, but word is spreading quickly and the following is growing. Requests are welcome, both via telephone (577-3489) and instant messenger (screen name: WVBU), and a listening of shows, times, DJs and other more technical information can all be found on their Web site at http://www.orgs.bucknell.edu/WVBU/.

Genetic map helps with malaria research

By Sandi-Jo Galati
News Editor

Researchers from the Sanger Institute in the United Kingdom, Stanford University in California and the Institute of Genome Research in Maryland announced last Wednesday that the genome of the Plasmodium falciparum parasite, the protozoan causing the most deadly form of malaria, has been mapped.

According to CNN, the completion of the $29 million project involving 150 researchers among the three labs was announced with its publication in the Science magazine.

The malaria genome is composed of 14 chromosomes with nearly 5,300 genes. Because of its relatively small size, parts of the DNA are highly unstable, presenting researchers with the challenging task preserving the DNA from denaturing while using the necessary sequencing techniques.

The genetic map of Anopheles Gambiae, the mosquito that transmits the P. falciparum into the human blood stream was also published last Wednesday in the scientific journal Nature.

Researchers view genetic mapping as a tool to uncover the genetic weaknesses in the mosquitoes, those genes particularly susceptible to infection by P. falciparum, hoping that these particular DNA sequences will be more susceptible to the development of insecticides and pharmaceuticals that may inhibit the vulnerability of the mosquito or transmission.

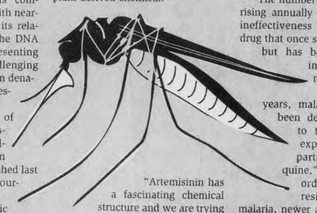
According to MSNBC, genes regulating the female's blood demand during egg development and sensing human hosts are transcribed depending on the insects need for blood. These particular genes are the being targeted by researchers as interventional sequences from which insecticides and pesticides may be developed.

"One of the promises of mapping the malaria genome is the identification of molecular targets for drug intervention," said Dee Ann Casteel, assistant professor of chemistry. "The malaria community would be excited to learn of a peculiar biochemical pathway in malaria parasites or a unique enzyme that could be affected by new drugs."

The P. falciparum strain of malaria is transmitted through gravid female A. gambiae, which require a blood meal for egg maturation. The mosquito spreads the malaria parasite by the saliva it injects into the human host. The parasite travels through the blood stream to the liver where it proliferates, forming cysts encapsulating the parasite. These cysts burst in the blood and destroy the red blood cells of the host. Symptoms of malaria include, chills, fever, headaches, muscle pain, vomiting and fatigue, due to loss of these red blood cells.

If an uninfected mosquito then bites the host, the mosquito becomes a carrier of malaria and can then infect another human.

Casteel is one of the many scientists involved in the fight against malaria. Her research at the University focuses specifically on the study of the drug Artemisinin, a plant-derived chemical.



"Artemisinin has a fascinating chemical structure and we are trying to understand how various aspects of this structure affect the ability of the drug to kill malaria parasites," Casteel said.

Amy Bittner '04 is one of several students conducting research in Casteel's lab.

"We do not know what exactly about the structure of the chemical, Artemisinin, cures the malaria, so we want to make a more simplistic chemical structure, hoping it will still cure malaria," Bittner said. "Every student working in my lab is working on a different synthesis pathway, working towards different, but similar, end products."

Artemisinin does not target a particular enzyme in the parasite. Rather the drug interacts with hemeiron in red blood cells affected by malaria, resulting in a series of damaging chemical reactions in the cell. Because Artemisinin does not target an enzymatic receptor, Casteel believes that knowledge of the P. falciparum genome will be helpful once further discoveries are made about the immediate activity of the drug.

"Knowledge of the malarial genome will likely not assist in understanding the initial interaction in the process but may help clarify subsequent events," Casteel said.

According to MSNBC, 2.7 million people fall victim of malaria each year, 90 percent of which live in Africa where necessary health care services are neglected due to political and economic instabilities.

"Many of the problems surrounding the effective control of malaria involve not only scientific issues but also political and economic considerations, Casteel said. "Many of the difficulties have to do with the challenges of delivering health care in tropical regions of the world and in economically disadvantaged countries. Political upheaval can damage health care infrastructure and cause displacement of persons into malarious areas."

The number of malaria victims is rising annually with the increasing ineffectiveness of chloroquine, a drug that once stabilized the disease but has become increasingly ineffective due to malarial resistance.

"Over the last 30 years, malaria parasites have been developing resistance to the older and less expensive medicines, particularly chloroquine," Casteel said. "In order to treat these resistant strains of malaria, newer and more expensive drugs are often needed."

Global warming has also allowed the migration of infected mosquitoes to areas previously uninfected. A population of malaria-infected mosquitoes was recently detected in Virginia, as reported by CNN.

Unfortunately, the parts of the world most heavily affected by malaria are most often unable to afford the cost of research and pharmaceuticals.

According to Casteel, pharmaceutical companies are hesitant to fund extensive research projects to treat any tropical diseases because the victims in these regions cannot afford the drugs.

"Not seeing much of the disease around here, it's astounding to hear how many people's lives are still affected by this disease in less developed countries," Bittner said. "While finding new medication for the disease would be a tremendous accomplishment, the reality is that the people who need it the most cannot afford it."

In response to the changing global climate and increasing resistance to pharmaceuticals, researchers are hopeful that the successful mapping of the genome will provide effective economically feasible ways of controlling and preventing the transmission of this increasingly threatening disease.

Administration hopeful to implement merit aid for Class of 2007

By Sandi-Jo Galati
News Editor

Members of the faculty and administration convened Monday evening in a special forum scheduled to gain feedback regarding the most recent report on merit aid from the Committee on Admissions and Financial Aid, headed by Assistant Professor of Psychology Arthur Shapiro. This report will be brought before the Board of Trustees in late November.

"The input received on Monday was very important and will be considered as we move ahead with our planning," Vice President of Enrollment Management Kurt Thiede said. "This will be shared with the board's Merit Aid Sub-Committee as they consider their report to the full board."

Faculty members first met in a merit aid forum last February in response to a request from the Board of Trustees for faculty input. During this meeting, faculty members were highly divided in their opinions regarding the benefits and drawbacks of merit aid. Despite the apparent discrepancy in faculty opinion, the board approved of the implementation of merit aid at its April 27 meeting, pending strict adherence to certain guidelines established during that meeting.

The board requested that the Committee on Admissions and Financial Aid draft a report describing the pilot program that took into account these stipulations for review at its November meeting.

> "Bucknell, through this merit program design, will provide itself with a recruitment tool that will allow us to work more successfully at the top margins of applicant pool."
> —Kurt Thiede, VP for Enrollment Management

"It is good to be careful that this program, like all programs at Bucknell, strikes the right balance among institutional strategic priorities, with the academic mission at the center, but with other things students value and need being promoted as well," Vice President for Academic Affairs Charles Pollock '70 said.

Expectations established by the Board of Trustees last April include developing a finance plan involving fundraising, maintaining the current socioeconomic environment of the University, limiting the non athletic to athletic dollars spent to a 3-1 ratio and establishing annual goals for review.

According to Pollock, the University is planning to award some merit aid packages beginning next year, pending the board's approval.

"I personally have the greatest hopes for merit aid in advancing Bucknell's important efforts to be more diverse in lots of ways," Pollock said.

Merit aid has multiple objectives, including the enrollment of more students academically, strengthening the reputation of the University, increasing diversity on campus, drawing more performing arts talent on campus, drawing more middle-income students to the University, maintaining the ROTC program, promoting athletic equality, particularly in basketball, among the other schools in the Patriot League that offer merit aid and solidifying overall financial assistance.

"Whether it is with different need analysis, different aid packaging policies or merit scholarships, the environment has changed greatly during the last two decades and will continue to do so for the foreseeable future," Thiede said. "Bucknell, through this merit program design, will provide itself with a recruitment tool that will allow us to work more suc-

Recreation and athletics pavilion to be named in honor of Sojka

Decision comes by request of late trustee and close friend Robert Smith '39

By Alyson Walker
Features Editor

The University's new 4,000-seat pavilion arena will be named after Gary Sojka, professor of biology and former University president, in a dedication ceremony scheduled for Jan. 15, 2003.

This honor is bestowed upon Sojka per the requests of the late Robert E. Smith '39 who served as chairman emeritus of the University Board of Trustees. Smith and his wife, Peg Farrell Smith '41, contributed $8 million towards the new recreation and athletic center. Prior to his passing in May, Smith privately asked that the new arena be named for Sojka.

"I continue to be touched by Bob Smith," Sojka said. "He and I had a marvelous relationship for 17 years and the University truly prospered under his leadership. Because it speaks to the depth of our friendship, this means as much to me as anything could."

Sojka served as University president for 11 years. In 1995, he returned to teaching as a full-time member of the faculty. He is the University's NCAA faculty athletics representative and had been a member of the NCAA President's Council.

"Gary Sojka has long been an advocate and enthusiastic supporter of the University's scholar-athlete model of athletics," Director of Athletics and Recreation John Hardt said. "In many ways Dr. Sojka's own achievements epitomize the ideal of the scholar-athlete, so it is only appropriate that this marvelous new facility be named in honor of this extraordinary man."

The new arena will be primarily used as a venue for men's and women's basketball. It will replace Davis Gym, which hosted the teams for 64 years. Davis Gym will continue to be used for volleyball and intramural sports.

After Smith's gift and request to honor Sojka, another $1 million has been donated by alumni for the arena project. This is just part of the fundraising campaign to supplement the generous donations of both Smith and lead donors Kenneth G. Langone '57 and his wife Elaine, who will name the new $32 million recreation and athletic center.

Smith was an economics major at the University as well as a member of the varsity basketball team. He played in the inaugural game at Davis Gym in 1938. Smith often reminisced about his initial reaction to Davis Gym.

"I thought at the time that Davis Gym was Utopia. The old Tustin Gym had a track all around it, and you had to square off the corners of the track to get a basketball situation. Bucknell rarely lost a home game in those days, because there probably wasn't another court like it anywhere," Smith said.

Smith was the former president and CEO of Beaunit Corporation and the namesake of Smith Hall.

"The University is fortunate to have former student-athletes such as Bob Smith whose positive experiences at the University inspire them to give back so generously to our campus," Hardt said. "Bob's wonderful gift will have a tremendous impact in enabling the University to provide outstanding opportunities and experiences for our students. We are grateful to Bob for recognizing Professor Sojka's lasting contributions to the campus with the naming of this new facility in his honor."

While Sojka was president, the University capital building campaign was funded. The campaign raised $90 million, which was used in the construction of almost half of the current square footage of facility space on campus. The University endowment also increased from $52 million to $142 million and new curriculum plans were formulated for both the College of Arts and Sciences and the College of Engineering.

"I will admit to being a bit nonplussed about having my name on any building on the campus," Sojka said. "I can only hope that in time it will be well accepted by the campus community and that it will be used in an appropriate manner to foster the best interests of the University and the extended Bucknell family."

New Web site encourages students to rate professors

By Rachel Laskow
Editor-in-Chief

The Conservatives Club recently launched Rate the Profs, a Web site that allows students to rate their professors and post comments about them. The site also allows other students and professors to view the assessments.

"We just want it to be another source of information that can help us all to pick the best classes," Conservatives Club President Denise Chaykun '04 said.

Students can either register anonymously on the Web site or use the forum as a guest. Each University department has its own category and professors of each department are then listed. Students can read or post information about a professor by clicking on the professor's name.

Chaykun thinks students will benefit from being able to find out more about professors before taking their classes.

"We were previously limited only to information from our friends who had taken a professor before," Chaykun said.

Sara Mastrony '03 agrees that Rate the Profs is a good idea.

"It would be helpful to get an idea of the professor's style and whether or not peers enjoyed the class," Mastrony said.

Provost/Vice President for Student Affairs Stephen Bowen believes that talking to friends and people a student knows is likely to be more valuable than looking at the Web site.

"You can ask them questions and discuss their experiences, rather than having to rely on a comment posted by an unknown person," Bowen said.

Bowen feels that one problem is that only a small percentage of students have taken the time to rate professors, and with a few comments, many comments contradict one another.

"Many of the comments I read were fairly extreme, as comments tend to be when posted on a public bulletin board. We get more constructive feedback if the comments are addressed to the professors," Bowen said.

Another problem that Bowen sees with Rate the Profs is that the ratings might not reflect changes with a student's individual experience with a pro-

MEDICAL TRANSPORT—A student contacted Public Safety and requested transportation to Evangelical Community Hospital Emergency Room for treatment of stomach pain. A Student Health Services driver responded and transported the student and later returned him to campus.

DISORDERLY CONDUCT / PUBLIC URINATION / UNDERAGE—A student reported to Public Safety that a hallmate had been banging on his Larison Hall door and then urinated outside his door. Upon arrival, officers determined that a student was intoxicated and under the age of 21. Citations issued for disorderly conduct and underage drinking.

INFORMATION—Public Safety responded to Dana Engineering for the report of a male sleeping in an office. The officer spoke with a student and advised him not to continue this activity. The student was cooperative.

MEDICAL ASSIST—Public Safety responded to the Langone Center for the report of an unconscious female. Upon arrival, Public Safety found that the student was conscious and signed refusal forms for medical treatment.

CRIMINAL MISCHIEF—A student reported to Public Safety that unknown person(s) broke eggs on the front and rear windshields of his vehicle while parked at the Sigma Phi Epsilon Fraternity parking lot. The incident is under investigation.

MEDICAL TRANSPORT—Public Safety responded to Trax Hall for the report of an alcohol overdose. A female student was transported by ambulance to Evangelical Community Hospital Emergency Room for treatment and later returned to campus.

ACT 64 / DRUG VIOLATION—Public Safety responded to Swartz Hall for the report of the odor of marijuana. In a plain view search of the room, Public Safety observed marijuana and drug paraphernalia. East Buffalo Township Police Department responded. Both of the room occupants admitted to having alcohol although under the age of 21 years. One of the students admitted to East Buffalo Township Police Department that he was in possession of the marijuana and drug paraphernalia. University charges for underage drinking and controlled substance violations issued. Criminal charges are pending.

OPEN LEWDNESS—Public Safety and Lewisburg Police Department responded to South 6th Street for the report of a male and female engaged in a sexual act in a truck parked along the street. Upon arrival, officers determined that the male had an inflatable doll inside the vehicle. Lewisburg Police Department cited the male for open lewdness.

INFORMATION / POSSIBLE HARASSMENT—Five students reported to Public Safety that a male student at Swartz Hall was making threats to a number of people and using inappropriate language. Residential Life was contacted and will investigate.

Sunday, Oct. 13

UNDERAGE DRINKING—While conducting a routine party check at Sigma Chi Fraternity, Public Safety observed a female student drinking a beer without a wristband. Upon investigation, it was determined that the student was under the age of 21. Citation issued for underage drinking.

UNDERAGE DRINKING—Public Safety responded to Smith Hall for the report of an intoxicated student who was unconscious. The female admitted to consuming alcohol although under the age of 21. Citation issued for underage drinking.

DISORDERLY CONDUCT / UNDERAGE DRINKING—Public Safety observed a male student urinating on a tree outside Sigma Chi Fraternity. It was determined that the student did consume alcohol although under the age of 21. Citations issued for disorderly conduct and underage drinking.

INFORMATION / HARASSMENT—A student reported to Public Safety that she was receiving unacceptable instant messages on her computer from another student. Public Safety contacted the student and advised him to stop sending messages to the female student. He agreed to stop immediately.

UNDERAGE CONSUMPTION—Public Safety stopped a student who was attempting to gain entry into Carey House. It was determined that this student did not live there and he admitted to consuming alcohol although under the age of 21. Citation issued for underage consumption.

INFORMATION / HARASSMENT—A student reported to Public Safety that she and members of her sports team were receiving harassing instant messages on her computer. Public Safety contacted the student who was believed to be sending the messages. He agreed to stop the activity.

Monday, Oct. 14

INFORMATION—Dunkin Donuts contacted Public Safety and advised that a student placed an order for a large quantity of merchandise but did not pick up the items. Public Safety contacted the student who agreed to speak to the manager of Dunkin Donuts regarding the situation.

FAILURE TO COMPLY—While on routine patrol, Public Safety observed a vehicle parked on the pathway near Trax Hall. Upon investigation, it was determined that the vehicle had been banned from campus as part of a University sanction. Traffic citations for parking on a sidewalk/pathway and possessing an illegal vehicle, as well as a citation for failure to comply with a University sanction issued.

INFORMATION / BROKEN WINDOW—Public Safety responded to Swartz Hall for the report of a broken window. No suspects or witnesses could be located.

MEDICAL TRANSPORT—Public Safety responded to Vedder Hall for the report of a student who injured her hand when a light bulb broke in it. Physical Plant responded and checked the light which appeared to have moisture on it. The student was transported by a Student Health Services driver to Evangelical Community Hospital Emergency room for treatment and later returned to campus.

VANDALISM—A student reported to Public Safety that unknown person(s) damaged his vehicle by striking both side doors, while it was parked in the Bucknell West Lot. The incident is under investigation.

University endowment plummets

Stock market instability equates to $44 million in losses

By Michelle Dombeck
Arts & Entertainment Editor

Due to the poor performance of the stock market recently, the University's endowment declined over 11 percent this fiscal year, according to Vice President for Finance and Administration Jo-Anne Lema. This translates to a loss of $44 million.

"Our endowment is a collection of funds that have been given to the University over a period of time. By definition, the endowment is a fund where only the income can be spent. The original principal must remain intact in perpetuity," Lema said.

The endowment's primary investments are in the stock market. While typically providing high returns, stocks can be a risky investment.

"As long as Bucknell is heavily invested in the stock market, and historically stock markets generate higher returns over the long term than other financial assets such as bonds, then the Bucknell endowment will be subject to such fluctuations," Assistant Professor of Economics Geoffrey Schneider said.

Since the stock market has not been performing well lately, the University's investments have suffered. Predicting this decline, however, would have been nearly impossible.

"It would have taken extraordinary foresight for Bucknell to have avoided these losses," Schneider said. "It would be unreasonable for Bucknell to expect to avoid the downturn, given that virtually all other investors have experienced similar losses."

Compared to the market as a whole, the University's investments have not performed too badly.

"The S&P 500 index declined 19 percent from June 29, 2001 to June 28, 2002, and the NASDAQ composite index declined 32 percent over the same period," Associate Professor of Economics Gregory Krohn said.

The University's budget will not be greatly affected, despite this loss of money.

"So far to date, [this decline] has had a neglible impact because of our spending policies," Lema said. "However, if the downward trend continues, we may potentially have less income available to support the operating budget."

fessor from semester to semester, if the database is not cleared at the end of the semester.

For example, according to Bowen, the University prides itself in faculty members taking risks in their teaching approach to make their classes better. This new approach may or may not work, but the students' comments may only reflect that particular teaching experiment.

Each semester, students fill out evaluations about every class they take. These evaluations ask questions about the class, as well as the professor.

Professor of Biology Gary Sojka said he uses these evaluations to alter or fine-tune his offerings in response to student comments after applying the appropriate statistical analyses of the student responses.

"At this point in my life I am not much interested in something that smacks of a popularity rating, but I am seriously interested in making my courses more useful to students, and student evaluations are one tool that can be used to achieve that goal if they are properly constructed and evaluated," Sojka said.

According to Chaykun, the Conservatives Club has not received a lot of feedback because the site is new.

"Some people seem upset by the idea that one can comment anonymously, feeling this is cowardly and biased teacher bashing," Chaykun said.

By deciding to continue reading, you've just demonstrated a key American freedom – choice. And, should you choose to turn the page, take a nap or go dye your hair blue, that's cool too.

Because while rights like freedom of speech, freedom of religion and freedom of the press get all the attention in the Constitution, the smaller liberties you can enjoy every day in America are no less important or worthy of celebration.

Your right to backyard barbeques, sleeping in on Sundays and listening to any darned music you please can be just as fulfilling as your right to vote for the president. Maybe even more so because you can enjoy these freedoms personally and often.

So take a moment to celebrate all the little liberties you enjoy in America. Or, forget all this and choose to take them for granted – it's a free country.

Bali evidence points to Indonesian terrorist organization

As Indonesian police formally detained two suspects Wednesday in last weekend's bombing on the resort island of Bali, one U.S. official told NBC News that it has growing evidence that the Indonesian militant group Jemaah Islamiyah was behind the deadly attack. "I cannot tell you why we believe that, but we do," the official said, speaking on condition of anonymity.

CDC panel expands smallpox plan

ATLANTA—A federal committee voted Wednesday to recommend vaccinating about 510,000 hospital workers against smallpox, bringing its earlier proposal closer to the Bush administration's suggestion.

Faculty meeting addresses merit aid questions

MERIT AID

cessfully at the top margins of applicant pool."

According to University President Steffen Rogers, parents of students opting to decline University admission in favor of schools offering merit aid often question why their sons and daughters are not recognized by the University for their talents.

"We are losing students to schools that I do not think that we should be losing them too because of a sweetener," Rogers said.

Bucknell Student Government (BSG) is also in favor of merit aid implementation, passing a motion in its support last January.

"I think that merit aid would be great for Bucknell. It would give Bucknell a tool that other Universities are already using to attract top students," BSG President Amir Sadaghiani said.

In the current proposal, the University expects to award 42 merit aid scholarships annually, representing about 5 percent of the accepted class. Ten of these awards will be given to no-need students, while the remaining 32 will be offered to students demonstrating financial need. Roughly 3 percent of the total financial aid budget will be appropriated to merit aid, and 1 percent of the budget will awarded to no-need students.

"The merit scholarship program design is modest in relationship to the University's commitment to financial aid, yet it will provide enough information upon which the future of merit awards and the shape of our financial aid program in general can be based," Thiede said.

Merit aid has been heavily debated since it was first permitted among the Patriot League schools since the league decided it was permissible in 1998. By not participating in merit aid, the University has isolated itself with one other Patriot League university and the Ivy League, in its refusal to offer no-need based scholarships.

According to Thiede, many reservations surrounding merit aid implementation involve fears that the program will not be large enough to be measurable or will increase to the point where it will become a runaway train.

"The challenge with putting this program together is caution," Thiede said. "We need to balance the concern of being small but with enough of a program to be measurable."

For this reason, the pilot program was designed with three-year limit, after which the Committee on Admissions and Financial Aid expects to have collected enough data to determine the future of the program.

"The design for future years can then be modified on the basis of what is learned through the initial implementation," Thiede said. "I believe this is a measured and balanced program design. We will not know its impact until we actually implement it."

Many faculty members voiced their reservations at the forum about basketball players being the only athletes awarded merit aid specifically for their sport. In the current plan, six of the 42 available scholarships will be awarded to basketball players.

Ben Marsh, professor of geology and environmental studies, was one of the faculty members opposing this selectivity.

"I think that merit aid is disgraceful and we should reject it," Marsh said.

Marsh proposed that no more than one-quarter of the money appropriated to athletics scholarships should be given to athletes in any one sport.

Currently the Patriot League allows merit aid awards to be given to players in all sports except football. According to Rogers, the Patriot League presidents have determined that football scholarships would result in a financial strain that none of the universities could afford at this point.

Rogers, Pollock and Thiede each described basketball as the "marquee" sport of the Patriot League, which is why the University is attempting to become equals in basketball before any other.

"I firmly believe that Bucknell's continuing to take full advantage of its Patriot League membership, and its NCAA Division I stature, depends on removing the great handicap under which our men's and women's basketball teams are competing now," Pollock said. "Our Division I membership is a symbol—it tells the world in a visible way that we do things here in a serious way and at a high level of quality, and it separates us advantageously from many otherwise comparable institutions."

> "I hope that in time the preponderance of the Bucknell community understands the need for merit aid of several kinds, as well as the different external imperatives that require different degrees of aid to achieve different purposes."
> —Charles Pollock '70, VP for Student Affairs

The University's Patriot League competitors that offer merit aid have the advantage in building strong teams, which results in more fan support and generating more revenue.

"Basketball is the marquee sport of the Patriot League. Focusing on men's and women's basketball provides us with a finite number of awards that can be controlled and measured," Thiede said.

The Committee on Admissions and Financial Aid will now consider the issues raised at the forum in preparation for the Board of Trustee to vote.

"When designing a program like this there can be a tendency to want to reconsider specific pieces, sometimes on an ongoing basis," Thiede said. "However, there is a need to eventually agree on a plan, implement it and evaluate the results."

Pollock perceives the implementation of merit aid as an important component of the future of the University, and is confident that others will soon be convinced of its advantages.

"I hope that in time the preponderance of the Bucknell community understands the need for merit aid of several kinds, as well as the different external imperatives that require different degrees of aid to achieve different purposes," Pollock said.

A Message from the Committee for Campus Diversity

In the context of campus discussions of the past few weeks on issues of diversity and civility, the Committee for Campus Diversity (CCD) would like offer these thoughts:

In the past two weeks, members of the CCD have been approached by individuals from many campus groups, faculty, students and staff, with the questions: Is Bucknell truly committed to increasing its diversity and improving the campus climate for all its faculty, students and staff? Where does the University stand? Is diversity at the University under attack?

We cannot speak for the University as a corporate entity, but as those charged with implementing the 1999 Plan for Diversity, we would like to reaffirm that the University's commitment is unchanged: to seek to create the diversity we need to fulfill our mission, live out our historic principles and compete effectively with other institutions of higher education. In part, the Plan for Diversity states:

> As an institution of higher learning, Bucknell is committed to fostering an inclusive and diverse campus community, enriched by the presence and participation of men and women of different races, nationalities, ethnicities, socioeconomic circumstances, ages, sexual orientations and religious backgrounds. This commitment goes beyond the mere toleration of differences by seeking to eliminate attitudes and actions that have separated, excluded or marginalized people in the past and by facilitating true understanding and recognition.

At the Oct. 7 "Stop the Hate" Vigil, University President Steffen Rogers articulated, for himself, a set of personal hopes and expectations for the University community regarding diversity and civility. The CCD would like to lift up these hopes, not as a policy statement, but as hopes and expectations we share and which seem to speak to recent campus events. Rogers said, in part:

> "... I am committed to increasing diversity at Bucknell, picking up where the Board of Trustees left off in our last strategic plan. The process of creating Vision 2010 will define how we're going to do so, but there isn't any if about diversity in our planning. And this means that Bucknell must do all in its power to make this community welcoming and inclusive, not only for selected groups, but for students, faculty and staff of all races, cultures, ethnicities, religions, nationalities, sexual orientations and political orientations. In the starting principles put forward for Vision 2010, I would emphasize ideas like civility, respect, character and compassion. As a community like ours faces the future, both near and distant, we must turn to these values for direction.
> "Stephen L. Carter has defined civility as 'the sum of the many sacrifices we are called to make for the sake of living together.' Certainly extreme cries of conscience or justice require us to break the bonds of civility and compassion that should normally hold us together. Thankfully, for those of us at Bucknell, communication is the key; thus, we must continue to communicate in productive and understanding ways. No one values the free pursuit of truth more than I, but we need to base that struggle on generosity, trust, and compassion for all those our words will touch.
> "I believe deeply in free speech. But for the sake of community, not everything that we have a right to say is appropriate to say. Before I speak, I need to think about the impact of my words on others. The same goes for the way I say those words. Carter argues that 'civility requires that we express ourselves in ways that demonstrate our respect for others.' Without respect and restraint from all of us, the basic bonds of community begin to disintegrate and we undermine the whole purpose of education.
> "That's not to say we cannot improve. I welcome constructive criticism of Bucknell's policies, priorities, procedures and personnel, so long as they are expressed in a civil and, I repeat, constructive fashion.
> "Where the target of tonight's vigil—hate violence—occurs, there has usually been a pattern of words and deeds that were not respectful of others. Hate is not acceptable in any context: The words 'hate' and 'hurt' are often co-mingled in intent and fact. We cannot allow hate and we cannot condone hurt. But, to remain a strong, viable community of teaching and learning does not require that we have to love, or even like, each other as long as there is civility, compassion and respect. However, it is under the umbrella of those ideas that we will grow in understanding, we will learn from one another and we will heal."

The decline of civility on college campuses in recent years, as in the society at large, has been well documented. But, as members of an educational community, we are held to a standard of civility and a higher standard: we should seek to understand the experiences of others in the community and take those experiences into account when we take stands on controversial issues.

The CDC would like to affirm that the community is more than a set of courses, activities and policies. The community has always been proud of its warmth, care, concern and mutual respect, and our goal is to extend that community to include those who have been excluded in the past, as well as those who have been here all along. Some will say that the University is just fine the way it is, but our goal is to keep the University's distinctive virtues while opening our community to the diverse world into which we hope to send our graduates.

Merit aid should be available to all athletes

At the merit aid forum on Monday evening, the Committee on Admissions and Financial Aid presented the proposed pilot plan for merit aid to the faculty for review. If approved by the Board of Trustees in November, merit aid awards will be given for academic achievement, performing arts talent, athletics and promoting diversity beginning with the Class of 2007.

Athletic scholarships would only be given to men's and women's basketball players. This proposal is unfair to other athletic teams at the University. The University will be creating an unbalanced and unequal athletic program in which the needs of the basketball teams are prioritized.

University President Steffen Rogers, Vice President for Student Affairs Charles Pollock '70 and Vice President for Enrollment Management Kurt Thiede justified this selectivity by claiming basketball as the marquee sport of the Patriot League. Rogers, Pollock and Thiede claimed that offering basketball scholarships was a necessity for the University to remain competitive in the League.

According to Thiede, one reason that the plan proposes to give merit aid only to basketball players is practicality of resources. By giving the aid to basketball players, the University will see the largest impact, the fastest.

The money given to the sport will be used to build a program that has already been chosen as the Patriot League's marquee sport. However, because basketball is already a strong program, the University should not only concentrate on it growing more.

Basketball brings more money to the University than other sports, but by only offering merit aid only to basketball players, other sports will not have the opportunity to reach the same status as basketball.

Also, the University cannot improve its athletic program as a whole on the basis of one sport. If merit aid was given to all athletes, more sports would be able to improve over time. At the same time, if the athletic program as a whole is made better, the University will become more appealing to all student athletes, not just basketball players.

By offering merit aid to basketball players, the University might have an easier time recruiting basketball players. However, at the same time, they might lose other key athletes for other sports. For example, if merit aid was offered to baseball players, the University might get more exceptional baseball players and therefore baseball could improve in the League. As it stands now, the University could be losing baseball players to other schools and it will continue to do so unless it has a specific way to attract those players, such as offering them merit aid.

Although basketball is an important sport for the University, it should focus on improving its athletics as a whole. By offering merit aid to all athletes, the University could succeed in making its athletics program stronger and therefore become a more popular choice among student athletes.

'Bucknellians for Peace' somewhat of a misnomer

To the Editor:

This letter is in response to Jon Hoyle's Oct. 11 article. It would be a misnomer to attribute to one group the name "Bucknellians For Peace." This would imply that the rest of us are dedicated to waging war against other countries merely for the sake of our lust for war and violence. Conservatives are also indeed interested in peace, albeit through different means.

Moral relativism is a practice that the United States has been forced to practice since its founding as the first modern democracy. Like Hoyle, I believe there are many historical contexts that validate this claim. The Revolutionary War cost many colonial Americans their lives, but as a result the Constitution and the Bill of Rights were forged to bring about a more free and peaceful society. World War II was thrust upon our nation in a violent attack, and millions of Americans were forced to put aside freedom and peace for the savagery of war. Hoyle's assertion that some conflicts give birth to future ones is true. The ending of World War II laid the groundwork for the Cold War, in which moral relativism was elevated and smaller countries were played as mere pawns. Today, there is terrorism; people willing to put their extremist views above even their own lives. There is no escaping this reality—we must fight terror, there is simply no other option.

The end of moral relativism will by consequence bring about peace. But how can we achieve this means without making ourselves so incredibly strong that we create even more enmity? Or oppositely, without making ourselves so weak that extremism takes root without opposition and ideals are destroyed? First, it is clear that oppressed peoples around the world such as those in Iraq, Iran and Somalia should be given access to freedom of speech and freedom of information. Radio Free Europe, a broadcasting network so instrumental in spreading truth and freedom throughout the oppressed countries of Eastern Europe, is an effective example of the kind of change that must take place in order for propaganda and disastrous dictatorships to crumble. It is exactly this unparalleled freedom of hearts and minds so enjoyed in America, Europe and Japan that will keep the disastrous nuclear and biological weapons that Hoyle speaks of from ever being used again. And that is worth fighting for.

Sincerely,
Michael Accinno '06

Men to partake in "Vagina Monologues"

To the Editor:

I offer my congratulations to all those who decried "The Vagina Monologues," claiming to be offended or threatened by the production. You have won. This year the producers are drawing their fangs; they are taking out the whole point of the thing by inviting a man to share the stage.

When I saw "The Vagina Monologues," it was a presentation of the voices of people with vaginas. Men, you may recall, don't have them. The play simply has nothing to do with men—at least, it had nothing to do with men. The reason for including a man as the voice of a "World Without Violence" is incomprehensible. In a "World Without Violence," men would not feel so threatened by women's-only actions that they would spend a year trying to bully their way in. In a "World Without Violence," women would not find the bullying so threatening—or maybe just tiresome—that they would give up one of the extremely few places where they had taken a stand.

I can only think of two possible explanations, both dramatically wrong. Either the leaders of V-Day Bucknell believe that the struggle to end violence against women is nearly won, and so women's visibility in that struggle is no longer as important; or, almost inconceivably, they find that men's voices on the subject of vaginas are underrepresented. The implied third possibility, of course, is that V-Day Bucknell has essentially given up. I hope not.

Whatever the case, I applaud the victors, those who insisted that an all-women play is, a priori, against men. The movement to end violence against women, at least at Bucknell, is visibly injured. How proud they must be!

Sincerely,
Don Rea

Privileged of society can provide an oppressive force

By Charity Brady and Katie Parker
Staff Writers

In light of recent campus events, the gap between those who are "privileged" and those who feel they are not is continuously widening. In an effort to begin the long and painful process of closing this gap, we wish to address in this article several of the means by which privilege in our society functions as an invisible yet potent force of oppression. Those who possess privilege are understandably least likely to recognize their position of power, yet this resistance is what propagates cycles of ignorance and disparity.

The recent publication of the "Counterweight" has caused quite a bit of controversy on the campus with regards to the limitations of free speech. The issue, which appropriately dealt with that exact topic, defended the rights of all students to express their viewpoints and beliefs without the threat of administrative restrictions. Although the controversial nature of these articles may be appropriate given the Conservatives Club's (BUCC) mission statement, several students have felt that efforts to promote social awareness on the campus have been marginalized and attacked under the guise of free speech.

This is not to say that all viewpoints expressed on this campus should be sugarcoated to avoid offending certain groups or individuals. However, the purpose of political discourse should be to educate individuals about social issues. The problem with publications like the "Counterweight" is the absolutist stance taken by many of its writers, signaling a lack of interest in reciprocal debate between communities.

Political absolutism almost necessarily results from a position of privilege and power. If you are a member of a dominant majority, your beliefs rarely stand to be challenged, and any expansion of your worldview is your choice. Members of a minority, on the other hand, are forced to think about their role and their world in relation to the majority view, and subsequently have no choice but to expand their mindset to include the norms imposed upon them. This power structure sets up the privileged as the norm, and the unprivileged as deviant from that norm. As a result, the beliefs and values of the privileged are more likely to be absolutist because the only challenge to those beliefs will come from the deviants who do not share them.

Systems of privilege, therefore, often become invisible, especially on campuses where the privileged are the majority. Writer and University of California Law Professor Stephanie M. Wildman wrote, "The invisibility of privilege strengthens the power it creates and maintains. The invisible cannot be combated and, as a result, privilege is allowed to perpetuate, regenerate and recreate itself. Privilege is systemic, not an occasional occurrence. Privilege is invisible only until looked for, but silence in the face of privilege sustains its invisibility." Privilege becomes invisible to all participants of a community, even those who benefit from it. Those who exist in a position of power will find difficulty understanding those who do not. This propagation of privilege is often unconscious, and self-recognition is an arduous, grueling task. However, once privilege is acknowledged, we can begin to function within the system to dismantle any semblance of division or inequality.

Let's stop for a moment, and define "privilege." Privilege does not necessarily mean that your family has a lot of money, or you drive a Beamer, or that you summer in the Hamptons. Privilege, in the sense that we are using this term, means that you have the advantage, as a majority, to define the societal norms. In setting these standards, you unconsciously imply that those who do not fit these norms are deviants. Accordingly, those who are privileged will benefit from the norms that they create. This does not mean that you consciously exploit others; it simply means that if a society is built around standards that you meet, you will have an advantage over those who do not.

The BUCC has raised the argument that its members are a campus minority and, as such, are being oppressed by the administration for their sometimes radical viewpoints. To the members of the BUCC, we extend this question: Is it possible that you're not being oppressed, but rather, your privilege is being challenged?

It is not surprising that a publication like the "Counterweight" would come out in the University, as the majority of students here are privileged, providing protection for those who wish to exercise their right to free speech. It's also not surprising that a good portion of the student body is apathetic to its contents. What is positive about the release of this publication is that it calls upon us to recognize our position of privilege in this society, and gives us the option to combat the social norms we so readily construct. The process of recognizing the inherent power structure is difficult and uncomfortable, but necessary in order to achieve goals of campus diversity and tolerance. At this moment, we are faced with the daunting challenge of making the invisible visible and permanently erasing the divisions on this campus.

Bloomsburg Fair lives up to high expectations

By Jenny Ross
Staff Writer

When I was in high school, I swore to myself that I would never go to college in Pennsylvania. I was under the belief that the entire state was farmland and everywhere you went, you were out in the middle of nowhere. (So, far Lewisburg has supported me.) Nonetheless I am here, yet the bubble that is the University never let me permeate through its edges to experience central Pennsylvania at its finest. That was until two weeks ago when I went to the Bloomsburg Fair.

It is the postcard of Pennsylvania.

Encompassing two weekends, the fair is the biggest thing in the area. So big in fact that every school in Bloomsburg is off for the week because the fair is town. People actually park their motor homes in a special lot to ensure that they won't miss a second of the fair.

Rather than dogs, you find goats, cows, pigs, horses and all kinds of farm animals on leashes being walked around the fairgrounds by their owners. Some even proudly wear first place ribbons. Farmers are everywhere, crops are abundant and you will probably find more people in tractors than cars. Everywhere you turn you find some creation of fried food, such as Oreos, zucchini, onions, potatoes, you name it and they will deep fry it.

There are some parts that look as though they resemble the boardwalks from the Jersey shore, with seemingly impossible carnival-type games and huge prizes, but a quick glance to the right allows one to see a field of tractors rather than an ocean.

If you happen to have $2 though, you can win everything from live fish to an oversized Sponge Bob Squarepants. The fish die in a week (rest in peace, Garth), and you will never win the Sponge Bob (even if you get your friends to play to rig the game for you).

There are some weird parts to the fair, such as the freak show-type petting zoo that includes a six-legged cow and the exhibit of a lady with a snake body, but each one costs a little extra (and the word on the fairground dirt path was that they weren't worth it).

Despite the constant reminder from my Pennsylvania friends that fairs are normal and abundant, I was in awe. If you didn't get the opportunity to go this year, be sure to make the trip at some point in your career here. Surprisingly enough, you don't need to have your own cow to go, but be sure to bring an empty stomach. You may be as happy as I was to find out I could move and didn't weigh 300 pounds the next morning.

Catcallers should think before they speak

By Becca Susman
Writer

What is safety and what protects it? Is it the gut instinct that tells you to run or the statistic of how many assaults occurred wherever you are? Or is it something different all together? Living in off-campus housing, I have no choice but walking or riding my bike as my main forms of transportation.

Given that the University has an extremely compact campus, these options suffice. Unfortunately, they also put me in the position of being a woman walking alone at night. I have chosen to take this one step further by jogging at night. I try to remain in lit areas, but refuse to submit to fear and refrain from clearing my head in the manner I enjoy most simply because of my gender and location.

I know that I am probably being very naïve, and also know that my parents will cringe if they read this article to learn that I am voluntarily putting myself in a potentially dangerous situation. Nonetheless, I feel safe. Perhaps it is a false sense of security given by the stars and the streetlights, but being alone in the darkness has an element of freedom.

Just because I feel safe does not have anything to do with whether or not I am actually safe. It is simply my perception. "Hey baby, where are you going?" and similar comments come with the territory, and I perceive them simply as drunken comments without a physical threat attached.

I also hope that I would be able to scream and beat up anyone who would try to attack me, or at least run away. According to Public Safety, between 1998 and 2000 there were 11 forcible sex offenses on campus and seven non-forcible offenses. These are only the reported offenses.

Given the University climate with an emphasis on partying and the sexualized atmosphere of any university, our administration has obviously pondered the question of what will make people feel safe on campus. With a ride call service and call boxes fairly accessible, there has been an effort to give the illusion of safety. Does the feeling mean that we as students are truly safe?

Near Bucknell West, call boxes are placed away from the glow of streetlights, which forces people into the darkness to access them. Is it important to lock down a campus in order to prevent crime? No place can be completely safe; one must take a risk every time she or he walks out the door.

I believe that you should not let this risk prevent you from living life to the fullest, within reason. As human beings it is our duty to respect each other and create an environment in which a woman does not have to look over her shoulder each time she walks or jogs down the street. This condition really does apply primarily to women.

With a guy friend by my side I do not get a single comment, but once I'm alone the comments flow like water. The men uttering the catcalls do not have to worry about their safety simply due to their gender and societal role; yet they continue to take advantage of this position. This perpetuates an environment in which many of their friends, significant others and relatives must rely on them in order to avoid harassment and feel safe.

The same men who make comments to me would be horrified if the same things were said to their sisters. So how should I respond to this? Should I continue to run without a glance back, or yell comments in return? Is there a way to make the campus equally friendly to men and women? For now, I will continue to run and bite my tongue, for fear of inciting a physical response and the next time you call, "Hey, baby," think about the recipient and how he or she will perceive your words.

Free speech does not justify free hate

Student life may be threatened if "Counterweight" continues in same manner

By Mike Dudzinski
Staff Writer

The campus community has expressed concern over the belittling and demeaning nature of the "Counterweight" in response to its discriminatory content. Regardless of political affiliation, everyone must acknowledge that free speech does not mean free hate. It is our goal to end University funding for the "Counterweight."

Most appalling is the objection expressed by the "Counterweight" regarding a University student who was charged with biased-related harassment for violated the Bucknell Code of Conduct. Implying that racial epithets are acceptable under the First Amendment, the publication argues that you should not be punished for using derogatory terms such as "negro" or "spic."

Moreover, it is absolutely absurd to characterize the remark made by the student as a salutary or even friendly gesture. After all, the victim found the comment racist and offensive, ultimately reporting the incident to Public Safety. Certainly someone accepted to the University possesses an extensive enough vocabulary, let alone common sense, sensitivity and civility, to choose words without derogatory connotations. Certainly someone accepted to the University has enough common sense not to address any stranger as anything other than what he or she is; a person. People have to stop pointing the finger and begin taking responsibility for their actions when common sense eludes them. If, as the "Counterweight" argues, "negro" and other racial slurs are not with mal intent, they are nevertheless construed as offensive and pointedly rude to a significant number of Bucknellians; therefore, the cannot be excused nor justified.

The "Counterweight" publication not only violated the Bucknell Code of Conduct by abusing First Amendment rights, but it also expressed no remorse to the individuals who felt offended and belittled by the publication's discriminatory stance.

"The reason why action should be taken is because the 'Counterweight' is publicized with malicious intent," Garry Thaniel '04 said. "When students gathered to express their grief, the members of the Conservatives Club were not sympathetic. In the least, they implied that they will continue to express their biased views and stir up negative emotions."

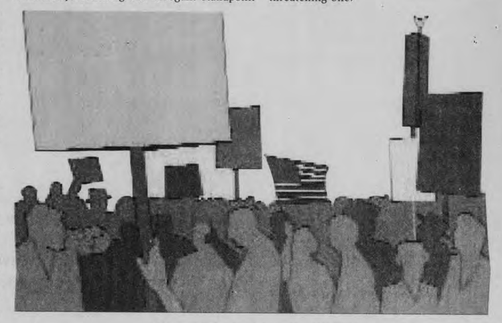
This type of outspokenness is not only condemned by those who were unfairly targeted by the publication, but also by many members of the campus community who were concerned that the "Counterweight" violated the University's Code of Conduct, and, by extension, equal rights for every individual.

If the 'Counterweight' writers wish to market their arrogance, it should not be under the endorsement and representation of the University.

Even more confusing are the statements within the "Counterweight," which allegedly express the publication's objectives. The mission statement reveals, "We, its staff, seek to serve the Bucknell community by infusing it with the ingredients necessary for a balanced educational experience." Yet the disclaimer counteracts this remark by asserting, "The views expressed in the articles herein ... do not reflect ... the Conservatives Club or the Bucknell Community." These two contradictory announcements suggest that the purpose of the "Counterweight" is to undermine the integrity of the University, while causing the student body to bear the burden of its negativity. Speaking on behalf of the victims of the discriminatory, belittling and arrogant standpoint expressed within the publication, it is only imperative that the administration operates within the Code of Conduct by denouncing the recognition of the "Counterweight" as an affiliate of Bucknell.

If the "Counterweight" writers wish to market their arrogance, it should not be under the endorsement and representation of the University. It is a slap in the face to all affiliates of the University that the administration continues to acknowledge the discriminatory publication as representative of the University's ideals. In fact, it is the first time that many students have openly expressed their embarrassment towards the University.

Administrative officials must reconsider their position on the legitimacy of the "Counterweight" with respect to the campus community at large, and with acknowledgementpocrisy that the University will encounter as a promoter of multiculturalism. If this publication is allowed to proceed under the auspices of the University, the future of student life at the University will undoubtedly be a more threatening one.



All you wanted to know about being a superpower, but didn't want to ask

By Michael Niebauer
Senior Writer

You know you are a superpower when your military spending dwarfs the entire military structure of the rest of the world. Leaders proudly and provocatively strut about concerning world affairs, abolishing hard won treaties (Strategic Arms Limitations Talks and the Kyoto Accord). Some are outdated and perhaps flawed, but could be altered instead of abandoned.

You know you are a superpower when you military spending structure dwarfs the entire military structure of the rest of the world.

You know you're a superpower when you can make superficial and wide ranging decisions affecting the lives of millions, without really being held accountable for them. Rose pointed to Rome as a lonely and singular precedent in terms of power over world affairs. How we wield this power should be tempered by a more open embrace of the United Nations.

This should be done because of the new military and economic forces in the world that too easily mix religion with interests and read fanaticism. As Wright wrote, "in an age when hatred abroad morphs easily into mass murder on your own soil, the line between generosity and martyrdom begins to blur." Bush offers the United States as a global, unilateral sheriff. This may seem generous, but will it be a wise offer?

Also, if you insist on being sheriff, the rest of the world should at least agree that the laws you are to enforce are fair. If you fail in this, you set yourself up not just as sheriff, but also judge, jury and, ultimately, executioner. This stance doesn't usually promote peaceful outcomes. How long will we be willing to play this role, and at what cost if we insist on going it mostly alone? You know you're a superpower when you forget your own human fallibility. Even the United States can make mistakes.

In a "Business Week" article, Bruce Nussbaum said that Bush's policy is only half right. Nussbaum recognized the initial sense of urgency to do something, but "preemption as a core principle of the new security doctrine opens Pandora's box by wreaking havoc with traditional norms of self defense."

Rose pointed out as well that right-wing British firebrand Margaret Thatcher and the United States protested the 1981 the bombing of the French-built Iraqi nuclear plant. International rules of behavior must be internationally adhered to or we enter a new world of ongoing uncertainty. Does the United States really want the role of sheriff in this potential environment? Are we willing to project power in sufficient amounts to enforce ... what?

Recent U.S. actions work to denigrate the United Nations and many provisions of treaties and international law. Actions in Panama and Nicaragua prove that we are not above twisting foreign policy for our own narrow needs and domestic consumption. Another sign of a superpower is to deny such uncomfortable facts and to forget that most of the time its actions affect innocent lives.

We owe that to the victims of Sept. 11, those who have died during the sanctions in Iraq and the potential deaths to come as we once again move toward confrontation and another complicated outcome.

"America has historically found it projects power best by exercising it through international institutions operating with shared values and goals," Nussbaum said. "Much has changed since Sept. 11. This hasn't."

These are the problems of a superpower that come with our current uncomfortable crown. We should strive to avoid any self-inflicted wounds.

The Romans failed from their own success; we should learn from their ancient example of overextension through intervention. We should use the international institutions that are in place, improving them rather than ignoring their potential.

People of Lewisburg have right to be upset

By Daniel Morel
Senior Writer

The clock showed 2 a.m. on a Friday night as Galloway residents were unwinding in the lounge to the almost ritualistic sounds outside. Crowds of students leaving the night's festivities pass by on their way home, boisterously chatting and banging the stop sign on 6th and St. George Streets with regularity that pocket watches would envy.

As it approached 3 a.m., a car raced out of the 6th Street borough. Over the engine roar, several male voices were heard shouting a variety of obscenities. Conversation in the lounge stopped briefly. Eyes rolled back in disgust. Reminiscing over living on the edge of campus ensued.

People recalled recent events, such as the night of Friday, Sept. 6, when an inebriated individual threw a cooler at the Galloway kitchen window, shattering it and spreading shards inwards, resulting in bloody feet for the next week. The perpetrator was chased down Smith Quad and lost his shoe in perfect Cinderella form; a pair of sneakers was his price for escape.

Others recall a dreadful accident that occurred weeks ago. A Jeep turned left off of 6th without coming to a full stop. It collided with a small sedan. The sedan's owner was in tears. Her car was totaled; it was scrapped a week later. The Jeep's owner gave an air of disgust at this time-consuming disturbance. Her vehicle appeared unharmed from 10 feet away. Overheard were the words, "Oh my God, at least my car is OK."

Everyone called it a night, having ranted all they want to, but thoughts of living around 6th and St. George lingered in my mind the next day. Three years of waking up to broken bottles and used condoms on the lawn is hard to forget. Neither is the beauty of seeing the fog rise off St. George early in the morning while joggers pass by, waving at Father Marty Moran busily clearing off his porch, University Chaplain Oliver walking his black lab or three years of lockdowns to keep out thieves, stalkers and brave little squirrels.

Having wandered downtown, I made my way back home down 6th Street around 4 p.m. that Saturday. Students were beginning to joyously gather at friends' residences. At one house a stranger approached me, asking if I'd go to the bar with him. Other houses already had bottles circulating among the porch dwellers, while at a third house I saw a keg being lifted up the stairs to the cheers of onlookers.

Parties in the Borough are not a rarity, evident by the girls walking from Vedder Hall wrapped in Saran Wrap and garbage bags for an "anything but clothes" theme party, or the gaggles of skimpily dressed ladies making their way to the "pimps and hoes" parties. These parties do not occur weekly, but the excitement they elicit is nothing new. It is all part of the routine migrations at 9 p.m. and 3 a.m.

With all that occurs in the 6th Street and St. George area, though, there is some relief in seeing some of the uncomfortable sights that accompany the shenanigans. The police cars parked outside every weekend night are a reminder that vandalism and theft occur all the time. Every week this semester the area has had a Public Safety entry involving more than alcohol. Whether Newman House property is being destroyed, microwaves are being stolen or Galloway residents are gearing up for another night of havoc on the house during Halloween, there is a darker side to Borough festivities that merits keeping an eye on.

First Amendment protects even Busta Rhymes

By Jessica Morris
Staff Writer

I find it interesting that one issue of the "Counterweight" slanders Busta Rhymes for the content of his songs and for using the "F-word," and almost the very next issue the publication praises Eminem for advocating free speech—like Busta Rhymes wasn't.

I ask what is the difference between these two artists? They both disrespect women and use the "B-word." In a quote from the "Counterweight" referring to Busta Rhymes, Eminem said, "I didn't even bother to count how many times the F word appears in the songs."

The profanity and hate speech that Eminem is being praised for is the same profanity and hate speech that Busta Rhymes was labeled a bigot for. "Let's do the math, if I black I would've sold half, I ain't have to graduate from Lincoln High School to know that," Eminem said. I hope for our sake that he isn't right.

I think that the article on Eminem in the current issue of the "Counterweight" put this into proper words that should have applied to Busta Rhymes, but obviously did not.

"In spite of our propensity to silence those whose speech is worthless, tasteless or offensive, we allow that speech." Eminem may not be apart of Aryan Nation, but his hate speech against gays and women is still hate speech—instead directed towards a different group of people.

I just hope that if we are going to be advocates of the First Amendment, then allow that First Amendment right to be for everyone and not merely reserved just for the artist that we like and criticized for the artist that we don't like.

I find that the growing backlash against what some may perceive as a growing left-progressive thinking on campus forgetful that the First Amendment protects even Busta Rhymes.

I believe that it takes real courage to oppose the campus orthodoxy, but not backing up what you say through your own actions is an injustice to that First Amendment right that you are trying to protect.

Should we dump the University's idea of "who can say what" and adopt the "Counterweight's"? Even Eminem understands the gravity of backing up everything that he says. "Cus what you say is what say, say what say how you say it whenever you sayin' it / just remember how you said it when you was sprayin' it, so who you playin' wit, huh?" But like Hailie Jade said "I think my dad's gone carazzzzzy."

University does not help race situation

By Aaron Hanlon
Staff Writer

As author Flannery O'Connor so wonderfully articulated, "When the whole world is deaf, you have no choice but to shout." And every morning I wake up in a world that appears to be deaf to the sound of a reasonable argument. Everyone is all of the sudden an expert psychologist and veteran judge at the same time, capable of deciphering observed behavior into hard evidence and proof beyond any reasonable doubt that the infamous "Counterweight" is guilty of malicious intent.

So the "Counterweight" is left standing in the middle of this absurdity, shouting "slander," "libel" and "please don't hurt me!" Has our society fallen to the point of tone-deafness at which no distinction can be made between the civil discussion of sensitive or taboo issues and the deplorable practice of hate speech?

If we are going to uphold the notion that race matters in any circumstance, we must be mature enough to discuss both race-related issues and the implications of these issues on other important topics such as free speech without slandering or libeling people as racist or malicious for simply initiating dialogue in a civil manner.

According to the University's statement regarding the recent controversy over the "Counterweight," the publication included stories that "many felt supported the use of action and speech intended to intimidate and threaten minority students at Bucknell." The "Counterweight" did indeed include articles that discussed the University administration's handling of previous race-related issues in the context of effects on free speech at the University.

The articles' descriptions of the blackface and crank call incidents in no way condoned the offensive acts in question. To the contrary, the author of the blackface article explicitly stated that he was "not defending [blackface]," but simply that "the administration's reaction was also worthy of comment." Though a race-related issue was raised, this is certainly not an indication of intentions to "intimidate and threaten minority students." The very assumption that intent can somehow be interpreted and proven in this case without any expertise or supporting evidence is ludicrous.

If we are going to uphold the notion that race matters in any circumstance, we must be mature enough to discuss both race-related issues and the implications of these issues on other important topics such as free speech without slandering or libeling people as racist or malicious for simply initiating dialogue in a civil manner.

It is unfortunate that our administration has helped to turn two emotionally-charged, race-related issues into campus-wide conflicts by disregarding the essential element of intent in both cases, and stomping on the First Amendment in the process. But it is both unfortunate and ironic that the same administration is now using intent to once again perpetuate the increasing blurriness of the line between discussion of race-related topics and hate speech.

Social change stifled by partisan politics

By Josh Fisher
Opinions Editor

Can the students of the University really reduce to either liberal or conservative? The Greek and the non-Greek? The majority and the minority? The oppressors or the oppressed? Black, white, Asian, heterosexual, homosexual, bisexual, vegan, vegetarian, omnivore, rich, poor or any of the other labels we readily slap on ourselves and each other?

Can these really encapsulate all political and philosophical ideas, all identities and people?

When I was a first-year student, within weeks I discovered that the first key social power at the University was the Greek system. It seemed to govern almost all aspects of social life. I quickly constructed an abstract framework of "Greek/non-Greek," and by mapping certain trends it was easy for me to jump to the conclusion that Greek life stifled diversity, hindered intellectual curiosity and oppressed women. Horror after horror I attributed to Greek life, and I condemned it all—I quickly dismissed it.

Then some the fraternity brothers and sorority sisters I met turned out to be intelligent and often-concerned people. What to do? These people did not fit into the convenient pigeonholes of my paradigm.

Indeed, it has held true to my experience that the stereotypes of the Greek system do not reflect the population of this campus, nor are they responsible for all of the University's troubling ills across the board. And thinking of the entire population in such reducible terms fails because these labels don't always fit.

Such is the problem that has plagued the "Counterweight," "The Catalyst" and the Opinions section of The Bucknellian. We have reduced intellectual discourse to mere mud-slinging, name-calling, and sweeping generalizations about the left and the right. There has been nothing in between.

Indeed the consequence has been no progress in these ongoing debates.

For all our differences, are we still not a group of individuals who have merely come from different backgrounds and different lives, who have different perspectives on politics, philosophy and life? Yet we still reduce full-bodied people to abstract concepts, like "Greek" or "conservative" or "minority." Fundamentally, we have failed to understand individuals as living people, rather than walking cardboard-cutout stereotypes.

Violence against women is real. Sexual assault is real. Hate crimes are real. Those who wish to address issues of racism, sexism, homophobia, gun control or the economic problems of real people in the real world have been caught up in a storm of partisan mud-slinging and name-calling.

We subscribe to these fallacies, believing that one or a few social systems like the Greek system, or the ongoing war-games between the left and the right, govern the dynamics of the whole University—and in the process there is no longer any reason to try to know people, because, having grasped their essence, we dismiss them.

Unlike the labels we so easily place on each other, people are truly multi-sided and irreducibly particular. An analysis of the framework of the University in terms of such hasty generalizations, abstractions and partisan labels is inherently an analysis devoid of the very people it involves. We instead resort to generalizations like "the faculty is too liberal" or "Bucknellians are all spoiled, rich and conservative."

Humans are not isolated, atemporal, static beings who conform to these labels and stereotypes. Humans are social beings, who exist in human relationships. We are imbedded in a historical context, in concrete yet constructed relations with power structures and social structures—property relations, institutional structures, knowledge structures and other parts of everyday life. We are born into relations that form the stage upon which we act. Not only is human action an extension of these social relations, it also the transformation of this society—each moment within a culture is both a limit and a chance for liberation.

Conservatives feel victimized by a liberal administration. Liberals feel victimized by a conservative student body. This back and forth has gone on forever, it seems, and there is no way this is ever going to be resolved.

The discordant sound of this partisan dispute has almost drowned out the very thought of true progress and true change.

Violence against women is real. Sexual assault is real, Hate crimes are real. Those who wish to address issues of racism, sexism, homophobia, gun control or the economic problems of real people in the real world have been caught up in a storm of partisan mudslinging and name-calling. Liberation from the constrictive troubles of these social and power relationships has taken the fall.

These issues that concern these various structures of our society are of importance to the people they affect, and each person's life fares better or worse for the one whose life it is.

Let us not reduce these importance issues to pettiness or name-calling, for a word once uttered cannot be taken aback. Let us speak to each other, not at each other–perhaps then we can grasp the idea of true change, and indeed liberation.

House and Senate approve use of military force in Iraq

By David LaRoss
Writer

President George W. Bush won a major victory for his proposed war against Iraq on Friday, as both houses of Congress approved resolutions that will allow him to use force against Iraqi President Saddam Hussein if he does not give up the weapons of mass destruction that the United States claim Iraq possesses.

With the passage of the "Authorization for Use of Military Force Against Iraq Resolution," Bush has the authority to engage U.S. troops in a pre-emptive strike against Iraq, provided he can prove that the country possesses or is trying to obtain weapons of mass destruction and has the intent to use them. The resolution requests, though it does not require, that the president "obtain prompt and decisive action by the [U.N.] Security Council," to force Iraq to comply with U.N. demands before using military force.

According to The Associated Press, Bush said that Iraq "must disarm and comply with all existing resolutions or it will be forced to comply. There are no other options."

Iraq has long denied the allegations that it possesses biological, nuclear or chemical weapons.

"If the American administration is interested in inspecting these sites, then they're welcome to come over and have a look for themselves," said Deputy Prime Minister Abdul Tawab Al-Mulah Huwaish, who called the accusations "lies," according to CNN.com.

The White House has rejected that offer, saying that it is the United Nations' place to carry out inspections, not the United States'.

The House and Senate passed the identical resolutions last week—the House by a vote of 296-133 on Thursday evening, and the Senate by 77-23 early Friday morning. Both votes were divided along party lines, with only seven Republicans in total voting against the resolution—six representatives, and Sen. Lincoln Chafee of Rhode Island. Twenty-nine Democratic senators and 82 of the party's representatives—among them House Minority Leader Richard Gephardt (D-Mo.), who helped write the resolution—voted with the Republicans.

"I believe we have an obligation to protect the United States by preventing [Hussein] from getting these weapons and either using them himself or passing them or their components on to terrorists who share his destructive intent," Gephardt said to CNN.com.

One of the strongest critics of the action was Sen. Robert Byrd (D-W.Va.), whose threat to filibuster the Senate debates was stopped by a 75-25 vote to end the deliberations entirely on Thursday afternoon.

"Let us stop, look and listen. Let us not give this president or any president unchecked power. Remember the Constitution," said Byrd, who, throughout the debate, had been firmly against giving the president what he said amounted to the authority to declare war—an authority expressly granted to Congress in the Constitution, according to CNN.com.

Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.) spoke for the majority—both in Congress and, according to polls nationwide, among the American people, when he said to The Associated Press, "Giving peace a chance only gives Saddam Hussein more time to prepare for war on his terms, at a time of his choosing, in pursuit of ambitions that will only grow as his power to achieve them grows."

In addition to growing plans for war, according to The New York Times, a plan is already in development for a postwar occupation of Iraq, modeled on the military government installed in Japan after World War II. The proposal would call for a military commander to be installed immediately following the end of the Hussein regime, extending at least until U.S. troops completely search the country for, and dispose of, weapons of mass destruction.

The plan is intended to protect against the infighting that has dominated Afghanistan's politics since the fall of the Taliban, and to prevent external groups from using Hussein's presumed fall to seize power in Iraq.

"We will not be treating Iraq as a defeated nation," one senior administration official said to The New York Times. The goal of the liberation is a "representative, democratic government," the administrator said but "we will get to that through some phases."

Looking ahead to November elections

Courtesy of Reuters

Florida Governor Jeb Bush and Democratic challenger Bill McBride shake hands following a debate in Orlando. Elections in Florida and other states will be close.

By Jim Leahy
Senior Writer

Politicians are working hard heading into the next two and a half weeks, as Election Day is fast approaching. The polls are showing some of the tightest elections in a long time, and the Democrats and Republicans are running around trying to win control of the House and Senate. Candidates are debating the issues concerning the electorate. Voters are beginning to receive their absentee ballots. The next few weeks will hold the answers to how the next couple of years will work in Washington, D.C., and around the nation.

President George W. Bush is out on the campaign trail working hard to support the members of his party running for re-election or for seats that are up for grabs. The biggest and most important job he has is to help the re-election campaign of his brother, Florida Governor Jeb Bush, who, according to a recent MSNBC poll, is only three points ahead of Democratic challenger Bill McBride.

According to The Washington Post, "this may be leading to yet another cliffhanger in Florida, the state that has become synonymous with voting disaster. But at least one county is calling in reinforcements before a third Election Day meltdown. The Miami-Dade Police Department has been tasked with putting all facets of the Nov. 5 election together, from managing logistics and transportation to staffing and training."

This year's campaigns have not been without controversy. In New Jersey, Democratic Sen. Robert Torricelli dropped out of the Senate race after being more than 13 points behind in the polls. After a battle in New Jersey Supreme Court, Democrats replaced Torricelli with former Sen. Frank Lautenberg. Lautenberg, a Democrat, has since taken back the lead from Republican challenger Doug Forrester and, according to the latest Quinnipiac University poll, leads Forrester by 4 percentage points.

In Iowa, Democratic Sen. Tom Harkin became involved in a Watergate-like scandal. "Harkin's campaign provided a digital recorder to a former Harkin aide to take to a Sept. 3 strategy session of the Ganske campaign, to which the former aide had been invited. The campaign then leaked a copy of the recording to an Iowa reporter. Harkin's campaign staff first denied any involvement, then admitted to it," The Washington Post reported. Amazingly, the race is much closer than many had imagined, and this could be one of the closet come Election Day.

New York's gubernatorial race had an interesting event over the weekend with the race's first debate. Incumbent George Pataki, D-N.Y., agreed to the debate only if all the candidates were present. On Sunday, the debate allowed candidates—including those from the Marijuana Reform Party and Right to Life Party—to speak for less than 10 minutes. Andrew Cuomo, candidate for the Liberal Party, refused the invitation to the debate.

"Critics suggest Mr. Pataki insisted on this format to allow only the briefest of opportunities for partisan attacks, and to minimize attention on his main rivals, Mr. McCall and Tom Golisano, the self-financed billionaire and Independence candidate," The New York Times reported. The race remains close, but Pataki is holding a lead that most expect to hold up through the election.

Finally, Bush has been working hard to control the topic of debate on which the election is centered. Iraq has been the primary focus of the president, and Democrats have been pushing hard to move the focus towards the economy.

"The economy has not yet kicked into effect in these races," said Stuart Rothenberg, who publishes a nonpartisan political newsletter and closely follows races for Congress and governor, in The New York Times. "I ask pollsters about this every day and there's no indication that what appears to be an increase in public concern about the economy and Wall Street is taking on a partisan coloration. The public does not yet, and may not ever, blame the president and his party."

The latest CBS News/New York Times poll shows that the public would like to see more done about the economy, "Seventy percent of voters say they want to hear what candidates have to say about the economy, while 17 percent of voters want to hear the candidates' positions on Iraq. Fifty-six percent of Americans, more than at any time since 1993, say the national economy is in bad shape. Just 41 percent approve of the way President Bush is handling the economy—the lowest number since he took office."

The poll also points out, "Republican and Democratic likely voters strongly indicate they will vote along party lines. Independent likely voters, however, are split; just under half say they will vote for the Republican and a similar number plan to cast their ballot for the Democrat. There is a gender gap; men will support the Republican candidate over the Democrat, while women will support the Democrat."

Election Day 2002 will certainly be interesting as many story lines come to an end and some of the tightest elections are contested. The major parties are working hard to secure control of Congress and maintain their seats in gubernatorial races around the country.

U.K. suspends government in Northern Ireland

By David LaRoss
Writer

Since the larger part of the island of Ireland gained its independence from Great Britain in 1949, the British province of Northern Ireland has been torn apart by an internal conflict that sometimes bordered on civil war. Its citizens fought politically between Irish Catholic separatists (or republicans, because they favor a unified Irish republic) and ethnically English Protestants, who generally favor a continued union between Northern Ireland and Britain. Such terrorist organizations as the Irish Republican Army (IRA) also engaged in the violent debate over whether the territory should remain in the United Kingdom.

That debate halted late Monday, as Secretary of Northern Ireland John Reid announced the suspension of its government, placing the province under the direct rule of the national government. This is the fourth time the government has been suspended in its three-year history.

Courtesy of Reuters

Earlier this week, Sinn Fein President Gerry Adams addressed journalists in west Belfast, Northern Ireland. In response to possible IRA intelligence gatherings on government officials, the United Kingdom has suspended Northern Ireland's governing power.

Provincial rule was suspended when the Democratic Unionist Party quit the government entirely, and the more moderate Ulster Unionist Party threatened to follow suit, after evidence came out that the IRA, often associated with the major republican party Sinn Fein, had been spying on government officials and using that information to plan terrorist attacks.

There are indications, according to CNN, that this suspension may last more than three months, which would make it the longest of the four suspensions of local government in Northern Ireland. Reid does not dispute that claim, but has said that he will make every effort to re-establish provincial government before the elections scheduled for next May.

"I hope the decision I have taken today marks a breathing space—a chance to gather strength—before [the peace] process moves forward once again," Reid said on CNN.com.

It is particularly important for Reid and his allies in the Labor Party that the situation be resolved quickly, as peace in Northern Ireland is one of the main goals of British Prime Minister Tony Blair's government.

The Good Friday Agreement established the current government of Northern Ireland in 1998 through an effort to end the conflict in the province by allowing separatists and unionists to govern together within a representative democracy.

"We're just getting on with our normal lives," Belfast resident Jane Fitzpatrick said to Reuters. "It hasn't really affected us too much yet. The politicians will fight it out, I suppose, but everyone knows we can't go backwards."

The Unionist Parties walked out of the government, threatening to paralyze it entirely, to protest Sinn Fein's being allowed to remain in the legislature while not complying with demands to either disarm the IRA or disband it entirely. Gerry Adams, president of Sinn Fein, argued that his party, which is officially opposed to paramilitary groups like the IRA, could not be held responsible for its continued existence, and blamed the unionists' stubbornness in the peace process for their strike.

"We are in this particular situation because once again unionists threaten the institutions and Mr. Reid moved to accommodate them," Adams said.

Reid seemed to place the blame on both sides. In his official announcement he said that "there is absolutely no legitimacy to the use of violence," but also that "I have never met anyone in Northern Ireland outside of the politicians who wishes to get rid of the peace process," as the unionists may be in danger of doing.

Historically speaking, the suspension of government was the most prudent option available to the British government. Peace in Northern Ireland rests on both unionist and separatist factions having some degree of power, and when one or the other is allowed to dominate the government, the situation has almost always degenerated into violence, claiming some 3,600 lives over the course of the conflict.

"Here we go again, right?" Belfast resident Jeremy Logan said on MSNBC.com. "They'll come back to the negotiating table, eventually. They have to. There's no alternative. Or rather, the alternative is too terrible to contemplate."

Tales of a cross country runner

By Evan Honeyfield
Staff Writer

Anyone who follows the women's cross country team will undoubtedly tell you that there is a difference to this year's team. The difference this year is that five out of the top seven runners in every meet so far have been first-year students. Six of these women (Lauren Kinsley, Jamie Gow, Julie Jackaboski, Kayla Halloran, Alison Cole and Rachel Tutmaher) have held positions in the top seven through four meets.

I recently caught up with Halloran, Cole and Tutmaher after a brutal workout that many girls on the team didn't finish. All three are small in stature, but they began to leave their mark as soon as they arrived on campus. Each has finished no worse than sixth for the team so far this season.

BUCKNELLIAN: Talk about your transition from high school to college.

KH: The captains were very helpful in making me feel comfortable here. It took a while to get used to the training. I thought I would get buried in the back of the pack.

RT: College life is a lot to get used to, but I like it more and more.

AC: The older girls were very helpful in answering whatever question we had. Kelly Raffety '05 helped us a lot.

BUCKNELLIAN: Is the training much different?

AC: The main difference is training seven days a week with only one day off per month. I feel Coach focuses on keeping us healthy for four years and not just through the season.

RT: Training intensity is much harder here. I push myself hard every day and the competition is intense.

BUCKNELLIAN: What's the team atmosphere like?

KH: Everyone is very friendly and not as intense as I expected, but still very focused on their running. The girls are laid back, which helps me stay calm on race days.

AC: It is a balance between training/competing seriously and having fun while you are doing the work.

RT: Everyone on the team looks out for each other and are very good friends.

BUCKNELLIAN: You were pretty much the best runners from your high schools. How is running in the pack different?

KH: Running with other people has been the most helpful part of my running, especially in races. I feel so much stronger running in a pack because we all push each other. It's a lot easier than running alone.

AC: Pack running is helpful because everyone works together and pulls each other through the tough moments in practice and races. It helps you focus less on pace and more on everything else going on in the race.

BUCKNELLIAN: What are your goals individually and as a team?

RT: My goals are to stay healthy and keep steadily improving throughout the rest of the season. I think it would be awesome if our team could qualify for nationals.

AC: I would like to see our girl's team have a healthy season and make it to nationals.

KH: I will try to remain in the top three and place in the top 20 in the Patriot League. As a team, I hope we can beat Army so we can be No. 1 in the league. I hope all the injured people recover soon so we can run strong on Nov. 2.

Most likely you will hear of these girls more over the next few years as they continue to develop as runners. Qualifying for nationals this season may be a bit unrealistic for such a young team, but maybe these girls' ability to dream big might be why they are running so big. Don't be surprised to see the Class of 2006 leave with four league titles and a national ranking.

Look for both the men's and women's cross country teams as they split their squads this coming weekend. The varsity is heading to Indiana State to battle it out with most of the top schools in the nation at the Pre-National meet and the junior varsity squad is heading to the Lafayette Invitational.

Women's soccer cannot find net against Army

The Bucknell women's soccer team was unable to manufacture a win on Oct. 12, losing 1-0 to Army at West Point. Bucknell finished the weekend at 5-6-1 overall and 0-3 in the Patriot League.

The weather was a tremendous factor in the game, which was scoreless on both sides through the first half of play. Army is the third Patriot League foe that the Orange and Blue have faced this season. The Bison have yet to score a goal against a league opponent this season, while they have given up five. Michelle Santonacita '05 believes that the opportunity for scoring has recently been there, but the ball has not found the net.

"Not including the past two games, we were in a slump offensively," Santonacita said. "I feel like since we played Cornell we are getting many more chances; we just haven't put the ball away. It's only a matter of time before we put things together."

Laurie Purse '03, solid in goal once again, had four saves, while allowing just the one Black Knight score. Bucknell lost starter Meghan Ferris '06 in the first half of the game to injury. Purse spoke about how the squad will be hurt without Ferris.

"She is a ferocious player on the field, who has come through big for us in games and dominates in the air," Purse said. "I think, at this point in our season, it is a huge disadvantage for us not to have her out there playing with us. She is strong and I hope she will be back soon, but for right now we just need to concentrate on doing what we can to win. Our team has been playing much better these past few games, even if the scoreboard doesn't show it, and we are going to keep playing hard and giving each game everything we have to give. I have a feeling things are going to turn around for us this week."

Santonacita agrees that the team has lost a tremendous player, but she is optimistic about someone else stepping up their game to compensate.

"Ferris is a very strong player who is a presence in the back," Santonacita said. "I think we will be OK because we are trying new formations. Also, [Megan] Farrell '05 is almost ready to return. So we lose a quality player but gain another good one."

In the 61st minute of the game, Army's Delaney Brown headed the ball to Leigh Kosco who netted what was ultimately the game winner. The Bison did not give up, as Annie Greenspun '05 had a head shot at the goal with just about six minutes remaining that was saved by the Black Knight goalie. Meghann Chipko '05 said what a great attempt Greenspun's shot was and how the save broke the team's heart.

"It was awesome," Chipko said. "She has been a huge impact player lately. It is good to see players like her step up and give us opportunities to score. We had a couple chances to score but not that many, so it was unfortunate that her ball did not go in."

Head Coach Chrissy Findlay has been adamant about sorting out the team's deficiencies and providing answers to them.

"Our primary problem has been with our consistency all over the field," Findlay said. "There have been too many goals scored on us and they have put us behind quickly. Is this team trying too hard to figure out a problem rather than just going out and playing soccer? At times, maybe, but our morale is overall OK.

"We are a close team, win or lose. Because of this we work hard every day and the women respect each other as players. It will take continued perseverance, team focus and a willingness to work hard every day. Having fun has never been a problem for our team. We seem to always find a way to play hard and keep perspective on things, " Findlay said.

The men's soccer team increased its wins to 10 this past week with victories over St. Francis and SHU. This is the first time the team has reached 10 wins in a season since 1993.

Bucknell updated the record books on Tuesday, Oct. 15 when it reached double figures in the win column. St. Francis did not have a chance, as the Bison outscored them 2-1. Greg Buzzell '05 scored his first goal of the season in the 31st minute of the game. Pat Glennon '04 and Ori Adrabi '05 connected a pass that assisted the goal. Buzzell blasted a shot from 20 yards out to take the 1-0 lead.

Chris Beekman '04 increased the lead to two just 10 minutes into the second half. St. Francis retaliated five minutes later, but the final score of the game remained 2-1. Beekman now has two goals for the season. Jon Hemmert '05 and Tom Ryan '03 were accredited with the assists.

Hemmert received his team-leading 10th assist during this past week of soccer matches. He also leads the team in points with a total of 14 for the season so far. Hemmert is two assists shy of the school single-season record.

The team looks for Hemmert to take the free kicks anywhere within 35 yards of the goal.

"He is so accurate on restarts we feel we can score anytime we have a restart in the offensive third," Head Coach Brendan Nash said.

On Sunday, Oct. 13, the Bison outscored Sacred Heart 2-1 with back-to-back goals towards the end of the first half. Hemmert scored the first goal of the game around the 32 minute marker. The Orange and Blue defense transitioned out of the back with a pass to Eric Brunton '06. He then made a crisp pass to Hemmert, who was waiting on the flank. Hemmert took a rifling shot from 35 yards out to put the ball away in SHU's net.

The Bison wasted no time in achieving their second goal of the game. Hemmert, from his outside midfield position, crossed a beautiful ball to the far post. Michael Lookingland '05 met the ball in the box and managed to get a piece of it with his head. At the same time, Brunton was making a run in the box behind Lookingland. Brunton received the deflection from Lookingland's head and sent the ball past the diving SHU goalkeeper for the 2-0 lead.

Bucknell appeared to have complete control of the game, until the Pioneers snuck one behind keeper Adam Edwards '06 just four minutes into the second half.

Sacred Heart took it to Bucknell the entire second half, outshooting the Bison 9-8. The Orange and Blue's defense managed to fend SHU off to secure Bucknell's ninth win of the season.

The Bison are looking to improve their season to 11 wins. Their next match is against Lehigh Saturday, Oct. 19 at 7 p.m..

Bison fall to Lock Haven

By Ashley Hall
Staff Writer

The Bison field hockey team fell victim to a strong performance by Lock Haven on Tuesday, Oct. 15, ultimately losing by a score of 3-1. The loss was the team's only game this past week, as the Friday night contest against Quinnipiac was canceled due to inclement weather.

Lock Haven came into this game as the second-place team in Division II rankings, and also had a four-game winning streak on the line.

Lock Haven struck first, as Nikki Sweger scored the first goal 12 minutes, 4 seconds into the game, but the tenacious Bison squad held them at bay for the rest of the half.

The game came to life in the final few minutes of play, as the Bison evened up the score 47:30 into the game. The Orange and Blue capitalized on a penalty corner when Meiko

Boynton '05 hit a shot from 12 yards out. Both teams held up defensively for another seven minutes, until Sweger scored her second goal of the match to put the Eagles on top for good. Lock Haven netted an insurance goal when Jen DeNault swatted a shot out of midair to bring the score to 3-1, 58:30 into the game.

Assisting the Eagles' goals were Hale and Ebaugh. Boynton's goal, her sixth of the season, was assisted by Lindsey Gentel '04 and Stephanie Cabral '05.

Orange and Blue goalkeeper Sonja Wettergreen '03 was solid despite the loss, as she recorded 10 saves. Lock Haven's goalie Melissa Stubblefield had five saves.

Lock Haven outshot Bucknell 19-9. The Bison had 11 penalty corners, while the Eagles had 12.

Although the loss was disappointing, the Bison remain optimistic.

"We have unbelievable potential. Being such a young team, everything is a learning experience," Lindsey Gentel '04 said. "We did not play our best against Lock Haven and I believe the team is going to embrace this game as a learning experience about how imperative it is to always play with that burning desire to win and compete. Yes, the outcome of the game is disappointing, but it just might be the reality check we need."

The win runs Lock Haven's impressive record to 13-2 on the season, as they reeled in their fifth straight victory. The Bison's record dropped to 5-8 overall, but is still 2-2 in Patriot League competition.

The Bison hope to get back to their winning ways at Vermont on Sunday, Oct. 19 at 1 p.m.

Volleyball downs Army 3-1 in PL match

The Bison are riding a three-game win streak and are 4-2 in Patriot League competition

After beating Navy last week in three games, the Bucknell women's volleyball team is on a roll. The Bison are on a three-match winning streak and have improved to 4-2 in the Patriot League and a 10-8 overall record.

On Saturday night the Bison completed their weekend road trip with a 3-1 victory over the Black Knights of Army. The Bison were led to victory by Melanie Ghiz '03, who had 17 kills; and Jennifer Wrigley '03 and Brandi Trapasso '04, who each contributed 14 kills to the Bison victory.

The Bison fell in the first game of the night by a score of 30-23, but the Orange and Blue came back to win the next three consecutive games, 30-27, 30-25 and 31-29.

Breann Trapasso '04 led the offense with 35 assists, and Chelsea Anderson '06 led the team with 19 digs while Brandi Trapasso added 15 and Wrigley contributed 14 to the victory. Ghiz had a strong offensive hitting percentage of .341 and added six blocks to her 17 kills throughout the match.

On Friday, Oct. 11, the Bison beat Patriot League foe Holy Cross, 3-0. Bucknell gained its first win of the night in a 30-22 victory over the Crusaders. The Orange and Blue easily defeated Holy Cross in the second match, 30-17, and in a close third game, Ghiz's six kills helped lead the Bison to a 30-25 victory.

Ghiz had 14 kills on the night and had an extremely solid .500 hitting percentage. Wrigley had nine kills. Breann Trapasso marked 35 assists in the winning effort. Brandi Trapasso tallied eight digs and eight kills on a night that marked her 1,000th career dig, now tallying a total of 1,018 after the Army game.

Brandi Trapasso is only the third Bucknell athlete to reach the 1,000 mark in career digs on the all-time charts. Ghiz received the September Athlete of the Month Award from local cosponsors K.I.C.K.S. Martial Arts for Women and Curves for Women.

Ghiz has had an excellent year so far; she leads the team in hitting with a .227 percentage and has marked 200 kills in 54 games. She also leads the team in blocking with .72 blocks per game for the season.

Ghiz was also named the Bull Run Inn Athlete of the Week from the Athletics Communications office. Ghiz had a .403 hitting percentage between the two matches against Army and Holy Cross this weekend. She had 14 kills, three aces, three digs and six assists with only one error in the game against Holy Cross.

The Bison now hold a 10-8 overall record and are 4-2 in the Patriot League. Bucknell will face Patriot League foe Colgate on Friday, Oct. 18 in Hamilton N.Y., before traveling to Syracuse, N.Y., for a non-league match with LeMoyne College on Sunday, Oct. 20 at 2 p.m.

NFL Predictions

Denver (4-2) at Kansas City (3-3)
This is a matchup of the two last place teams in the AFC West, and also a matchup of Denver's NFL leading rush defense (62 yards/game) against Holmes who leads the NFL in rushing with 653 yards. Kansas City is the highest scoring offense in the league, and who wouldn't be with Holmes running and opening the field so much for Trent Green? The key to a Denver win will be the containment of Holmes, because if the Broncos don't have to stack eight in the box, Green won't have as much one-on-one coverage as he is used to seeing. Denver gets the W.

San Francisco (4-1) at New Orleans (5-1)
This game pits the highest scoring offense in the NFC, the Saints, against the defense of the 49ers, which has allowed the third fewest points in the league. The Niners' defense is allowing over a 100 yards rushing a game, which bodes well for the NFC's leading rusher, Deuce McCallister. The Niners arguably possess the most talented wide receiver in Terrell Owens, so don't be surprised if he just breaks open the game with a few big catches. The Saints will rectify a 38-0 loss to the 49ers in last season's finale with a victory, giving them the best record in the NFL.

Tampa Bay (5-1) at Philadelphia (3-2)
Philadelphia has to address one key issue if it hopes to win—protecting McNabb. McNabb has been dropped in the backfield more than any other NFC quarterback, and this week he is facing one of the most formidable defenses in the league that is also second in the NFL in sacks. The Bucs have not allowed an offensive touchdown in their last three games and are currently riding a five-game winning streak.

The Eagles are ranked first in the NFC in total offense, averaging 33 points a game. Ultimately, the Bucs' defense will be too much for McNabb and Co.

San Diego (5-1) at Oakland (4-1)
Oakland WAS the league's last undefeated team, until they lost to the best 0-5 team ever, and so the 1972 Dolphins drank champagne. Oakland will be looking to reclaim first place in the division from the Chargers, who played sloppy last week but were able to squeak by for a 35-34 over the top-scoring offense in the league. Oakland averaged 40.5 points a game before last week, and look for them to reclaim that offensive poise. The Chargers allowed a total of only 64 points in their first five games before last week, so we now know what matchup will determine this game. Oakland's offense against San Diego's defense, and each showed weaknesses last week. With Oakland's defense keying on the NFL's second leading rusher, Tomlinson, look for Drew Brees to have a major impact. Oakland gets my pick just because they're playing at home.

Indianapolis (4-1) at Pittsburgh (2-3)
The Steelers secondary was annihilated in their first two losses, by Brady and Gannon, who combined to throw for 697 yards against Pittsburgh in the first two weeks. This week, Manning will have his chance. The Steelers need to pressure him constantly, and the most likely to do so is Joey Porter, who leads the AFC in sacks. The Colts defense has vastly improved this season. They are still allowing 137 rushing yards a game, and the Bus is the perfect weapon to exploit this. The Steelers are 9-0 at home on Monday nights—expect that to be 10-0.

Seabiscut ... what a stud

The Thoroughbred racehorse is the epitome of athletic beauty. Every inch of its 1,100-pound body appears to have been designed expressly for the purpose of soaring down the homestretch before the riveted gaze of a grandstand packed with 50,000 spectators. Generations of physical perfection have stunned animal lovers, sports fans and grizzled gamblers alike. They are breathtaking creatures, these animals—graceful, arching necks, ferocious black eyes, sweeping tails and fluttering manes, mighty chest and slender legs, all draped in coats of deep chocolate, steely gray or jet black, accented by curious splashes of white on the forehead and legs. We tend to remember all of the great ones not just for their talent, but also their grand appearance.

Well, almost all of them. It would be hard to employ such a flattering visual account when describing one of the most popular horses of all time.

Seabiscuit had great bloodlines; after all, his granddaddy was the incomparable, vibrant red Man O'War, a horse who had smashed world records left and right in 1919 and 1920. And that was about where Seabiscuit's good fortune started and ended.

He was cursed from the day he was born in 1933, with knock knees, stubby legs and a dull, bland coat–no shimmering tints of gold in his fur, no pretty white markings, just a plain old mud-colored bay coat. It didn't get a lot better for him as he got older; as a yearling he looked and moved like an unpedigreed farm nag.

He began his career under the tutilage of one of the greatest horse treainers of all-time, Sunny Jim Fitzimmons. Sunny Jim didn't have time to coddle Seabiscuit, a horse that seemed to be nothing more than a lazy, clunky, glutenous future-claimer.

The little horse ran 35 times as a two-year-old, compared with the normal nine or 10 starts that most horses had at that age. Fitzimmons and his assistant trainers beat Seabiscuit into the ground, bad knee and all, but he only pulled out five wins that year. Hardly the picture of greatness, right?

Luckily for Seabiscuit, his life was about to switch leads. Tom Smith, a much quieter and humbler trainer than Sunny Jim, bought the cranky, over-raced horse on behalf of Charles S. Howard for $7,500. He'd get a new rider, too.

Red Pollard wasn't a whole lot more athletically acclaimed than his dumpy mount at this point in his career. An ex-boxer, the one-eyed jockey had only won three stakes races in his entire life. For a pair like that, it would have been an astounding overachievement to simply hit the board in a single stakes race.

Two wrongs may not make a right, but apparently two losers can make a winner. The cantankerous little colt, it turns out, was as fond of winning as he was of eating and sleeping. Aided by the confidence of Pollard and Smith, Seabiscuit managed to steamroll his way to a few stakes victories, and even set a few track records in the process.

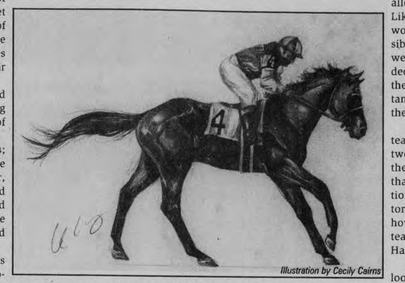

Illustration by Cecily Cairns

By 1937, he'd gained the affection of the racegoing public as well. Everyone an ugly duckling, and Seabiscuit could have been the poster-boy for ungainly cygnets everywhere. He won 11 of 15 races in his four-year-old season, and was overshadowed only by that year's Triple Crown winner War Admiral.

War Admiral was the opposite of Seabiscuit, although they shared a common bloodline; the jet-black classic winner was a knock-out and an instant fan favorite. It wasn't long before a match race was arranged in 1938.

The media had a heyday with the matchup, calling it the race of the century. In reality, the race was absurdly leaning in War Admiral's favor. His blazing speed, excellent condition and mind-blowing talent made him an instant favorite.

Seabiscuit was the sentimental choice, of course, but sentiments don't win races. He was without Pollard, whose leg had been smashed earlier in the year, so badly that he was told he would never ride again. He was run-down from a long and grinding career. And he looked almost comatose in the post parade.

He perked up when the starter's bell sounded, though. He perked way up.

Carrying the red and white silks of Howard's stables, the equine version of "the little engine that could" just chugged his way to the lead and stayed there for the rest of the race. He thumped the Triple Crown winner, the regal betting-favorite, by four lengths.

You'd think that would be enough for one career, and Seabiscuit's connections felt the same, especially after he bowed a tendon in an allowance race shortly afterwards. Like Pollard, future competition would practically be a medical impossibility. Of course, impossibilities were The Biscuit's forte. Pollard decided to join in the effort. After all, they still hadn't won the most important race in the country at that time, the Santa Anita Handicap.

In 1940, Pollard and Seabiscuit teamed up for an encore. They lost two races, inciting speculation that they should never have returned, that this was unnecessary humiliation for the gallant old steed. A victory in the San Antonio Handicap, however, was enough to give the team one last try at the Santa Anita Handicap.

Late in the stretch, with the wire looming, the crowd went berserk, chanting their ugly duckling's name as he steamed behind the leaders. Seabiscuit was obedient to their plea, and shot through an opening between horses, gliding to a win in stakes record time.

He retired for good after that, with then-record earnings of $437,730. Not surprisingly, he wasn't much at stud. He passed down his knock knees and bad conformation, but not his heart—that was one in a million.

Seabiscuit's entire career was littered with doubts—doubts from trainers, from fans, from opponents—but he trudged through adversity with courage that is rare even among the most perfect of creatures. Seabiscuit always seemed to know he was capable, as did those who cared most about him.

When the two returned to racing in 1940, Pollard based his faith on the fact that he and his horse had "four good legs between them." Sometimes that's all it takes.

Four good legs and one big heart.

What chu tawkin bout Barry

Nothing warms the heart and loosens the bowels like seeing Barry Bonds' smiling mug plastered over every major periodical, sports journal and online news source from here to Okinawa. I have to imagine that even Barry Bonds is sick of hearing about Barry Bonds.

But before I get to the meat of this article, I want to make a quick prediction, though I have picked only one winner all year, and that was "Star Wars: Episode II" (superior flick!). The Giants have always been very streaky, and with Jeff Kent having knocked in one RBI all postseason, I don't think that will be enough if the Angels pitch around Barry. I'll have to say Anaheim in six.

But enough with the pedantic babbling, let's talk about Barry Bonds. People print Bonds articles with the regularity of a printed readout of Stephen Hawking's voice pattern. Oh the many things I could add to the discussion about Barry. <awkward pause> OK, so here's what I came up with:

I suppose if I were Jean Francois Lyotard, I could claim that Barry is a very "modern" ballplayer because of his self-absorption and abrasive "uniqueness," his unwillingness to fit into his surroundings and his inability to defy meta-narratives to the point where he not only is a narrative, but rather exists solely within a narrative and in no other form.

If I were Sigmund Freud, I would say that Barry possesses a latent homosexual desire and a phallic obsession. Not only with commentary that allows one to put "good wood on the ball" or "stroke one long," the bat is a symbol for Barry's little "bonds," and he feels it is the only tool he possesses to acquire power over others. As Teddy Roosevelt said, "speak softly and carry a big stick and you will go far." For Barry, one out of two ain't bad.

If I were Albert Einstein, I would hypothesize that the speed at which the ball leaves the pitcher's hand, combined with the speed at which Barry's bat contacts said ball, would create a hyperbola that would allow you to enter different fissured layers of space-time, and thus allow him to plot the trajectory of the ball over the right field fence. Essentially, Barry Bonds is only as good as he is because he managed a technique that defies space and time, and is essentially cheating.

If I were William Shakespeare, I would say "Spit, yon further friend of Cali be, but live no more to play as thee. Thy glory fleeting, thy candles wrought, for Anaheim's sake, may your bats be rot." I would also contemplate the injustice involved in allowing an athlete to capture the attention of so many while my own texts kindle only hatred in the minds of the young and simple-minded.

If I were Walter Benjamin, I would say that one could easily market Bonds via bobble-heads, rally-flags, bottle openers, soda cans, clothing lines, autographed cards, photos, posters and commemorative plaques. And when I finally looked outside my Ikea-catalog home circa "Fight Club" and saw Barry's toothy grin floating overhead on the side of a zeppelin, I would probably faint in a pool of my own spittle.

If I were Niccolo Machiavelli, I would wonder why Bonds was wasting his time on a baseball diamond when he could be usurping the throne of America. With all his popular clout, and the precedent of Jesse Ventura still rummaging through the trash of America's political conscious, there's no reason why he couldn't stage a coup de Bush and institute a tyrannical regime where everyone must shave their heads and act pompous or face his wrath.

If I were James Joyce, I would say "Bonds. Clever Irishman. Bat like a raging polygamist swamp-sow cracking nightmares into oceans. Pac Bell. A park on the water. Under. Tow. I gurgle thinking of my dead mother. Usurpation? Nay. Kidneys and domination."

If I were Bob Costas, I would say Barry Bonds reminds me of a very young Joe "Ducky" Medwick. You know, funny story about Ducky … what? What do you mean no one wants to hear my lame stories? But I broadcasted the Olympics.

If I were Kubla Khan, I would wonder where my damsels with dulcimers had run off to.

If I were Coolio, I would hold Barry's hand though he walks through the valley of the shadow of Angels and tell him he should fear no double plays.

If I were Tom Cruise I would ask him to let me be his agent because all I want to do is show him the money, although, I'd secretly believe in my heart that he completes me.

If I were Anna Nicole Smith, I would consider marriage.

If I were LL Cool J, I would wonder whether we could both star in a movie together about the rough and tumble world of baseball.

If I were Albert Camus, I must imagine Barry is happy.

If I were Kit from Knight Rider, I'd wonder if his bat needed turbo boost.

If I were He-Man, I would have performance anxiety.

If I were John Steinbeck, I would tell Barry to take the pearl from his ear and throw it back into the ocean.

If I were Plato, I'd wonder what Socrates sees in his wife.

If I were John Wayne Bobbit, I'd contemplate another surgery.

If I were the umpire, I would measure Barry's elbow pad.

If I were George Michael, I would measure Barry's …

If I were George Jetson, I'd shout "JANE! STOP THIS CRAZY THING!"

Shake it Up

Variety is the spice of life. This is an idea mastered a long, long time ago by the Mormons. You see, I am constantly influenced by daily occurrences and enjoy engaging in conversation. And I find that the more masses of people I can converse with, the greater and more true answers I find. Case in point: it was dinnertime and I was chatting with a few lady friends and I happened to be perusing the latest edition of The Bucknellian. Well, the conversation eventually led to, "Have you read my article lately?"

To which the ladies replied, "Yes, we have, but I am not too keen on football happenings, especially in a sports context." They may not have realized I would write about them this week, but they proved that speaking up can pay dividends, and in honor of their suggestions, I will also include insight into some of the less published sports in a more user-friendly voice in bringing you the sports week in review!

As luck would have it, both the teams I wanted to win their respective baseball division lost and, as such, the San Francisco Giants will be facing the Anaheim Angels in a Californian World Series. A series pitting, for the first time, two wild-card teams that not too long ago would not have been afforded this opportunity.

It feels odd not commenting about the Yankees right now. They seem to be the America's team of baseball, as the Dallas Cowboys are to football — love 'em or hate 'em. This World Series will probably not receive much publicity, except by diehard baseball fans. Of course, the Bucknell "bubble" will not help bring attention to the series either. The big story surrounding the series is whether or not the Angels pitching staff will pitch to Barry Bonds and shift their entire team to the outfield warning track or avoid his home run potential and roll out the red carpet to first base.

"We'll just be smart. I don't think we'll be scared of him and pitch around him," said Jarrod Washburn, opening series starter for the Angels.

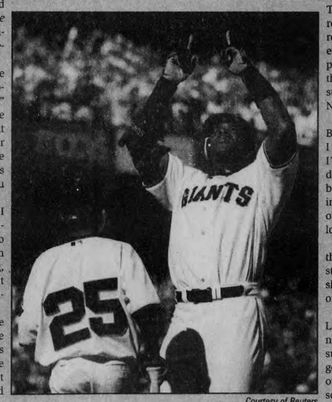
My thoughts exactly. Hands down, you have to go after this guy. While he has had impressive numbers the past two seasons, if you approach the situation of believing that you can outmatch Bonds, then you have the advantage no matter the odds. Didn't the movie "Braveheart" prove that?

It's official, the St. Louis Rams have won their first game of the year! Sure it is the seventh week of the NFL season, but you have to start somewhere. In a matchup of the only undefeated team, the Raiders versus the winless Rams, it was the Rams who looked like a Super Bowl contender with backup quarterback Marc Bulger at the helm. Spreading the field and mixing up the run pass distribution were paramount to a productive offense. (Seems like he got an advance copy of this article's variety message!)

Did you notice the Pittsburgh Steelers' offense on hyper-drive last week? It seemed like the entire team was playing for their jobs, behind another solid start from quarterback Tommy Maddux and running back Jerome Bettis. "The Bus," as he is known, ran for 109 yards and reached the end zone twice to provide an exclamation point to the victory over the 0-6 Cincinnati Bengals.

The Decker Effect of the week goes to Houston Texans' offensive tackle Tony Boselli, who was placed on injured reserve and will most likely be out for the rest of the season. Boselli was a highly touted prospect out of college, but has been plagued by injuries and could not recover to the degree needed to be the veteran cornerstone of a young charged with protecting No. 1 pick quarterback David Carr.

"I'm confident I'll be back out there," Boselli said. "Obviously it's not the timetable I wanted. If I thought there was no chance I'd play again, we'd quit and go a different direction, but I'm confident I can play football still and that's the direction we're going in. They want me out there and I want to be out there. We just have to wait a little longer."



Courtesy of Reuters
Barry Bonds and the Giants are looking towards the heavens for a World Series victory.

The first pick in the expansion draft for the Texans, Boselli was supposed to bring stability to a young team looking for leadership. Not this year, maybe next, or the next or …?

The mistake of the week comes from Lakers' big man Shaquille O'Neal. Shaq had not been given clearance to do much on his surgically repaired right big toe, but after a good night's sleep, he felt strong and jumped on a treadmill before practice Monday to do some light jogging. After practice Tuesday, he said the bottom of his foot was bothering him.

"I wasn't supposed to do that," the Lakers' center said.

Maybe the doctors know what they are talking about. Then again, I still have that major cough and throat cold going around from last Friday.

To the little-known American soccer league, the MLS, Washington Revolution's Steve Nicol has captured the 2002 Coach of the Year Award. Nicol led his squad on an improbable run to the Eastern Conference championship.

The former Scotland and Liverpool player assumed the reigns of the Revolution on May 23 after the squad stumbled to a 2-4-1 start under Fernando Clavijo.

To the links, Phil Tataurangi shot a 10-under 62 to win the Invensys Classic at Las Vegas. Shocked by his play, Tataurangi commented, "No way did I start out the day thinking I had a chance to win."

Now that you are complete with your sports digest, enjoy your fall break.

Lights ... camera ... successful leadership

University leadership conference, organized by Dean Amy Badal and students, teaches leadership and communication skills

By Leah Cunningham
Staff Writer

Held on Oct. 12, the University's second annual "Lights ... Camera ... Leadership" Student Leadership Conference, organized by Dean of Students Amy Badal and a student planning committee, gave interested students an opportunity to strengthen their leadership skills and learn new devices geared towards group communication. Students engaged in several sessions, which varied from "Effective Public Speaking" to "Interviewing Skills," with University faculty and staff who volunteered as group facilitators.

Badal and the Conference Planning Committee were impressed with the student turnout and excited to see so many motivated and eager students.

"Our goal was to introduce students to concepts of leadership and focus on topics related to skill-building," Badal said. "We wanted to strengthen students in leadership positions as well as give other students the opportunity to foster leadership skills."

The conference saw a turnout of 60 students.

"I wasn't sure what to expect and I didn't know what I'd be learning about leaders, but we were able to pick what we were interested in and wanted to learn about," Gretchen Perry '06 said.

The "Managing Stress, Managing People" session, led by Director of Community Health Promotion Tracy Shaynak, was most beneficial to Perry.

"We talked about how stress affects leaders ... and then we did this relaxation technique which involved putting a Skittle in your mouth and focusing so hard on the Skittle that you are able to clear your mind—it's a good technique when you're stressed out," Perry said.

Other sessions included "Effective Communication Skills for Student Leaders," "Effective Public Speaking," "Using Positive PR to Boost Your Success!" and "Can a Meeting be Fun and Effective?" Scott Messinger '06 particularly enjoyed University Chaplain Ian Oliver's advice in the "Can a Meeting be Fun and Effective?" conference.

"Ian Oliver made a good point about meetings. He explained that when people come to meetings, they don't just come to be there. They bring their whole lives with them, and sometimes the only reason they are in the organization is for a self-confidence booster. He said that we need to meet people where they are, and I thought this was an interesting way to look at it," Messinger said.

"I think it went really well. I liked watching the students engage themselves; they all had different stories and perspectives," Nicole Chabot '03, who is involved in the conference student Planning Committee, said of the day.

The conference concluded with keynote speaker George Burman '74, who is well known for founding J.Jill, the women's clothier.

"It was great being able to talk with the speaker one-on-one after his talk," Messinger said.

"The speaker was great and, as a whole, the day went really well. Everyone I talked to had positive comments. I'd love to be involved next year and anyone that wants to be involved should also consider doing it ... [It was] great experience to plan a conference ... lots of fun," Conference Planning Committee member Jeff Proch '04 said.

"Seeing all the students eager to be there on a rainy Saturday, even when they were tired, said a lot about who they were as people. I think the day was a big success," Badal said.

Students who wish to be involved in future leadership programs should contact Badal.

Reverse Abroad: Indonesia to Pa.

By Astri Prakoso
Contributing Writer

A year ago, if you had asked me about the University, I would have frowned and said in a confused tone, "Bucknell?" Now here I am; it is my turn to explain to my family and friends back home in Indonesia what and where Bucknell is.

You are probably wondering, if I live in halfway around the world, how did I hear about the University? Well, a friend of mine here went to a high school in California. One fateful day last year in October, she revealed the University's existence to me. "Well, if you want a small sized school, which has a good liberal arts background, and if you want snow, you might want to try to apply to Bucknell," she said. So I applied and before I knew it I was in Lewisburg, Pa.

Although I knew that Lewisburg was small, never did I imagine it would be this small. I came from a country with population of more than 200 million people. I live in Jakarta, the capital of Indonesia, a city of 17 million people.

On my way to campus after arriving at Harrisburg airport, I was freaking out because my family and I could not find Lewisburg on the map that the car rental service gave us. I was wondering, Why did I leave my beloved city and march to this unknown place that does not even have its own dot on the map?

In that same week, I was very appalled when I went to Harrisburg and met a man who had been living there his whole life and had never heard of Lewisburg. By that time, I was considered begging my parents to give me a plane ticket home.

That same day, I was amazed when we got lost and a man drove us back to where we needed to go. This stranger showed us to where we needed to be. Wow, that would never happen in Jakarta.

Part of the reason that I decided to go to the University was that I was ready for a change from the city. As much as I love the city, with its hustle and bustle and mixture of cultures and never-ending activities, it drives me nuts from time to time. There is no time to help some stray foreigners in the street, no time to rest; everything is a race.

The hardest thing to do when you live abroad is to adjust."Masuk kandang kuda meringkik, masuk kandang kambing mengembik. Neigh when entering a horse's stable, bleat when entering a barn full of sheep," as an Indonesian proverb says.

Fortunately for me, coming to Lewisburg is not the first time I've lived abroad, so I kind of knew what it was going to be like the challenges, the ups and downs.

Imagine going to a country with a language you are not used to ... It was a scary experience, being dropped in a country with a culture completely unlike mine with an alien language. With time, since I lived in a boarding house, language became a survival tool; it was learn fast or die. I survived.

Living abroad is definitely the best experience, but it is not always fun. You will have to adjust to the local culture. In a way, adjusting to the local culture can be exciting, but it can also be your worst nightmare.

Imagine going to a country with a language that you are not used to. I remember the first time I lived abroad, in 1999, in Sydney, Australia. It was horrible. I could barely speak English at all. Everyone was speaking too fast and I had to think forever to answer questions: What are they saying? How do I say what I want to say? What is that word? These were the questions I always asked myself.

It was a scary experience being dropped in a country with a culture completely unlike mine with an alien language. With time, since I lived in a boarding house, language became a survival tool; it was learn fast or die. I survived.

It was such an exhausting task, to switch from one language to another. Some days I felt so frustrated that I didn't feel like talking to anyone at all. I still do that once in a while. Whenever I feel tired of speaking English, I space out, find a friend who speaks my language, or read a book in Indonesian.

The funniest thing about learning English was that when I was in Australia, everyone thought I was American because I had an American accent. The only explanation I could think of was because I've always watched American movies, which were a form of subconscious learning.

I think in a way my accent was an aspect of why my Australian experience was not good; I could barely understand Australians, because I wasn't used to the accent. It worked both ways, and I think the Australians could barely understand my mixed-up Indonesian-American accent.

Compared to Australia, the University is a piece of cake, at least now that I understand and feel comfortable speaking English. Two hard parts of adjusting here have been juggling my time and adapting to the culture. I have to go to classes, do my work and have fun with my hallmates, my American friends in general and my international friends. So far, I've been enjoyed myself here on campus, meeting new people, getting a different atmosphere from home and having the freedom of being away from home, of course.

"He who asks a question is a fool for five minutes; he, who does not ask, remains a fool forever," as a Chinese proverb says.

Sometimes, I get funny questions, such as "So what language do you speak in Indonesia?" I'd take a few seconds to answer that question—"Indonesian." Some other times, people try to explain a word to me, even when I do understand it; it is frustrating to think that people think I am not that comfortable with the language, but sometimes it is helpful, too.

Some ask where Indonesia is, or they mistake it for another place. This used to offend me, but I'm not an American geography expert, so there is no point in getting offended. I guess these kinds of silly mistakes happen when you cross cultures. But I guess I ask Americans silly questions, so it's OK if I laugh at them because they laugh at me, too. In my opinion, if you can laugh at yourself, then you are entitled to laugh at someone else.

Sometimes, the little things that we take for granted can cause problems. Once I was talking to a friend who is older than I am and as we were walking his friend came over and started to talk to him, after first being introduced to me. They were having a conversation about things that I did not know about. So I just left.

It's beautiful that there are so many different ways of looking at one thing, and none of them are wrong. There are so many things to discover and learn. It's what life is all about—to try everything, to live up to the adventure and to answer the challenge.

In Indonesian culture, this is acceptable because it is rude to interrupt an older person's conversation. Here, it is rude for me to just leave without saying goodbye. I didn't understand this then, and a misunderstanding arose. Fortunately, it is fine now.

In a way, most misconceptions arose because each of us come from different backgrounds and experiences—even if two people are from the same nation, the customs of their houses can differ. Yet, the meeting of cultures is the most beautiful thing I've discovered so far.

It's beautiful that there are so many different ways of looking at one thing, and none of them is wrong. There are so many things to be discovered and learned. It's what life is all about, to try everything, to live up to the adventure, to answer the challenge.

"Sour, bitter, sweet, pungent, all must be tasted," a Chinese proverb says.

Here at the University, I'm having the experience of a lifetime. I'm having another taste of the world, outside of Indonesia and Australia. It's interesting to see how these countries differ and how they are the same.

Although it is scary at times to expose myself to different worlds, the fruit of this adventure is sweet. It opens my mind to different paradigms and, somehow, it helps me to figure out what life is all about.

My adventure in the United States is near the starting point, and there are miles to go. I have no doubt that there will be times when I want to get out of here, but, in the end, it will be worth it. As Eleanor Roosevelt once said, "If life were predictable, it would cease to be life and be without flavor."

Packwood House Museum seeks University connection

By Caitlin McKee
Staff Writer

There are many hidden treasures in Lewisburg. One of these is The Packwood House Museum. Sara Kelly, director of the museum, which is located at 15 North Water St., said that Packwood House is a unique place.

"Packwood House is a world-class museum right in your own backyard. We have an excellent collection," Kelly said.

The museum is a three-story log building that has previously served as a tavern and a hotel. Edith Fetherston, a Lewisburg native and University alumna, bought the house with her husband John in 1936. Fetherston was an artist who exhibited her work throughout Pennsylvania, as well as a founding member of the Central Pennsylvania Art Association. She and her husband traveled the world collecting art. Upon her death in 1976, she willed the house and her art collection to be established as a nonprofit museum.

The museum exhibits both Fetherston's personal art collection and 113 of her own paintings. The house is richly decorated with original Tiffany Lamps, redwood pottery and other eclectic pieces. The pieces that adorn the reception room of the house show Fetherston's passion for Oriental art.

"Edith was fascinated with Oriental cultures," Kelly said.

The Packwood House has a long-standing relationship with the University. Members of the campus community volunteer at Packwood House.

"Our relationship with the University is that we get a lot of individual volunteers. We have had interns and worked with some professors on exhibits. Some professors are members on our board," Kelly said.

Kelly also expressed the desire to get more students involved.

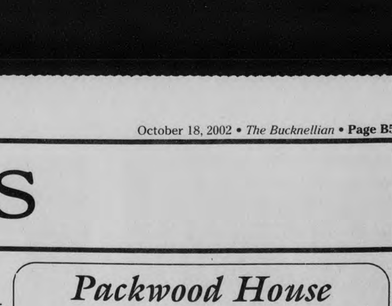
"We're trying to do more with the University. For the first time ever, we have a work-study student this semester. We are talking with the volunteer office to get more students involved. The museum provides a hands-on way to learn and is a great place for volunteer work. We would love to have more student tour guides, which is ideal for students who like talking to groups of people, and it looks great on a resume. We will teach them anything they want to know," Kelly said.

The museum is currently creating more volunteer programs that University students can get involved with.

"We are begging to offer more programs for children, which students can volunteer to help with. For example, as part of our holiday exhibit, we are reading to children. Students can volunteer to read to children at the museum on Saturday mornings in December, before the semester ends," Kelly said.

The museum not only offers students valuable volunteer opportunities, but also is a great place to visit for personal interests.

"I think a lot of students find the museum more interesting than they think they would, and it's a great place to bring your family," Kelly said.



Adam Wilcox—The Bucknellian

The Packwood House Museum was owned by Edith Fetherston, a Lewisburg native and University alumna. She willed the house and her personal art collection as a non-profit public museum when she died.

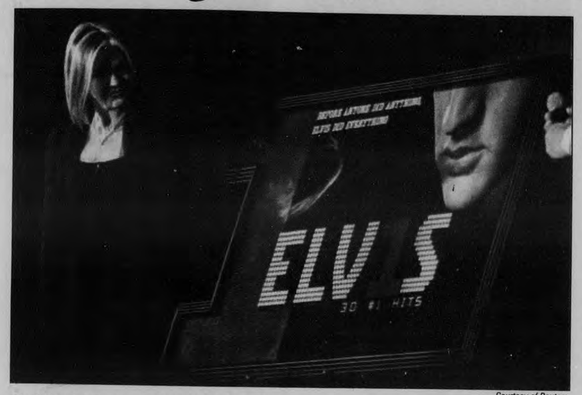
The king of rock 'n' roll is back



Courtesy of Reuters

Priscilla Presley examines the cover of Elvis' new No. 1 hits album at a concert for the 25th anniversary of his death. The CD sold over 500,000 copies during its first week.

BY LEAH CUNNINGHAM
Staff Writer

Despite popular belief by younger generations, even 25 years after his death, the king of rock 'n' roll is more than a heartthrob of the past with tasteless pantsuits, over-gelled hair and eccentric dance moves. The rebirth of the King has hit record stores with "Elvis: 30 #1 Hits," including remixed and rendered session tapes of the 30 songs that grounded and dominated the top of the pop charts in both the United States and the United Kingdom between 1956 and 1977.

CD & Review

In its first week alone, the King has pulled through with a renaissance like no other, selling 500,318 albums in the United States and reigning No. 1 in 17 other countries. The sleek, ultra-cool, casually intense and always suave Presley simultaneously impresses devout fans from the '50s and '60s, and even adds a more contemporary and upbeat convention of music to those who recall Elvis as "that so-called King my grandparents thought was rock 'n' roll."

Chronologically grouped, the songs range from Presley's 1956 hits "Heartbreak Hotel" and the original blues classic "Hound Dog" to the beating the back of his guitar stage-stunt and relaxing rhythm of 1957's "All Shook Up." The master collection also includes the 1969 release of "Suspicious Minds," a song that remains an artifact of the turning point in Presley's career during the Memphis sessions. Derived from Presley's obsession with heartbreak over his broken marriage, the biggest hit of the '70s, "Burning Love," conjures his despair and confusion in this remix. If nothing else, less avid Elvis fans cannot pass up the King who gave life to the infamous heart-melting "Can't Help Falling in Love," the 1961 boom-hit, originally an 18th century French melody before making its first appearance in 1961's "Blue Hawaii."

If you enjoyed the collection of and musical significance behind "The Beatles 1" album, then you will surely appreciate the "Elvis: 30 #1 Hits" resurfacing of the King. Presley once said, "Rhythm is something you either have or don't have, but when you have it, you have it all over." The album defines passion, talent, and the musical, historical and cultural impact that has sometimes eluded Presley's persona. A collection about the rebel, rock star and now reincarnated figure embodying the soul of rock 'n' roll, "Elvis: 30 #1 Hits" is the perfect place to start for loyal King fans and dabbling Elvis inquirers alike.

Theatre company reveals Wilde's wit

BY MELINDA KUMMER
Senior Writer

The Aquila Theatre Company presented "The Importance of Being Earnest" last Friday evening in the Weis Center for the Performing Arts. A theatrical endeavor showcasing the wit of Oscar Wilde, "The Importance of Being Earnest" reveals the reality of its famous line, "the truth is rarely pure and never simple." Reminiscent of Shakespearean theater, the comedy involves misunderstanding, smart quips and, of course, love.

The lead female characters, Gwendolyn and Cecily, played by Gabriela Fernandez-Coffey and Lindsay Rae Taylor, obsess over men who they think share the name "Earnest." Algernon and Jack, played by Guy Oliver-Watts and Richard Willis, are the men wooing these women under the false pretense of having that name.

"I loved the way in which the women characters emphasized the pronunciation of Earnest—the ridiculous nature of all the characters," Robin Meling '04 said. "I thought the show worked very well."

Aquila's rendition of a staple in classic theater caught some of the audience off guard.

"The show was not what I had expected," Melissa Cook '04 said. "I had just read the play for a theater class and had pictured it as a 19th century comedy. With the modern music and costuming, however, this play really came to life in a modern setting."

The show, no matter how surprising, proved a favorite with the audience.

"I found this production's imaginative and stylish take on Wilde's classic comedy refreshing and lively. The merging of contemporary costumes and manners, vaudevillian antics and pop music, with the excellently-delivered satiric wit of Oscar Wilde's dialogue rendered this a vital and new theatrical concoction," Robert Gainer, associate professor of theater, said.

"I felt the show was full of thoughtful and innovative interpretations of the classic," Taylor Harchak '05 said.

To artfully combine classic theater and modern styles, the Aquila Theatre Company utilized contemporary music in choreographed changes to the stage and set.

"At first I was a little surprised by the music and the modern dances that were interjected in the scenes, but it made [the play] more interesting," Charissa Reimer '05 said.

The Aquila Theatre Company is the professional company in residence at the Center for Ancient Studies at New York University. The company is touring two shows this season, "The Importance of Being Earnest" and William Shakespeare's "A Midsummer Night's Dream," which played at Susquehanna University on Oct. 9.

The company is also presenting a show in New York. Shakespeare's "Comedy of Errors" will be performed at the Howard Clurman Theatre in the New Theatre Row. For tickets, call Ticket Central at (212) 279-4200.

"The Bluest Eye" shines brightly

BY STEPHANIE NICKSE
Senior Writer

While Toni Morrison gave her first speech at the University yesterday, her voice was not new to the audience. Her first novel, "The Bluest Eye," published in 1970, began her prolific and award-winning writing career.

"The Bluest Eye," the story of a 9-year-old black girl named Pecola Breedlove, unravels to reveal complex social issues. Morrison explains that she intended for the book "to make a statement about the damage that internalized racism can do to the most vulnerable member of a community—a young girl," according to www.sparknotes.com.

Morrison wrote "The Bluest Eye" from the perspectives of multiple characters. Pecola is the novel's protagonist. She is an introverted child who wants nothing more than to be loved by her family and community. Pecola hides from her reality by creating a fantasy world. She believes that if she can have blue eyes, both her view of life and the community's view of her will change for the better.

Morrison wrote about Pecola's tragic life in order to show how the black community uses her as a scapegoat for its hatred. Due to the racial bias and injustice that Pecola's community feels, it turns to release this hate on her. The community labels the little girl as ugly and watches while her family abuses her. In comparison to Pecola's suffering and ugliness, the people in her community feel lucky and beautiful.

Book Review

While Pecola is characterized as a passive person who accepts everyone's faults and abuse, Morrison also creates a character of the same age, Claudia MacTeer, that fights back against standards of beauty and wealth. She develops two perspectives of this character. Claudia is both a child in the novel and an adult who reflects on her childhood within the same text.

When the community perceives a white person's blue eyes to be the most beautiful, Claudia rebels by destroying a white doll that she receives as a gift. She stands up for Pecola when she notices that other children are being cruel and devises a plan to save Pecola's baby from community rejection. Both girls come from poor families, but, unlike the abusive family that Pecola must live with, Claudia has support from a closeknit, loving family that enables her to look beyond the community's values in order to see Pecola as a victim.

Even with Claudia's strong conviction to help Pecola, she cannot replace or save Pecola from her parents, Cholly and Pauline. Morrison shows Cholly to be both an abusive person and a person who has been a victim of abuse. Cholly rapes Pecola, but he also attempts to show her love and kindness. He fights with his wife and finds comfort in drinking. This picture of his behavior is incomplete without understanding his life of rejection and abuse. Cholly's own mother places him in a trash can when he is born and, throughout his adulthood, white men make him feel inferior. Morrison creates this weak man who deserves both the hate and pity of the reader.

Unlike Cholly's physical abuse of Pecola, her mother is emotionally abusive. She tries to ignore Pecola, who naturally looks to her mother for comfort and care. Like Pecola, her mother wants to be accepted by the community. Pauline gives up her familial responsibilities and attempts to only associate with what her community considers beautiful and good. She separates herself from her daughter and husband by caring for a wealthy, powerful white family. Their white privilege is intangible, but nevertheless very valuable to Pauline. She cares for the white children with love and tenderness, while pushing her own children away from her.

Pecola is a product of her environment. Blue eyes symbolize the happiness and beauty that is part of being a white, middle-class person. She internalizes her community's standard of whiteness as beauty until she finally finds her blue eyes. At the heart of Pecola's desire to have blue eyes is the belief that people will not want to do ugly things to her or in front of her if she is beautiful.

When Pecola loses her sanity, she is freed from the pain and suffering that her family and community have caused her. Pecola gives up reality for a permanent world of acceptance and love. At the end of the novel, Pecola moves to the outskirts of town, where she lives as a constant reminder to her community of their inhumanity.

No other main character suffers as much as Pecola, but Morrison shows that they are all victims. They, too, are products of their environment. Cholly abuses his family as a way of dealing with the abuse he endured at the hands of others. Pauline attempts to cut ties with her family because it reminds her of who she is and how others look down upon her. She pours all of her time and love into a white family that has high status in the community in hopes that she can be accepted as a part of their world. Pecola's peer, Claudia, refuses to accept society's values and struggles to find ways to help Pecola. Even so, she is unable to save Pecola or her baby. Claudia may want to believe that black can be beautiful, but her faith is not strong enough to challenge the entire community's rooted beliefs.

In the title "The Bluest Eye," Morrison may have purposely chosen the word "bluest" to have two meanings. Not only does the title directly relate to Pecola's desire to have blue eyes in the story, but the title may also reference the saddest eye. "The Bluest Eye" is the complex and tragic story of one child's struggle to be accepted in a society in which race separates the good from the bad.

Christian album is mainstream, popular rock

BY JOSH HERWITT
Writer

David W. Jacobsen's "The Chasm" brings an alternative form of Christian rock. The light, soft sound is more appealing to a mainstream audience than traditional Christian rock. Jacobsen's acoustic guitar accompaniment and light percussion allows the listener to focus on his vocal work.

CD Review

The album, composed of 20 tracks of studio-recorded material, lasts just over an hour. Jacobsen wrote all the songs and Zbokth Productions recorded the album in 2001. The songs are relatively short, with the longest track at 4 minutes, 43 seconds.

The music is relatively simple, with few guitar solos or complex bridges between choruses and verses. Jacobsen's voice is contained, though soothing, along with the rest of the composition. He uses an acoustic guitar throughout the album, giving his songs less edge and a more peaceful sound. The percussion throughout the album switches between Latin and actual acoustic drums. Some songs begin with Jacobsen's vocal accompanied by bongos in the background. Most begin with an introduction, moving later to the main part of the song, where the guitar and drums come together. Some of Jacobsen's songs only have guitar in the background while he sings.

If you enjoy a more mainstream, popular rock sound, you might appreciate Jacobsen's "The Chasm." His guitar and vocals give the album a softer feel than customary rock music.

Task force to investigate off-campus living

BY ELISABETH SALEMME
Staff Writer

A task force will be formed by the University that will conduct a year-long study to determine the impact of a potential plan to move all students on campus within five years. The University will apply for a $30,000 grant to conduct the study.

According to University General Council Wayne Bromfield, the University will apply for the grant from SEDA-Council of Governments (SEDA-COG), a regional development agency that provides aid, leadership, expertise and services to businesses, institutions, residents and communities within 11 local counties including Union County, where Lewisburg is located.

"SEDA-COG identifies projects that would be helpful to the municipalities, and this is under the category of building successful communities through neighborhood action," Bromfield said. "They then submit a proposal to the next level, which is the Appalachian Regional Commission (ARC). They said that there are two communities in this area that have need for this neighborhood revitalization."

According to Bromfield, if the grant is approved, SEDA-COG will define a general scope of requests, which involves gathering municipal neighbor-

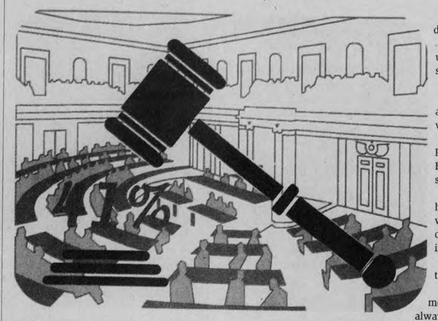
Poll: Students give BSG approval rating of 41%

Bucknellian poll suggests that BSG must interact more with students



BY JASON RUBINSTEIN
Associate Editor

In a recent Bucknellian poll, the approval rating of Bucknell Student Government (BSG) was determined to be 41 percent. The approval rating is based on BSG's influence on undergraduate students through budget appropriations, class representation, club recognition and other BSG-related activities.

Approximately 6 percent of the student body was surveyed, yielding a margin of error of plus or minus 4 percentage points (the response rate was approximately 90 percent).

"BS-who?"

Because this is the first approval rating conducted in recent history, comparisons that would indicate whether BSG has improved or worsened its image on campus are not available. BSG officials admitted that the ratings provide useful information that they hope will be a call-out to BSG Congress, the administration and the student body.

In the case of club appropriations, respondents' opinions varied greatly.

"They have a lot of funds that go unused each year—there is no need to be stingy about them," Nora Abdullah '03 said.

Junior Philip Wetzel felt the opposite.

"Their process of allocating money, although difficult, is very fair and driven very well for student organizations."

So what exactly does BSG do? BSG President Amir Sadaghiani '03 claims that BSG is truly the representative force of the student body.

"Sometimes students think BSG only helps clubs. But this year we have also worked on the uphill eatery, getting cable, downtown issues, Halloween trick-or-treating and the living wage, to name a few."

The student body president admits that the system is not perfect.

"The student government could have more power. It is an effective body that always fights for students, but the real power is in dealing with clubs," Sadaghiani said. "Congress is a representative body with no true means of enforcement. The true power lies with the trustees and higher administration, and BSG simply acts as their consultant."

In fact, Sadaghiani charges the administration with, "What are you giving me to work with?"

"The low approval rating is more of a call to the University and not BSG. A lot of BSG's recommendations are not implemented because it does not have enough power," Sadaghiani said. "What the rating means is that 41 percent of students feel that BSG is doing what they were designated to do."

It is a popular belief that all power comes through representation. BSG stepped in the right direction when it received a seat on the Committee for Campus Diversity. Sadaghiani feels that representation without a vote or formal power is not enough.

"Until the University trusts us with that enormous responsibility, BSG will control only clubs and organizations," he said.

See BSG, page A2

WALKING IN A WINTER WONDERLAND

Rooke Chapel and the rest of the campus community witnessed the first snowfall of the school year Tuesday night. Although the snow eventually gave way to a wintery mix of rain and ice, the groundwork may have been laid for a very cold, white winter.

Roth '54 to be honored by National Book Foundation

BY MICHELLE DOMBECK
Arts and Entertainment Editor

The National Book Foundation will be presenting Philip Roth '54 with its Medal for Distinguished Contribution to American Letters on Nov. 20. One of the University's most prestigious graduates, Roth is a celebrated and decorated novelist.

According to the National Book Foundation's Web site, "The recipient of the Medal is a person who, in the opinion of the ... National Book Foundation, has enriched our literary heritage over a life of service, or corpus of work."

Professor Emeritus of English John Wheatcroft, a friend of Roth's, believes that Roth's work has indeed enriched our literary heritage.

"In my judgment, his last half-dozen novels are among the very best that have been written in the past half century by a writer-novelist," Wheatcroft said. "On the basis of the depth of his work and the magnitude of his accomplishments, I can't think of anyone who deserves this award more. Bucknell has reason to be proud to have one of the most distinguished persons of American letters of the 20th century as one of its graduates."

This award is just one of Roth's many accomplishments. In addition to a Pulitzer Prize, he has won a National Book Award, two National Book Critics Circle awards and two PEN/Faulkner awards.

"He is certainly one of the best-known, most famous graduates of Bucknell," said John Rickard, associate professor and department chair of English. "Roth is one of the most respected contemporary American novelists. He's also one of the best-known American authors internationally."

Professor of English Robert Taylor agrees with Rickard.

"Philip Roth is one of the most important writers of our time," Taylor said. "Ever since the publication in the 1959 of 'Goodbye, Columbus,' an extraordinary debut and only a couple of years after his graduation from Bucknell, Roth has produced work that commands and deserves attention. An amazingly resourceful and intelligent writer, he continues in this century to surprise and delight readers."

As CNN.com describes Roth, he has "a gift for writing gritty, ironic stories depicting middle-class Jewish life." His style is unique.

"He can write about a particular life/lives and also make what he writes revelatory of the large world," Wheatcroft said. "His fiction gives us a sense of our history before it happens. There are very few novelists who are able to do so."

Philip Roth '54 will be awarded the Medal for Distinguished Contribution to American Letters by the National Book Foundation on Nov. 20. Roth has previously been awarded with a Pulizer Prize.

Wheatcroft taught in the early 1950s, while Roth was a student. Wheatcroft was not much older than Roth, and the two quickly became friends.

"I was a visitor in a course in which Roth was a student. There, I noticed how sensitive and articulate he was. Later, I saw him acting in some plays by Cap and Dagger [a dramatic organization that later turned into the department of theatre and dance]. We just began to talk, and after that we became good friends."

Wheatcroft described Roth as a great companion.

"He's very gracious and warm, and honest without qualification, especially when it comes to literary matters. He's the best of company—he has a marvelous wit and is very quick. He's so quick at it, he could be a stand-up comedian as a matter of fact."

Library opens at 7:45 to accommodate campus early birds

Monica McMurrer—The Bucknellian

Bertrand Library began new operating hours as of Oct. 23, opening at 7:45 a.m. The earlier hours were instituted for students and faculty who require library resources before their 8 a.m. classes.

By Christopher Styers
Senior Writer

Information Services and Resources (ISR) announced that Bertrand Library will open 15 minutes earlier, at 7:45 a.m. instead of 8 a.m., on weekdays starting Oct. 23. The library will continue with these hours throughout the school year.

ISR has made this move in order to better accommodate students and faculty with classes and other commitments at 8 a.m.

Students and faculty will be able to start checking out materials and equipment by 7:45 a.m. and Reference/Information desks will be available by 8 a.m.

Students and faculty who were in need of library services for early morning classes and obligations had requested extended hours for some time.

"Opening the library 15 minutes before the first class of the day has been 'pleaded' for by many, most especially by faculty and students who need to pick up materials and/or equipment before their 8 a.m. class," said Isabella O'Neill, librarian and manager of reference services and resources.

> —Isabella O'Neill, librarian and manager of reference services and resources

The decision to change hours was made by one of ISR's public service committees, which is comprised of representatives from the Reference/Information desk, the Technology Support desk and the Circulation/Reserves/Equipment desk.

The committee informally gathered information through stories and requests made by faculty and students that had early classes and were not able to get materials from the library and arrive to class on time.

O'Neill said that the new hours will especially help students and faculty who found out they had a piece of equipment that did not work so they could exchange it.

The change has been welcome and the library has received a number of thank yous, especially from faculty and administrators. Students are also appreciative of the change.

"It's a good change," Candice Olszewski '04 said. "You can get necessary materials for the day and get any last minute stuff done before class that you were unable to finish the night before."

O'Neill finds the change encouraging and believes ISR's decision will benefit the campus community.

"It provides much needed extra service time for faculty, staff and students who need to check out equipment or materials before classes begin at 8 a.m. or before campus offices open for the day," O'Neill said. "Everyone is rushed these days and ISR hopes that the availability of circulation and equipment services 15 minutes earlier will help users who used to feel 'boxed in' with ISR's 8 a.m. opening hour."

BSG

"Yes, the president lives down the hall from me."

On average, 45 percent of the students stated that they knew one or more of their class officers (with the senior class being the maximum at 70.7 percent, and the junior class being the minimum at 22.2 percent).

When asked if they felt comfortable approaching the officers they knew, about 36 percent of students said yes. In other words, 9 percent of students interviewed knew their class officers but did not feel comfortable approaching them.

The fact that a minority of students know their class officers may simply indicate that BSG is not publicizing their activities sufficiently. In fact, a majority of first-year students commented that they have not seen or experienced anything related to BSG.

"They could be doing more. I don't know who they are or what they're doing," Megan Multack '06 said. "We've only received one e-mail from our class president."

Even many upperclass students were not aware of BSG's efforts.

"I'm under the impression that they help us out, but I'm not sure how—their presence is hidden." John Luthi '04 said.

First-year Class President Paul Wolujewicz indicated that the percentages were disheartening.

"I would have to say that we strive to reach a great number of people who would approach his or her officers," Wolujewicz said. "We are having a great first part of the year, and we are looking forward to many more fun upcoming events."

Sadaghiani echoed Wolujewicz in the fact that it is disappointing that such a small percentage of students felt comfortable approaching their class officers.

"Class officers are the real link back to the class, and the ratiug is an indication that possibly there should be more door-to-door events," Sadaghiani said.

Laura Day, president of the class of 2003, encourages students to approach her or other class officers with ideas, comments and suggestions. Also, Day offered suggestions on improving the polling figures.

"BSG and the senior class will put forth greater effort to improve student-to-student communication and interaction, in addition to brainstorming ways of providing better feedback and representation for the seniors," she said.

"Amir Sada-something"

Polled students were asked similar questions about the executive board of BSG, which includes the student body president and vice presidents for finance, operations and administration. About 31 percent of students claimed that they knew the executive officers, but only 21 percent knew Sadaghiani's first name. Only 14 percent of sophomores claimed to know the executive officers, while about 56 percent of seniors know them.

Many students, especially seniors, identified Omar Zalatimo '03 as BSG president. Zalatimo is actually the BSG vice president for operations. Similarly, many confused Day, senior class president, and Aziz Megii '03, Interfraternity Council president, with Sadaghiani. Sadaghiani was not surprised by this.

"Omar is my right-hand man and we work on BSG a lot together. Also our name is only two letters apart. Same with Aziz—our names are only two letters apart," Sadaghiani said.

The poll also provides figures for student club involvement, including club sports and Greek organizations, but not varsity athletics. Of those polled, about two-thirds are involved in student organizations, with an average of 4.8 hours per week spent participating in those organizations. Over 70 percent of upperclassmen claim to be actively involved in student organizations, while only 50 percent of first-year students are involved.

Chart at right shows student involvement in clubs and organizations on campus. Participation increased continuously from year to year, except decreased slightly for the senior class.

Information on Bucknellian polls

When providing polling results, The Bucknellian believes that it is necessary to provide the most accurate statistics as possible. As a result, polls are carefully planned to take into account sample sizes, confidence levels and intervals, random selections and bias. Polls are conducted over the telephone in order to prevent biases which are prevalent in electronic and/or campus mail surveys, and thus The Bucknellian requires at least a 90 percent response rate to be considered valid. The BSG poll included a random sample of 6 percent of the student body, and received a 90 percent response rate. Mount Etna's fountains of fire ease

SANTA VENERINA, Italy—Residents in the shadow of the fire-spitting Mount Etna breathed a sigh of relief on Wednesday as lava rivers flowing from Europe's most active volcano seemed to slow. Experts could not rule out the threat of more earthquakes, which have jolted the volcano awake and left hundreds of families homeless in the town of Santa Venerina.

Russia announces gas used in theater rescue

MOSCOW—After much international criticism for its secrecy, Russia confirmed U.S. suspicions that the gas used in the storming of a Moscow theater, where Chechen gunmen held hundreds of hostages, was based on Fentanyl, a fast-acting opiate with medical applications. Meanwhile, police said Danish authorities detained an envoy of Chechen separatist leader Aslan Maskhadov after Russia said he may have been involved in the Moscow siege, in which 118 people died, nearly all of them in the raid.

Bush to meet Brunei leader in December

WASHINGTON—U.S. President George W. Bush will meet with the leader of oil-rich Brunei, Sultan Hassanal Bolkiah, on Dec. 16 in efforts to combat terrorism and boost trade, the White House announced Wednesday. The meeting will take place at the White House, and comes as the United States seeks support for a possible attack on Iraq that could disrupt the flow of oil.

Israeli political crisis ends coalition

JERUSALEM—Prime Minister Ariel Sharon's hard-line government crumbled Wednesday after Labor Party ministers submitted their resignations in a dispute over funding for Jewish settlements. Sharon told parliament he would continue to lead the country, suggesting he would try to govern with a narrow coalition of far-right and religious parties. If that effort fails, the Israeli leader could call early elections, a move that would hamper U.S. peace efforts in the region as Washington vamps up for war against Iraq.

Jordanian police detain militants

AMMAN, Jordan—Jordanian officials rounded up dozens of known Islamic extremists for questioning Tuesday in the assassination of American diplomat Laurence Foley, as suspicion for the attack fell on al-Qaida or the terrorist movement's sympathizers.

Explosion in northwest Kabul, peacekeepers investigate

KABUL, Afghanistan—An explosion rattled northern Kabul late Wednesday, and Italian peacekeepers were sent to investigate. New Zealand squadron leader Terry Hay, a spokesman for the international peacekeeping force, said it was not clear what caused the explosion or how large it was, but it could be heard throughout the Afghan capital.

Mass child abductions in Uganda

GULU, Uganda—A wave of mass child abductions has hit northern Uganda, where rebels are seizing hundreds of boys and girls to swell their ranks against a government offensive, charities said on Wednesday. The Lord's Resistance Army is kidnapping an average of at least 10 children a day, forcing them to participate in killings before turning them into soldiers or sex slaves for their commanders, the charities said.

Congo sends off military allies after devastating four-year war

KINSHASA, Congo—Congo bade farewell Wednesday to its military allies in a devastating four-year war, a day after the government and rebels came to a tentative agreement to share power before elections. A closed celebration at the presidential palace in Kinshasa marked the end of the military involvement of Zimbabwe, Angola and Namibia. They were backing the shaky government of the mineral-rich nation in a complicated conflict, in which rebels had the support of forces from Rwanda and Uganda.

Smuggling charges in Haitians' case

MIAMI—Six people were charged Wednesday with trying to smuggle more than 200 Haitians into the United States aboard a rickety freighter. Activists, meanwhile, urged Florida Republican Gov. Jeb Bush to prevent authorities from deporting the Haitians, who jumped overboard Tuesday and dashed onto a Miami roadway to flag down cars.

Peru finds pre-Inca ruins beneath Lake Titicaca

LIMA—Peruvian divers have found pre-Inca stairways, ramps and walls beneath the waters of Lake Titicaca, but experts said on Wednesday the discoveries were not the remains of a legendary lost city.

Canada advises citizens born in U.S.-targeted countries to reconsider travel to United States

TORONTO—The Canadian government has issued a travel advisory with a twist: It suggests citizens born in Iraq, Syria and other countries targeted by U.S. anti-terrorism policies consider avoiding travel to the United States. The advisory issued Monday focuses on a U.S. regulation adopted a year after the Sept. 11 attacks that permits American authorities to closely monitor travelers born in certain countries suspected of terrorism links.

Community prepares for upcoming elections

By James Leahy
Senior Writer

The incessant political ads on television and the radio will go away on Tuesday when Americans go to the polls to make their election decisions. Everything from the governorship of Pennsylvania, Congressional positions and state and local races are on the ballot. While many students remain registered to vote at home and will have already voted using absentee ballots, many students on campus registered to vote in Lewisburg.

At this point, registration in Pennsylvania is closed. According to the League of Women Voters of the Lewisburg Area, the last day to register for the November election was Oct. 7. Registration forms are available in Bertrand Library near the main entrance for those interested in future elections.

The polls in Pennsylvania will be open on Tuesday from 7 a.m. to 8 p.m. Local polling places include the Weis Center for students registered to vote in East Buffalo Township and Lewisburg High School for students registered to vote in Ward 3—most students registered to vote in Lewisburg Borough live in Ward 3.

Other Lewisburg polling places include the Senior Center on 2nd Street for Ward 1, the Courthouse for Ward 2 and the Buffalo Valley Nursing Home for Ward 4. To be eligible to vote in Lewisburg, a student has to have been a U.S. citizen for at least one month, a resident of a Pennsylvania election district for at least 30 days and be at least 18 years old.

Voting procedure for write-in candidates has also changed.

According to the Lewisburg Daily Journal, "voters will be required to punch a punch card when they write in a candidate's name. In the past all that was required was writing the candidate's name on ballot. Now voters will write in the name, office and term, and then punch a slot marked 'write-in' to register the vote. In addition, the name of the candidate should be written on the gray envelope provided with the ballot before it is placed in when put in the ballot box."

Township lines divide the University campus into two voting wards. Students living in East Buffalo Township can vote in the Weis Center on Tuesday, while most students living in Lewisburg Borough vote at Lewisburg High School.

Last year, there was a large student turnout as several students entered races for local government—Nate Sorber '02 and Matthew Kasdan '03. Running in the mayoral race against challengers Lewis Hendricks and Mike Molesevich, Sorber was defeated at election by the incumbent Hendricks, who had been mayor of Lewisburg for a total of 18 years.

The race between Kasdan and Peter Bergonia was a bit closer. Both looking for a seat from Ward 3, the vote was recounted after a slim margin of victory for Bergonia came up after the initial count. Following the recount, the race was deemed a dead heat. Eventually, a drawing of names from a hat was used to decide the winner (Bergonia) and showed just how close students were to getting a voice in the Borough Council.

This year's election will not be as exciting in terms of local politics. Lewisburg and East Buffalo Township government is set for another year. Students registered to vote here will go to the polls instead to vote in several state races and a national race, including one for governor of Pennsylvania.

The race for Pennsylvania governor is quite heated and is being run by four candidates—Republican Mike Fisher, Democrat Ed Rendell, Libertarian Ken Krawchuk and Green Party candidate Michael Morrill. According to most, Rendell is comfortably in the lead going into the election and he is widely expected to defeat Fisher.

The lieutenant governor's race mirrors the governor's race. The choices include Republican Jane Earll, Democrat Catherine Baker Knoll, Libertarian Henry Haller III and Green Party candidate Vicki Smedley.

The other two main races are not extremely exciting, yet they have not failed to make some news. In the 10th Congressional Representative District, one candidate is running virtually unopposed under the Republican and Democratic party labels. Don Sherwood will be facing Green Party candidate Kurt Shotko. In addition, University medical director Don Stechschulte has announced a write-in candidacy. The district encompasses a large swath of central and northeastern Pennsylvania, including all of Union County, according to dnet.org.

For State House in the 85th district, the race is pretty much the same. Russ Fairchild is running with the Republican and Democratic labels against Eric Prindle of the Green Party. The lower house of Pennsylvania's State House "consists of 203 members each of whose district contains 59,000 citizens. Every law concerning taxation must originate in the House of Representatives. Members of the House serve two-year terms. The 85th district includes parts of Snyder County and all of Union County. Its total population is 61,258," according to dnet.org.

Prindle of Selinsgrove, made news back in July when, according to the Lewisburg Daily Journal, he was "arrested and charged with defiant trespass after police said he was gathering signatures for a petition to put gubernatorial candidate Mike Morrill on the fall ballot. Prindle was arrested when he did not follow police orders to stop gathering the signatures at a street festival. He was charged with defiant trespass."

The future of Pennsylvania is up for grabs, as is control of the U.S. Senate and control of numerous governorships.

DOWNTOWN

hood members and University members together to develop strategies to determine how to make Lewisburg a more aesthetically pleasing area and to ensure that all community members are satisfied.

"[The University] requested $30,000 of cash to support their staff. If the ARC approves it, then we have to work with Lewisburg to put together some combination of money and people to match the $30,000 gap in order to have the grant approved," Bromfield said.

University Vice President for Student Affairs Charles Pollock '70 said that the grant would be used to determine what the options are for the downtown neighborhoods if they are no longer rented to students.

According to Bromfield, the task force is trying to determine how to study and assist in neighborhood reorganization, business development, programming and project planning.

Pollock said that the task force is operating under the University Board of Trustees in response a resolution established in 1998 that stated recreating a residential university by moving students back on campus would be beneficial.

"So, at this point we are operating under [the guidelines of the 1998 resolution]," Pollock said. "What we are now studying in the next year is what would happen if that resolution was given full effect. If we find no secure positive alternatives then we will not have a premise for that conclusion. But unless and until that conclusion is reached, we are going to attempt to implement the plan."

According to Pollock, if viable alternatives cannot be identified with regard to what would replace the student housing downtown, it will not be possible to move all students on campus.

"Becoming a fully residential university is a two-step question. One question is, Are there good reasons to have students on campus? And the decision on that was 'yes.' The second is, Can we be satisfied that those good reasons outweigh possible negative effects of changing the status quo with respect to students living on campus, and especially from an educational standpoint?" Pollock said.

According to Pollock, the task force will go forward with research regardless of whether the grant is approved or not.

"We need to keep asking these questions. If they do approve the grant, we will be able to approach it more aggressively and in more ways with better information if we have this funding," Pollock said.

"We would not want to move all students back to campus at all, unless we had appropriate accommodations for them. We need to have appropriate senior-style housing," Dean of Students Richard Ferraro said. "People who would be occupying these would be getting ready to go into the world and they should have accommodations that are suitable for that end. If we did not build the appropriate housing, I would not want to move students back on campus."

According to Ferraro, an outfit that builds housing for colleges and universities came to the University and presented different apartment alternatives.

The model Ferraro said he is considering is a four-bedroom unit. Each room is a single and two people would share a bathroom. The apartments also include large kitchen and living areas.

"I think [the apartments] would be a really nice thing to have," Ferraro said. "We are really good in terms of basic housing for underclassmen, but we need better apartment style housing. We have the Gateways, but I think these would be even nicer than the Gateways."

According to Pollock, the University will take into consideration the varying desires for housing for upperclassmen.

"At different points in their development, students desire and benefit from different kinds of housing. We will continue to create variety and quite possibly extend that to what students see as the advantages of off-campus living. Other attractions of living off campus may be less amenable to integration and to University residential life program," Pollock said.

The issues of student security and welfare were also addressed by Ferraro.

"Downtown gives the impression of having a lot of freedom, and it does to a certain extent, but there are also heavy, heavy fines for over $1,000 for parties. It provides a more secure environment for parents and students if housing is on campus," Ferraro said. "We do have students who are pulled back each year to campus for problems downtown, and you sort of eliminate all that if you have it on campus. And finally, it fits with our residential pattern on campus. We have deliberately always housed about 90 percent of our students on campus anyway, so I don't think it is that radical of a difference."

> "At different points in their development, students desire and benefit from different kinds of housing. We will continue to create variety and quite possibly extend that to what students see as the advantages of off-campus living ..."

According to Ferraro, parents have expressed concern about their children's safety in off-campus housing, but he said the University could not be held responsible for safety if the housing is not on campus.

"I think the on-campus accommodations will be much nicer. I think they will be much safer with modern systems of electricity and heating," Ferraro said.

Some Lewisburg residents have expressed concern regarding moving students back on campus, including the potential losses for downtown merchants.

"I know for a fact that living off campus prepares students to live on their own after college. It also keeps the property values up in the town. Not all landlords will be able to keep up; most places are rented on a steady basis now. It will create a softness in the market. It will be somewhat devastating to this town," said Kevin Gardner, owner of the Bull Run Inn as well as other commercial and private buildings.

According to Gardner, 120-140 units downtown are inhabited by students.

"Landlords will be scrambling to get those units rented. I think the Trustees may need to take a better look," Gardner said.

Andrea Deibler-Gorman is a resident of 7th Street who said she would not want to see students move back on campus.

"All the houses around us are student rentals and I would hate to see those houses standing empty. I think perhaps other people would want to rent the homes temporarily, and my husband and I would prefer they were rented by students," Deibler-Gordon said.

Deibler-Gordon said that although in the past there have been problems with students, within the past three years there has only been one negative incident, which was dealt with.

"We have had some very good, conscientious student neighbors. They have given us their phone numbers in case they are too loud. I think it is our opinion that Bucknell seems to be making progress with acquainting students on how to deal with community members," Deibler-Gordon said.

According to Bromfield, if the grant is approved, the task force's desire and current intention is to have students conduct research. They will gather data to determine the effects moving students on campus would have on Lewisburg.

"The current menu of possibilities for student analysis includes identifying boundaries; assessing the physical conditions of current units; measuring the margins for rental units in Lewisburg; looking at parking and zoning; studying comparable universities and see how they have addressed and attempted to solve the neighborhood issues. Certainly if they can imagine or develop any creative alternatives that help us envision the future for the area that would be most helpful," Bromfield said.

Adams brings political, medical and life views to campus

By Meghan Fox
Staff Writer

Jason Rubinstein—The Bucknellian

Doctor Hunter "Patch" Adams visited the campus last Tuesday, talking to students about the unique philosophies that he lives his life by.

Wearing a colorful assortment of mismatched clothing, with a fork dangling from his left ear and his blue long hair tied back in a ponytail, Hunter "Patch" Adams stepped up to the microphone in the University's Rooke Chapel and asked, "What's your love strategy?"

Patch was not inquiring about the seductive tricks to lure a partner into bed, as he cleverly joked, but instead he questioned the audience's approach to love as a means of conquering suffering and violence.

Before his lecture Tuesday evening, Director of Student Health Services Donald Stechschulte gave the initial greeting to present Adams as the guest speaker. "He needs no introduction," Stechschulte said. In fact, this famous medical doctor is known all over the world for his humor, his clowning and his care.

"I may need no introduction, but Don Stechschulte, he does need an introduction. Don Stechschulte is running for Congress," Adams said.

Adams poked fun at the nature of most politicians, but reassured the audience of Stechshulte's good nature. He proceeded to explain how Stechschulte running for Congress tied in with his message of love.

"If we want to bring love into the world we need a strategy," Adams said.

Adams explained that his love strategy developed as a result of Sept. 11.

"For a political activist, every day is 9/11. Every day 30,000 [people], mostly children, die of starvation. That's five times the number that died on 9/11, every day."

He explained that the 35,146 deaths due to starvation that occurred on Sept. 11 were not perceived as any great tragedy. In fact, Adams noted that many Americans were quickly drawn into the idea of retaliation against Afghanistan, responding to violence with violence.

"Do you think ever, anyone has ever heard of any military or political structure having a love strategy for violence?" he said. "Is there anything more important in your life than love?"

When no one disagreed, he proceeded to question why

Doctor, doctor, give me the news: An interview with Patch Adams

What would you say makes a good doctor?

Patch Adams (PA): The role of a shaman or medicine man or woman is that member of the community that says I'll specialize in looking at how we are doing and we'll think about the individual's health, the family's health, the community's health, the whole society's health and comfort when there is need and suffering and make offerings of education to try to make things better. On a direct action to a patient, the doctor wants to love their patients and be loved by their patients, and to never give up.

In all this time, have you ever been discouraged?

PA: Never once.

What message do you have for people, such as your self, who have very large dreams?

PA: Polish them off. Go to them. Dream big. Dream bigger. Collect friends. Never give up. Feel gratitude.

What would you say are your current goals?

PA: I have huge numbers of goals. I am someone who is affirming life. There are all kinds of goals. I think you live your life in action. What you have is your finger in many pies. I travel 300 days a year so there is a constant flow of "Where am I going, and what can we do?"

You said in your book, "Gesundheit," that health is based on happiness. Can you explain or expand on that?

PA: Well, I define health as a happy, vibrant, exuberant life on an average day. So if you have AIDS, or cancer, or to be blind, or whatever, and you decide to engage in life and be in the parts that you show significance to. So, health for me isn't the absence of disease, which is the way it was defined in medical school, but rather a radjant celebration of life.

You said you have lived life each day as you wanted to. Have you ever been sad?

PA: I made a decision pretty much at 18 to never have another bad day. So I have grieved for many things. I am sorry for the suffering in the world, but the performance of sad doesn't come change things. I want a performance that works to change things.

When you visit the suffering people who are on the verge of dying, what do you think you gain from such an experience?

PA: Well, human interaction. I love people, all people. Everyone's dying. You're dying, right? We are all dying. We are one day closer. If I had a metaphor for God, it would be friend. All of my spiritual life is on this planet in this moment with people. I don't see them as suffering people. I just like to engage in people.

You seem to be always presenting. Does that get tiring?

PA: Well, I am on the road a lot. I am presenting all the time, and have for 19 years, and I loved every second of it. There is such a variety and privilege to bring important thoughts to an uncomfortable world. I suppose I get enough feedback that it's valuable for people. And whoever wants a different world feels lucky to be able to present to so many wide audiences.

Does putting on this "other face" or presentation change your mood?

PA: Well you see I operate from my intentions, so I intend something. I intend to be friendly. I intend to love

Morin receives Fulbright Scholar Award

By Matthew Ellis
Opinions Editor

Associate Professor of Geography Karen Morin received a Fulbright Scholar Award. She is one of approximately 800 U.S. faculty and professionals who will travel abroad to some 140 countries during the 2002-03 academic year through the Fulbright Scholar Program.

As a Fulbright Scholar to Russia's Nizhni Novgorod State University during the fall semester, she is giving weekly lectures on themes related to cultural and gender geography and the American West. She is also presenting her research at conferences and delivering a public lecture on North American feminist historical geography.

Fulbright Scholar Award

—Established in 1946 by Arkansas Sen. William Fulbright

—Purpose is to build mutual understanding between people of the United States and other countries

—Recipients are selected on academic and professional merit, as well as leadership potential

Morin's research focuses on the connections between British and American imperialism, North American historical geography and women's travel writing.

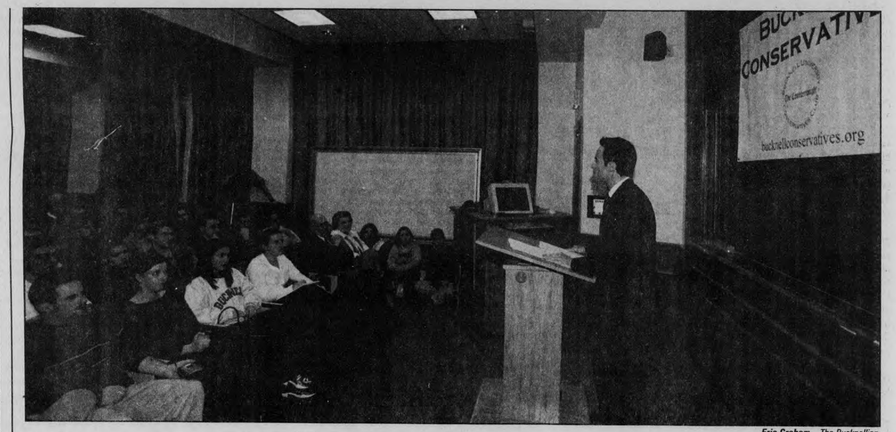
Much of her research has focused on relationships among 19th century British travel writing, Victorian gender relations and British and American imperialism. She is working on a number of projects that attempt to make links between post-colonial studies and the historical geography of North America.

She has taken preliminary steps in that direction in two recent studies, one on the letters of an Omaha Indian woman Rosalie La Flesche Farley, and another on journalists' depictions of the beginning stages of industrial mining in the 1870s American West. Among her current projects is a post-colonial critique of travel and exploration sponsored by the American Geographical Society, and a study of women's religious landscapes of 19th century Quebec.

Joining the University in 1995, Morin received her bachelor's and doctoral degrees from the University of Nebraska-Lincoln and a master's degree from Bowling Green State University. She will be accompanied to Russia by her husband and two children.

Established in 1946 under legislation introduced by the late Democratic Sen. J. William Fulbright of Arkansas, the Fulbright Scholar Program's purpose is to build mutual understanding between the people of the United States and other countries.

Recipients of Fulbright Scholar Awards are selected by academic or professional achievement and because they have demonstrated extraordinary leadership potential in their fields. Among thousands of prominent U.S. Fulbright Scholar alumni are Milton Friedman, Nobel laureate in economics; James Watson, co-discoverer of the structure of DNA and Nobel laureate in medicine; Pulitzer Prize-winning poet Rita Dove; and Intel Corporation CEO Craig Barrett.



Eric Graham—The Bucknellian

Thor Halvorssen, the executive director of the Foundation of Individual Rights in Education, spoke on campus last Thursday. Brought to campus controversially by the Conservatives Club, Halvorssen criticized the University for infringing on students' right to free speech.

Halvorssen speaks despite University opposition

By Rachel Laskow
Editor-in-Chief

Universities are the scene of ferocious assault on freedom of speech, said Executive Director of the Foundation of Individual Rights in Education (FIRE) Thor Halvorssen in Dana Engineering last Thursday.

"Most universities, however, promise academic freedom and religious freedom, but instead they deliver selective oppression and censorship," Halvorssen said.

The Conservatives Club brought Halvorssen to speak on campus despite a lack of support from the administration. According to University General Counsel Wayne Bromfield, the University did not approve funds for Halvorssen's speech because the University received a letter from FIRE in early August that threatened the use of legal resources to challenge and overturn a decision of the University's Community Judicial Board.

"I was quite stunned that they would actually defund a lecture that was funded by the student government, voted on by the student government and they themselves decided we don't really want him here; we are not going to pay for his expenses to get here. Well, I would have come here on my bicycle if necessary," Halvorssen said.

According to Halvorssen, there are hundreds of colleges and universities that have restricted rights. Such restrictions are not legal at public schools and are not often advertised at private schools.

Halvorssen said that schools such as the University of Connecticut (UConn) have restricted rights.

At UConn, inconsiderate jokes, stereotyping and inappropriately directed laughter are outlawed. Halvorssen believes that nothing is stopping private universities from deciding that regulating speech of its students is important.

"Speech codes created an arena of double standards," Halvorssen said.

Halvorssen feels that although the University shines in its pamphlets and catalogues as a center of learning, it is a perfect example of fraud and false advertising because of the speech code it imposes.

For example, the University has a speech code that bans "disparaging or condescending remarks about a person's gender or sexual orientation," Halvorssen said.

Conservatives Club Vice President for Special Events Adam Hersperger '05 believes it is impossible to advocate free speech while saying certain things cannot be discussed due to sensitivity issues.

"In my mind, living in freedom means the exchange of thoughts, ideas and opinions without fear of how something I say may be interpreted by another individual," Hersperger said.

President of V-Day Bucknell Valerie Lam '04 agrees that strict speech codes hinder the ability to learn, simply because people are not exposed to various opinions on issues.

"That is a hypocritical point considering universities are supposed to be institutions of free learning," Lam said.

According to Vice President for Student Affairs Charles Pollock '70, the University does not have, or plan to have, a speech code, but its policies pertaining to harassment must apply to everyone.

"Whatever standards a university has must be fairly and evenly applied, and the university must model the valued behavior," Pollock said.

Halvorssen said that by implementing these policies, the University is treating students as children and telling them they do not have same rights as those who go to local community college.

Hersperger echoes Halvorssen's concern.

"Until all speech codes are done away with, I can never be totally free or comfortable in expressing myself. Sometimes I have to think before I speak out of fear that what I say may be deemed offensive by someone else who just happened to overhear it," Hersperger said. "Also, after students leave this school and enter the 'real world,' they won't always have the University there to hold their hands if someone happens to offend them."

Pollock does not feel that the University treats students as children.

"We do encourage, and sometimes enforce, standards of civility and self-control, but adults who choose to be part of a community are subject to those standards as well. It's not a question of children vs. adults," Pollock said.

Halvorssen also stressed the importance of the University treating students as individuals.

"You choose universities, above all, for the future value of your degrees and for the quality of the learning, inquiry, social life and, in the broadest sense, for the discovery that you will have here. You do not choose your universities to be your mother and father," Halvorssen said.

According to Halvorssen, some students at the University are protected and some students do not matter.

"I think it's terrible that some people's feelings apparently matter more than others. This is also insinuating that certain groups are less capable of dealing with these issues without the help of the administration," Conservatives Club President Denise Chaykun '04 said.

Chaykun said she enjoyed the speech and was thrilled by the amount of people who showed up.

Lam was disappointed that Halvorssen attacked the administration.

"The administrators are sometimes the most supportive people for certain issues, including that of free speech," Lam said.

Some aspects of the speech also displeased Pollock.

"While Bucknell can benefit from hearing many voices on the issues of the day, I was generally disappointed by how much that particular talk depended on misstatement of fact and misrepresentation of others' thinking," Pollock said.

Toni Morrison receives University honor

Renowned author accepts first Janet Weis Fellow at Weis Center Oct. 17

By Alyson Walker

Looking beyond race is important, Nobel laureate Toni Morrison informed a sold-out crowd at the Weis Center for the Performing Arts on Oct. 17.

Morrison told the audience about an interview where she asked to discuss anything besides race—her work as a woman, themes, family—anything but race. The interviewer initially agreed, but later rescinded and only asked her questions about race.

"Racial difference is a very big seller. Neither he [the interviewer] nor his audience were interested in me besides my race," Morrison said. "At that time, I had a yearning very strongly for an environment in which I could speak and write without every sentence I penned being understood as mere protest."

Toni Morrison, author of novelssuch as "Beloved" and "Song of Solomon," appears on "The Oprah Winfrey Show." Morrison received the first Janet Weis Fellow in Contemporary Letters and Literature from the University and spoke to a community audience at the Weis Center Oct. 17.

Morrison spoke as the first Janet Weis Fellow in Contemporary Letters and Literature, an honor conferred upon her by University President Steffen Rogers. The prize is funded through the Degenstein Foundation to honor Janet Weis for her contributions to the University and the Susquehanna Valley area.

Professor of Biology and former University President Gary Sojka introduced the Janet Weis Fellow, saying how blessed the community was to have Janet Weis and her late husband Sigmund Weis' contributions to the entire Susquehanna Valley. He also thanked the Degenstein Foundation for its generous contribution. Sojka said Morrison truly embodies the spirit of the prize, and the University was pleased to have her as a speaker.

"This is really the first of what will be hopefully a series of literary events, which we expect to be both high profile and highly prestigious. We expect that what is to come to be known as the 'Weis Prize' is going to be something coveted by the finest writers in the world," Sojka said. "Now that's a big order, but we certainly have the right start tonight."

Associate Professor of English Glyne Griffith introduced Morrison. He first gave the audience background on the award-winning novelist, critic, teacher and professor. He then discussed her importance as a contemporary writer.

"As one who in her own work continues to reject, alter and expose oppressive language and oppressive life, Toni Morrison reminds us of the true meaning of democracy, the true meaning of freedom," Griffith said.

Morrison spoke of the concept of belonging—who belongs, who does not and an individual sense of belonging. She spoke of the different concepts of citizens versus foreigners, especially in the United States. Morrison has been looking at female authors and their treatment of farewells and homecomings as related to racial differences. She referenced texts such as "Out of Africa," "Gone with the Wind," "To Kill a Mockingbird" and also read a passage from her own novel, "Beloved."

Studying other writers has led Morrison to reconsider how she uses language to convey her thoughts and ideas.

"My project became to make the history and rhetoric one. I claimed the right to authorship," Morrison said. "To read the world, to misread it. I wanted my work to be disabling. It is literature that expands language."

Morrison does not promote a culture in which race does not exist, and discussed the role of racism in culture and society.

"It's not to be interpreted as an endorsement of race transcendence. I don't look forward to, or want, some colorblind, race-free culture. Our culture is already racist, and it not only exists; it thrives. The question is not whether the culture is racist, but the question is if it thrives as a virus or thrives as a beautiful harvest of opportunities," Morrison said.

Morrison also mentioned the changing nature of literature and the emergence of a new paradigm that moves beyond race.

"Wouldn't it be nice if, in this case, life reflected art?" Morrison said. "I don't have the answers, but I can see the changes in literature about the stranger. Who are the foreigners? Maybe you are the foreigner on your own street."

Racial and feminist contexts of writing attempt to a categorize Morrison as a black writer or a woman writer.

"I wanted to frustrate the label of a black writer," Morrison said. "These [people's stereotypes] are not my racial politics; these are yours."

Students recognized the thought-provoking nature of Morrison's lecture.

"I agree with Ms. Morrison when she said that she wouldn't want a colorblind nation. We cannot escape the idea of race now; it is too ingrained in our society. However, that doesn't mean that it has to be a destructive force. Rather, it should be a source of creativity and new perspectives," Katie Kleissas '04 said. "The terms 'foreign' and 'native' contribute to race's destructive force because it forms a hostile separation between peoples. I believe that Ms. Morrison is exploring the consequences of this separation in her research."

In the question and answer period, Morrison discussed the porous borders of the nation-state due to globalism.

"Making demons and evil foreigners out of others is an old practice … with the stretch of globalism, there is a loss of the nation-state and nationality while there is a craving for it," Morrison said.

Morrison also entertained questions about teaching, motherhood and inspiration. She had a caveat to teachers to avoid focusing entirely on the canon or on the more alternative literature.

"One of my principle disappointments in the curricular debate over the canon is that it is one or the other," Morrison said.

Morrison also admitted to making mistakes while attempting to be both a writer and a mother. She said her children suffered the most from her mistakes, but joked that when they grew up, they made her pay for it.

She attributes her inspiration to a question—how did something feel—and that from not understanding and a desire to know, a book is born. Laughing, she added that she wished she could go to 7-11 for inspiration.

Rogers viewed the event as a success.

"This inaugural event is just amazing—the auditorium is full, we have a Nobel laureate speaking to us tonight and we have a wonderful set of guests," Rogers said. "I can't imagine a better evening or a better kickoff for the Janet Weis Series than this. Toni Morrison is a very special person, and we're fortunate to have her here. We put the whole package together, and it's a pretty amazing evening."

Morrison also appeared to enjoy the evening, and was pleased by the standing ovations that welcomed her to the stage.

"If you ever run out [of people to give the Fellowship to], I'll come back and get another 'Weis Prize,'" Morrison said jokingly.

University alum John Rusnak pled guilty Oct. 24 to charges stemming from $691.2 million trading scandal. Rusnak faces a sentence of seven and a half years in a federal prison.

Rusnak '86 pleads guilty to bank fraud

By Rachel Laskow
Editor-in-Chief

John Rusnak '86, a former trader at Baltimore's Allfirst Financial Inc., pled guilty to bank fraud in a $691.2 million trading scandal, according to The New York Times. During the Oct. 24 hearing, Rusnak admitted to one count of bank fraud.

Rusnak now faces a sentence of seven and a half years without parole in a federal prison on a single count of bank fraud. Rusnak will not be formally sentenced until Jan. 17. He is not expected to begin his prison term until after his sentencing hearing.

According to The Baltimore Sun, Rusnak will not be eligible for parole, though he could have his term reduced by as much as 13.5 months for good behavior. Rusnak will also have five years' probation after he is released from prison.

"This is a very stiff white-collar sentence," Maryland U.S. Attorney Thomas M. DiBiagio told The Sun. "We wanted to send a very clear statement out there that we consider this a serious crime. We wanted a very serious sentence in this case."

In addition to jail time, Rusnak also will be barred from serving as an officer, director or employee of any FDIC depository institution, according to The New York Times.

Rusnak majored in economics at the University and made the Dean's List twice. After graduating from the University, Rusnak began working at First Fidelity Bank in Philadelphia. In 1989, he worked for the foreign exchange division at Chemical Bank in New York. In 1993, Rusnak became a currency trader at the First National Bank, now known as Allfirst.

University Chaplain Ian Oliver believes that Rusnak's case brings up the question of where in their University education students are challenged to think through the line between honest competition and fraudulent manipulation.

"Cases like Rusnak's raise issues not only about Bucknell's stated ideals for character development, but also questions about our success at actually building individual character. Statements of goals are great, but are we really making the effort needed to help people develop critical ethical thinking while they are here?" Oliver said. "Of course, Bucknell cannot be held responsible for every misdeed of one of our graduates, any more than we can take the credit for every success, but this is a good time to think about where ethics and values come into our curriculum and residential life."

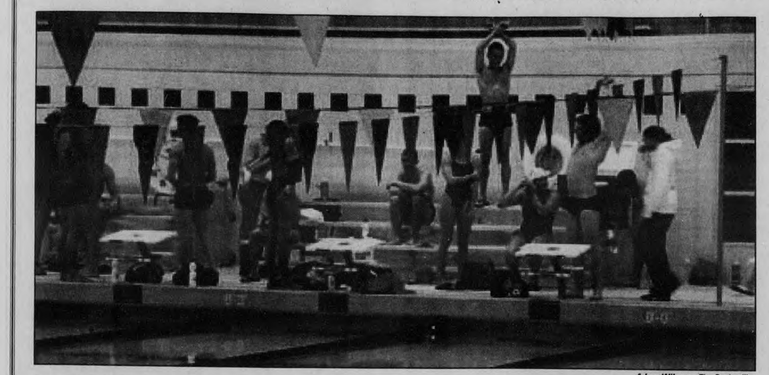
WATER, WATER EVERYWHERE: NEW NATATORIUM OPENS



Adam Wilcox—The Bucknellian

life. I don't operate on the syntax of because: I do this because of something. I operate on a syntax of so that: I do this so that something can happen. So, it's very real. I have an outcome I'm looking for. I am being the performance that will hopefully stimulate the greater outcome.

Can you tell me a little bit about your involvement in social activism?

PA: It's everything I do. I live it morning, noon and night. I want peace and justice and care. I think we live under a government that is comparable to Hitler's government. I think we are living on the verge of human extinction through many multi-factor problems in our environment, in our political systems, in our social systems. Since I think something can happen, I operate on many different areas and arenas hoping that something happens.

What was it like conducting a hospital out of your home?

PA: What do you think you learned from that experience? It just felt like a home. The way our thing operated was when you're home you can be a lawn mower, and a painter, and a cook, and a parent, and we were all those things and we were medical. So it was another hobby at home, so to speak. And you didn't have to go to work. You were around your family and you could integrate all of your interests easily, and it's cheaper, and more relaxing.

What advice do you have for students interested in going into the field of medicine?

PA: Love people. Love people. Love people. Feel the importance of your task, not only as a physician, but to reinvent medicine is a beautiful thing. We can no longer afford for the doctor to just look on the patient and their individual illnesses.

How do you feel that humor is able to communicate your ideas in a better way?

PA: It relaxes people. I go on an elevator dressed like this and people will relax. If I go on in a suit and act like an executive they can be uptight. I am large. I can convey a commanding presence, whatever that is. If I then, in that context, start a conversation with a man it would be one thing. If instead of that I came in as my vivacious self, I know by the 10th floor I could have a really personal conversation. It connects the community, makes community possible.

What have you learned about yourself over the years?

PA: I think I've made myself. I love life. I love affection … I love peace and justice.

Would you place your political views in a particular category?

PA: Peace and justice and care are my political views. See, for me, you have to first look at the social context or the social values system. In a value system of money and power, no political system will look good. That's what we have now. In a value system based on compassion and generosity, all the political systems would be good, because everyone will be valuing the people and being generous. It wouldn't matter if you were a monarchy or democracy or communist or socialist, because the value system would be compassion and generosity.

Adams returns to campus something of such high value to mankind is never taught anywhere in school.

At age 18, Adams decided his love strategy was to love everyone and be friendly towards everyone. As a doctor he also had a love strategy.

"I could not imagine being a doctor and not caring for all people. I was going to care for all patients equally," he said. "I was going to give them all long interviews and I wasn't going to charge any money. It's a love strategy: how to take one of the most expensive things in America and give it away for free; to make love a value. Right now money is the value. We worship money."

Patch aimed to change all this and has spent his life working towards this goal, among others.

"When 9/11 happened, I knew I loved Afghanis already. I had already gone from A to Z on the global track and said OK, I am going to love everybody."

He knew the president would be in support of the bombing of Afghanistan, adding that Bush is supported by the munitions industry.

Adams also implied an ulterior motive for bombing Afghanistan. By destroying the Taliban, the United States would gain access to the largest oil reserve in the world, found in Uzbekistan.

> "It's a love strategy: how to take one of the most expensive things in America and give it away for free; to make love a value."
> —Patch Adams

He also knew, from previous history, that the majority of deaths during war were those of civilians. Adams worried that many Afghans would soon be killed and wondered what possible love strategy could be applied here.

When the city of Rome asked Adams to go to Afghanistan, he quickly agreed, but asked if the visit could be made into a greater gesture. Adams was able to persuade Rome to allow him to take clowns from six continents and bring 10 tons of food.

Adams journeyed to Afghanistan in March and witnessed a hospital with three starving children to a bed. The hospital was void of food and medicine, but Adams and the other clowns brought smiles, laughter, balloons and bubbles to lighten the spirits of the children.

An Italian film director captured Adams' visit on film. The documentary conveyed the horror of poverty and starvation and the power of love and laughter. The film, entitled "Clown in Kabul," was shown at the Venice Film Festival and was included as part of Adams' presentation at the University.

"The heroes of this film are not people," Adams said. "You will see that love and humor are actually the heroes."

Adams regarded his actions, and this visit, as small gestures.

"These were the beginning ABCs of love strategies. Big gestures will stop war and end the gap between the rich and the poor," he said.

Adams concluded his lecture by suggesting love strategies for preventing the bombing of Iraq. He explained that if enough Americans were to go there, the American government could not kill its own people.

Melissa Milanak '03 called Adams a "very stimulating man, and he definitely makes you think about things. Not everyone can go to Afghanistan, but you can use those ideas and start smaller. He at least gave us a hope."

BUSINESS & POLITICS

Democratic party loses a strong member

The death of Sen. Paul Wellstone is a loss felt by both Republicans and Democrats

By Jim Leahy
Senior Writer

The race for Senate in Minnesota was extremely tight until last Friday when a small private plane carrying incumbent Democrat Paul Wellstone crashed in northern Minnesota. Wellstone, the Senate's most outspoken liberal, was 58. The race has now taken a decidedly different path, with Democrats naming 74-year-old Walter Mondale, former senator from Minnesota and vice president under Jimmy Carter, as Wellstone's replacement.

According to a report in The New York Times, Wellstone's twin-engine aircraft took off at 9:37 a.m. from Minneapolis-St. Paul and had a normal flight to the airport in Eveleth.

At 10:18, the pilot was lined up with the airport and was cleared to begin an east to west approach to the runway. At 10:19, the plane was at around 3,500 feet and began to drift towards the south. Two minutes later, radar made its last contact with the plane as it crossed 1,800 feet at only 85 knots.

Acting Chair of the National Transportation Safety Board Carol Carmody said, "Everything had been completely normal up until that time, and there was no evidence on the controller's part or from the pilot's voice that there was any difficulty, no reported problems, no expressed concern. We don't know why the turn was occurring. That's what we hope to find out."

At the time of the crash, weather conditions were poor, but nothing was out of the ordinary. The plane had anti-icing equipment, but investigators do not know if it was operational at the time of the crash. Investigators did find damage to the propeller blades that may suggest that the engines were running at the time of the crash.

Leadership in the Senate is taking the loss of Wellstone hard.

"Paul Wellstone was the soul of the Senate. He was one of the most noble and courageous men I have ever known. He was a gallant and passionate fighter, especially for the less fortunate. I am grateful to have known Paul and Sheila as dear and close friends. Their deaths are a shattering loss to Minnesota, to the nation and to all who knew and loved them," Tom Daschle, D-N.D., said in a statement published on the Senate's Web site.

Wellstone was a well-known and fierce liberal. On the short side of many 99-1 votes in the Senate, he worked hard to keep to his beliefs in an environment that creates many false promises. Congressional Quarterly (CQ) wrote of Wellstone that he remained "one of the last of the unreconstructed liberals in Congress."

"I represent the Democratic wing of the Democratic Party," he proudly told audiences in Iowa as he considered a run for the presidency in 2000.

"Wellstone cited his mission as a liberal advocate in January 2001, when he declared that he would run for re-election in 2002. The onset of Republican control of both the White House and Congress had caused him to reconsider, he explained. And with an evenly divided Senate, he said, 'I am in a position to make a huge difference,'" according to CQ.

"Wellstone rarely backs away from a fight. The champion 126-pound wrestler at the University of North Carolina has frequently tangled (only verbally) with Minnesota Governor Jesse Ventura, the 250-pound former wrestling professional," CQ reported.

Courtesy of Reuters

Mourners attending Senator Wellstone's memorial service in Minneapolis this week. Senator Paul Wellstone was one of several people killed in an unexplained plane crash last week.

His style did rub some in Washington, D.C. the wrong way. Lobbyists named him "one of the worst-dressed senators" in a Washingtonian Magazine survey. In another survey of congressional staffers, he was named one of the Senate's "biggest windbags."

Wellstone did stick to his beliefs even in the face of political suicide. During voting this month in the Senate, Wellstone voted against the resolution allowing U.S. President George W. Bush to use force in dealing with Iraqi President Saddam Hussein. He was the only Democrat in a tight re-election race to do so.

The big question right now is what happens next. On Wednesday, Democrats in Minnesota named Mondale as Wellstone's replacement. Republicans believe privately, according to a report in The Washington Post, that Mondale will be very difficult to defeat. Before his death, Wellstone was protecting a slim lead over former St. Paul mayor Norm Coleman and was seen as possibly the most endangered incumbent in the country. Sympathy may now run strong and help Mondale to victory.

Many expect Mondale to focus his campaign on Wellstone's legacy and less on his own career. Republicans are moving to counteract that strategy. They are questioning Mondale's motives directly while keeping their own candidate out of the spotlight.

Howard Kurtz, media columnist for The Washington Post, said that Newt Gingrich noted on "Meet the Press" that "Mondale had long pushed tax increases" (he famously promised a tax hike in his landslide presidential loss in 1984) and James Carville accused him of slash-and-burn tactics.

Meanwhile, "the White House's handpicked candidate," Coleman was a class act on "This Week," refusing to be drawn into even the most rudimentary political comments by saying that Minnesota is still in mourning for the eight people who died on Wellstone's plane.

The Wall Street Journal reported, "Republican nominee Coleman immediately suspended all campaign activities in a race that was neck and neck. A statewide poll of 1,000 likely voters last week gave Mr. Wellstone a slight lead over Mr. Coleman, 47 percent to 41 percent. But that's essentially a tie when you consider that the margin of error is plus or minus three percentage points."

The Post also said that Gov. Jesse Ventura can appoint a replacement for Wellstone who would step aside once the vote is certified. The winner will likely take his position in the lame-duck session of Congress and will play a role in debating some hot partisan issues, including the budget and the Department of Homeland Security.

Neither Democrats nor Republicans can count on Ventura, elected as a Reform Party candidate. Regardless of what Ventura decides, it is possible that whoever is elected Nov. 5 would immediately take Professor Wellstone's seat, according to State Attorney General Mike Hatch and Prof. David Schultz, who teaches election law at Hamline University in St. Paul, Minn. Under that interpretation, if Coleman wins, the current one-seat margin in the Senate would switch to the Republican Party. Minnesota Secretary of State Mary Kiffmeyer's reading of the law has an appointee sitting until January, according to The Wall Street Journal.

This story will add to the intrigue on Election Day. Many see similarities to a Missouri race last year, in which Mel Carnahan died just weeks before Election Day but defeated John Ashcroft, the present Attorney General. Whether or not sympathy for Wellstone's death plays out, the race is tight and will remain tight to the end.

U.S. politicians obsessed with inexpensive energy at all costs

By Mike Niebauer
Senior Writer

Recent events have brought out once again that the American political and economic system is obsessed with procuring relatively inexpensive energy at all costs regardless of the environmental, domestic or foreign policy implications. With full knowledge of the implications, we boldly proceed with mainly unsustainable policies that are sowing the seeds of energy shortages and decline in our way of life in the years to come. Sadly, this is mostly a foreseeable and avoidable future. Energy independence through denial being the American way, I will continue stating the most recent installment of the disturbingly depressing tale.

Last week the federal court ordered the Bush administration to turn over documentation of the Cheney Energy Task Force for the second time, just as government lawyers claimed that they would take the case to federal appeals court before complying. Vice President Dick Cheney's lawyers, while appealing, are hoping to extend this issue past the upcoming election. It is well known that the since-discredited Enron corporation and other energy trading companies were attendees of this closed conference where future federal energy policy was reportedly discussed and proposed.

The Washington Post's article on the issue continued that federal judges in other lawsuits have ordered the Energy Department and other agencies to turn over tens of thousands of documents about the meetings. The Bush administration will eventually protect itself by claiming "executive privilege," but not before the first week of November and the end of the election cycle. The energy industry gangsterism is apparently pervasive, spreading and fueled by our energy policies handed down from secretive meetings like the Cheney Energy Task Force.

A New York Times article this week points out that The Williams Company admits its energy traders gave out false data on energy prices, which exacerbated, if not caused, the California energy shortages of last year. Two other corporations, American Electric Power (AEP) and Dynegy competitors, in the same business fired energy traders for feeding bogus information to energy industry publications. Dynegy and AEP have not yet responded to requests that they specify which reports by the former employees were false. (No big surprise there.) The "cowboy" attitude in energy dealings doesn't stop at our border. As we look toward a confrontation with Iraq, oil service companies are gearing up for the spoils (contracts) afterward. Who gets these profits will be partially decided on Election Day and regrettably later on Iraqi battlefields. It will be instructive to see who receives the contracts for "reconstruction of the Iraqi oil infrastructure" after those battles.

B & P Commentary

American companies such as Halliburton, the corporation Cheney previously headed, will be lining up for their shares of the much delayed refitting of Iraqi oil fields. Halliburton, through its Brown and Root subsidiary, will also profit handsomely from its supplying of provisions to our armed forces in the region in the invasion phase of the operation.

A Deutsche Bank report in The New York Times states that the contracts for the reconstruction of Iraqi oil fields and revenues to oil field service corporations will be at least $1.5 billion over two years. Depending on the circumstances of the outcome in Iraq (war damage and who markets the oil reserves in the aftermath), the future contracts for expanded oil field exploration in Iraq will be at least $38 billion. Iraqi President Saddam Hussein has signed a memorandum of understanding with many oil companies effective once sanctions are lifted. American and British oil companies have not been part of this process … so far.

Hussein favors French, Russian and Chinese companies' oil negotiations; in an astute attempt at manipulating the U.N. Security Council that may be working to slow down the resolution process. France and Russia are balking at a resolution of force and a coalition against regime change in Iraq. These proposed contracts, worth billions, have to be a part of the equation for the French and the Russians while they consider their U.N. diplomacy. Since oil is such an important resource, all major world powers must have some say in this matter or be dependent, economically and politically, to those who have access for years. We must keep in mind that we are talking about a resource that will quite possibly run out or at least become prohibitively expensive from scarcity in our lifetime.

Perhaps this is what is producing the obsession of the Bush administration and its new doctrine of "pre-emptive actions" and "American pre-eminence" in foreign policy dealings.

The U.S. doctrine openly stated and championed by National Security Adviser Condoleezza Rice, Cheney, Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld and Deputy Defense Secretary Paul Wolfowitz plans to use our overwhelming advantage in military power to discourage all other nations from equaling or surpassing the power of the United States … ever again. Other nations see this as the "Hertz Doctrine" or "We are No. 1 doctrine." This assertion cannot be defended because it creates the factionalism and dissent it aims to combat. The New York Times stated that a former National Security Council Adviser under George Bush Sr., Philip Zelikow, said the doctrine is "aggressively opaque. The policy implications of the doctrine are unclear at best."

When you go to the polls be warned that we are voting on more than candidate looks or debating ability. Our votes will be for those who would support or decry the issues in this focused commentary. As we work on our last 50 years of economically recoverable oil reserves, the energy policies we implement and the politics connected to them will decide future history. Denial of the finite nature of oil in our current energy policy is an unsustainable and an inevitably dead-end policy. Our actions matter immensely as we speak to the future from the voting booth this fall.

Former death row inmates speak at University

By Charles Mitchell
Senior Writer

Two former death row inmates addressed a packed Rooke Auditorium on Oct. 16 as part of Pennsylvania Abolitionists United Against the Death Penalty's "Voices of Innocence Tour." Each man—Ray Krone and William Nieves—told his own story of enduring long years in jail with the threat of imminent execution for a crime he did not commit.

The presentation began with an American Bar Association (ABA) film entitled "Executing Injustice," which decried the "unacceptable error rate" allegedly involved in death penalty cases. The film argued that the system "treats you better if you're rich and guilty than poor and innocent," due to racial and ethnic discrimination and a lack of adequate counsel, meaningful judicial review and fair trials.

The first speaker was Jeff Garrett of the abolitionists group. Garrett said that although he was in favor of completely doing away with capital punishment, his objective right now is an immediate moratorium on capital punishment until the issues mentioned in the ABA film are extensively studied.

Next came the main attraction, Ray Krone, the nation's 100th death row prisoner to be exonerated. Krone introduced himself as a "dead man walking" and detailed not just his wrongful conviction, but also his entire life, including his "small-town integrity." He described countless examples of what would appear to be egregious abuses in the system. The crime of which he was convicted was kidnapping, sexually assaulting and murdering a woman he had met at a bar, who was alleged to be his girlfriend, but was not.

When Krone told the police that he was not the woman's boyfriend and had no idea how she had died, he was immediately accused of lying. Upon his arrest, Krone was subjected to what he called "dehumanizing treatment" in jail.

Then, when he was charged, he was shocked to hear the public defender tell him, "You can expect to be found guilty," and that the real question was what to do once the case was on appeal. What is worse is that the public defender simply left when Krone lost his temper because of this. The replacement attorney who was appointed to represent him, he said, was paid a mere $5,000 for his services, and had only four months to prepare for the trial.

Krone charged that hair and fingerprints found at the scene of the crime did not match his, and that the only evidence that the prosecution really had was a claim that his teeth matched a bite mark found on the victim's breast. This evidence was the root of the charge of sexual assault—and, after the prosecutor had soundly beaten Krone's lawyer and Krone was convicted, it became an "aggravating factor" that motivated the judge to sentence Krone to death.

After many long years in prison, Krone's own legal research and the intervention of a kind and wealthy cousin—who got him "a real lawyer"—convinced the Arizona Supreme Court to grant him a new trial. More prosecutorial misconduct came to light in the process. The victim's pants and underwear had never been tested for DNA, despite the charge of sexual assault. When such testing occurred, it was discovered that the DNA present matched someone else—a man who could not remember what he had done on that fateful night, but eventually admitted that he had woken up the next morning with blood on his hands, for reasons he did not know. That information was leaked to a newspaper, and quicker than Krone could believe, the charges involved in his second trial were dropped and he was a free man. Yet, Krone said, "Maybe this is what God intended,"—"this" being to experience a 10-year ordeal and the challenge to fight the inequitable death penalty.

The next former inmate, William Nieves, gave a much shorter speech regarding his own six-year experience. A Hispanic, he had nonetheless been convicted of a murder that witnesses said they saw two black males commit. He was not questioned until 10 months after the murder, at which time he, of course, could not remember exactly where he was during a certain half-hour interval on that specific night. Once charged, Nieves was denied funds for an investigator, and his own lawyer refused to let him testify at his trial.

The prosecutor told the jury that they had seen all the evidence. After Nieves was convicted, it came to light that there were two other witnesses to the crime, one of whom completely exonerated him. The Pennsylvania Supreme Court eventually granted Nieves a new trial, at which he was acquitted. "I don't care if it's just one case . . .I think that's enough reason to end the death penalty," Nieves said.

The final speaker was a legislative aide to state Sen. Edward W. Helfrick, R-Pa. The aide called the Senator a "phenomenal voice" in the fight against capital punishment, justifying his opposition on religious grounds. Pointing to Krone and Nieves, he said, "There are more stories like these sitting on death row." He urged those in attendance to "fill the steps of the Capitol" at a mass demonstration planned for Oct. 23.

Low approval ratings for BSG show improvements needed

The Bucknellian's recent poll about the Bucknell Student Government's (BSG) approval ratings provided information about the students' reactions to student government that had not previously been available. Often, when people are presented with new information, they do not necessarily know how to interpret it. This was the case with Class of 2005 President John Siwicki, who believed The Bucknellian's intentions were negative. After the polling data were compiled, editors asked the class presidents to comment on the results.

In error, the editors sent an e-mail to Rich Karcher '05, believing that he was the sophomore class president. In an e-mail response, Siwicki said, "I disagree with The Bucknellian's methods in collecting information, as those conducting the survey cannot even identify the class presidents and are clearly not aware of BSG affairs." The irony of Siwicki's statement is that The Bucknellian conducted the survey with the expressed purpose of determining whether students were able to identify BSG officers and affairs.

In fact, the only place on campus to find the names of BSG class officers is in the student mailroom (the Web site only lists the executive officers and committee chairs). Even conducting a Bucknell Web site search will not reveal the BSG officers. Therefore, it is no surprise that, on average, less than one-half of the student body knows its class officers. Based on the officers' term lengths, the variations among the classes are not too surprising. Seniors ranked the highest with 70.7 percent (Class of 2003 President Laura Day is serving her third term as class president) and juniors ranked the lowest with 22.2 percent (approximately four out of 13 junior class officers are veterans).

However, BSG is not completely at fault for these results. While it does have a responsibility to publicize its representatives and projects, it is essential for the student body to also take an active roll in BSG's affairs. Students have a responsibility to go to BSG with problems. For this very reason, BSG allows students to address Congress during meetings.

Another advantage of students attending BSG meetings is to learn the actual abilities of BSG. For example, candidates often campaign with unrealistic promises such as eliminating lines in the caf. By learning the realities of BSG, students can better select candidates to represent them.

The realities of BSG are limited by the administration. BSG President Amir Sadaghiani '03 considers Congress a consulting body, providing the administration with advice when requested. This, too, explains why BSG's approval ratings may have been low. Many activities that the student government works on are not implemented, such as installing cable in residence halls. Cable is ultimately in the hands of the administration, and students cannot see the extent of BSG's effort.

There must be a cooperative effort between the administration and students in order to increase BSG's approval ratings. By providing more power to BSG and decreasing the amount of the bureaucratic elements involved in implementation, students will no doubt have a greater respect for and be more aware of BSG on campus. In a similar fashion, if students become more active on campus and further involved with BSG, the administration will have a greater respect for BSG and be more likely to provide them with such increased power to initiate real change.

Let's start out simple: Publicize the names of the BSG class officers.

Sole point of V-Day is to stop violence

To the Editor:

In response to the letter regarding the men's monologue in Eve Ensler's "The Vagina Monologues" for the 2003 performance, I would like to clarify some points. There was a misinterpretation as to why a men's monologue was added, and I am at fault because in my excitement for the new monologue, I did not explain why V-Day Bucknell has chosen to participate. For that, I apologize to anyone who may have seen this as V-Day losing its thunder or as a retrogressive step in ending violence.

The mission of V-Day is—without any equivocations—to end violence against women and girls. Now, in considering that mission, you must examine how to go about doing so, which leads me to the point that it takes everybody. Violence against women affects everyone. The victims are our mothers, sisters, friends, girlfriends and wives. Our love and support for them is empowering. The men's monologue is a possibility for men, to express support; "The Vagina Monologues" serves as a medium.

The original script of "The Vagina Monologues" is the stories of real women. As a work of art, each person takes away from it individually. Though, I will not deny that women relate more to the play, and in the context of the V-Day Campaign, the play is generally directed to women.

I want to make it clear that criticisms from campus members in the past have no bearing on the introduction of men in the play. The men's monologue, for this year, is coincidental: who participates, how the play is performed and other logistics are regulated by directors of the V-Day Campaign. Because the play is usually reproduced at the same venues every year, it evolves to bring something fresh to its audience, and Ensler decides the methods of production for the College and Worldwide Campaigns.

There are actually two new monologues: one for men and another for women, and both (entitled "A World without Violence") are written by members of the campus community. The men's monologue will be performed by men. V-Day Bucknell has chosen only to do the men's monologue because men have expressed an interest in participating in the performance.

"The Vagina Monologues" in the past has been limiting for men, but this project allows men to use their talents as writers and speakers. So I invite the men of Bucknell—students and staff—to take a stand with V-Day Bucknell and audition on Nov. 11 and 13 at 7 p.m. in the LC Forum. No acting experience required.

Sincerely,
Valerie Lam '04
President-V-Day Bucknell

Many things can describe safety

To the Editor:

Becca Susman's article describes a fear women share and the effects it has on our lives—the fear of rape imposes self-restriction or a refusal to submit to fear. Either choice limits freedom. I say it's time to declaw the catcallers!

First Susman asks, "Is [safety] the gut instinct that tells you to run?" Yes! Learning to listen to your internal voice is the most effective self-defense skill a woman can master. That wise voice is millions of years old; its message the result of thousands of sensory input messages.

Next, "[Is safety] the statistic of how many assaults occurred wherever you are?" Yes! But statistics only give half the picture. Women must also have a clear picture of the kinds of assaults that happen and how they happen.

Is the mediated image of psychotic strangers jumping out from nowhere reality? Sometimes yes, like the brutal assault in the Lewisburg cemetery some time ago. Such assaults are horrific—but uncommon. The reason you hear so much about assaults is that the media capitalizes on sensational stories. More commonly stranger attacks begin with testing behaviors. Ted Bundy faked injuries and asked for help. Jack the Ripper approached prostitutes posing as a customer. The Boston Strangler finessed his way into victims' homes.

Even more common are assaults by acquaintances or loved ones. To develop effective safety strategies we must search beyond statistics. Who is raping? What kinds of relationships do victims have with assailants? What kinds of exchanges precede physical violence? Where do assaults happen? What sorts of defenses have been successful?

Answering these questions results in better decisions about safety and less unwarranted fear. "Nonetheless, I feel safe," Susman said. Is she naive? No! Nor does she have a false sense of security. Her awareness and precaution are commendable; the probability of being jumped is low in comparison to other scenarios.

Studies show that women who have successfully defended themselves invariably used a combination of physical, verbal and psychological strategies. Consider enrolling in a self-defense course, but ask questions first. Does the course only offer skills to defend against "jumpers," or does it also explore emotional dynamics often involved in relationships between victim and assailant? Does it offer opportunities for role-play and activities to develop skills to defend against all phases of assault? Do instructors have necessary training to relate to survivors?

University must maintain accountability

To the Editor:

The decision to nullify Bucknell Student Government (BSG) funding of the Conservatives Club's speaker, Thor Halvorssen of the Foundation for Individual Rights in Education (FIRE), is an unfortunate and discreditable violation of basic principles of academic freedom and civil liberties. I hope the BSG will stand its ground and seek to attain the funding, albeit now post facto.

The Bucknellian article ("Administration does not approve speaker," Oct. 11) stated that the decision was recommended by the University's General Counsel Wayne Bromfield and approved by the "president's staff." Without further definition of the latter, which might be taken as a passing of the buck, although the article quoted Dean of Students Richard Ferraro in defense of the administration's decision. I hope The Bucknellian may report more specifics about the decision-making process to assist the University community in maintaining accountability in the exercise of power and authority in so important a matter as this.

The administration decision, if it is as explained in the report, seems typical of a use of bureaucratic gobbledygook to suppress freedom of speech, assembly and basic student rights, on the part of insufficiently thoughtful, overly career-centered and irresponsibility ephemeral administrators.

As a left-winger, as a member of the University community and as a citizen, I want to express my solidarity in this matter with BSG and with the Conservatives Club. However much I may strongly disagree with views of the club's members, in defense of freedom of speech, assembly and basic principles of academic freedom, I hope that-all of us in the University community who hold dear these principles will speak up similarly.

Sincerely,
Martin Sklar
Professor, Department of History

Some just don't think about race

To the Editor:

Having been surrounded by numerous conversations on campus regarding issues of race, we have been wrestling with how to respond. We're guilty of not understanding the full extent of race issues; so when we say something, we risk offending black students because of our ignorance. We must say something, because white students need to understand the significance of race.

We are realizing that race issues run deeper than they seem; the current situation is actually a flare-up of a chronic problem. As white students, we don't have to think about race. At the University, most people look like us—in our classes, where we live, in the administration. People don't question why we were accepted to the University. We aren't identified or categorized by our race. These things make it safe and comfortable for us to be here; for white people, race doesn't have to be an issue.

At the University, black students have to live with the race issue every day. In almost every class, there is at most one black student. When groups are chosen for group projects, the black student is often the last one chosen, and he or she feels unwanted. When black students speak, they feel the pressure of having to represent their whole race. Often, they are questioned why they attend the University; the assumption is that they are athletes or that they fill a quota. Our campus is unwelcoming and uncomfortable for black students; in fact, most hate all four years here.

Obviously, the two experiences outlined above are very different. We are all part of the University; we are all part of the problem. Fear keeps the problem in place. White students hesitate to respond to race issues because they fear conflict and change. Black students are hurting; trusting those who have hurt you is hard, even those who claim to care.

This problem is painful, and it seems impossible to resolve. It's easier to ignore it than to deal with it. But, God cares a lot about race. We are all made in his image: each person reveals part of God's character. Because of this, the four of us are choosing to recognize our responsibility in understanding the importance of race.

We are hoping that white students will realize there is a problem and then try to understand what it means to be black at the University.

God is the source of hope in this.

Is socialized health care more effective?

Yes

By Kevin Brown
Staff Writer

Do not fall prey to the illusion that our nation's current health care system works. It does not. Today, under the free market system, one in seven Americans does not have health insurance, and of those, 11.1 million are children.

More than twice as much money is spent by citizens/employers on health care than the government spends on the defense budget. Put another way, 13.5 percent of the Gross National Product (GNP) is from health care, a number that was as low as 6 percent in the 1960s. In comparison to other developed nations, we are also at the high end of the spectrum. In Canada the number is 8 percent and the United Kingdom and Japan only spend 6 percent of the GNP.

But wait, there's more!

You may be saying to yourself that our high premiums, ever shrinking coverage and billions of dollars sunk into health care is at least making us a healthier nation. Unfortunately, this is not the case. The United States ranks 19th in male life expectancy, and our infant mortality rate is the highest among industrialized nations.

So where does all this money go if it is not improving our collective health? The answer is bureaucracy.

The free market system for health care that we currently use is extremely inefficient and requires many different providers and patients to pay in combination for care, which creates enormous amounts of paperwork and costs time for physicians.

Additionally, we are forced to pay more because the providing insurers are trying to make a profit. The roughly 1,500 health insurers in the United States currently consume about eight percent of all their revenue for overhead. Compared with the Medicare program for senior citizens or the Canadian National Health program, each of which use only 2-3 percent of revenue for overhead, we are not getting a good deal.

Our current health insurance system is incapable of meeting our needs. What is needed is a new national health program that will replace our bulky and inefficient free market system and makes sure that every American is covered.

Attempting to tweak the old system will not work and will only create new problems. It can never guarantee that in one of the world's wealthiest nations, everyone will have health care.

Possibly the best scenario for a national health care system was proposed in the U.S. House of Representatives by Rep. Marty Russo, D-Ill., in 1991. Under Russo's bill, which draws heavily from the Canadian system, there is a single payer (the U.S. government) for all costs in regard to health, including long-term and catastrophic injury care.

This system would equally cover all Americans regardless of employment status. Employers would then not have to pay for insurance for its employees; they would increase its salaries to reflect that difference in benefits. This increase in wages would be neutralized by an increase in taxes to afford the whole system.

Granted, this is not the forum for hammering out small details of how to make this new system work. Once in place, there will be a framework from which people can be sure of getting quality care instead of relying on the exclusive, antiquated, unorganized and inefficient behemoth that we live with today.

No

By Aaron Hanlon
Staff Writer

While the ideal of socialized health care appears on the surface to be an attractive alternative to the more privatized U.S. system, it remains just that—an ideal concept whose apparent luster becomes increasingly tarnished as we look more closely at its ideology and effects. Both the rationale behind socialized health care and the empirical evidence of its lackluster record are essential for our assessment.

Health care is certainly different from traditional commodities in that it directly affects the quality of our lives. That being said, we cannot necessarily equate buying health care with purchasing a new car or stereo. It is essential for society to have some kinds of charitable endeavors (non-profit health clinics, church-based health care charities, etc.) that aid those who cannot afford health care. On top of these, limited government health care programs such as Medicare and Medicaid are public goods that help the elderly and poor obtain health care services. Though good health is indeed a public good, we must not take this to an extreme and neglect the rights of physicians and other health care professionals to market their skills and services.

In addition to this, there are many who are able to pay higher, market-set rates for health care. These people should not be deprived of their right to seek higher quality care if they can afford it. Ideologically, socialized health care embodies the socialist notion that personal earnings and individual rights are meaningless in comparison to the ultimate goal of equal distribution of wealth. Opposing this doctrine as it relates to health care does not mean equating the value of health care with that of less important commodities, but rather recognizing that providing basic health care for everyone in the form of Medicare and Medicaid should be the government's first and last step toward achieving the public good of good health.

Thereafter, health care becomes more of a commodity (though not entirely) by virtue of the individual rights of the professionals who possess valuable service capabilities and the individual rights of those who have the means to attain those services. Though it may seem cold or unfeeling to suggest that government guaranteed health care is only to an extent a public good, this is a virtually irrelevant argument in light of evidence of socialized health care's failure to perform adequately and provide its purported benefits. Much like the Soviet experiment in communism, the socialized health care beacons of Canada and Sweden are recently finding that public health care is inferior to its privatized counterpart.

According to a recent study by the Fraser Institute, a public policy think tank based in Vancouver, Canada ranks near the bottom of states that have socialized health care, in spite of its $64 billion yearly health care expenditures that make it the world's highest-ranked country in per capita health care spending. The Canadian system, which forbids any form of private care or payment for core health care services, has 1.8 doctors for every 1,000 citizens.

Such inadequacies have lead Canadian officials to consider privatization because of the gross inefficiency and seemingly endless waiting lists for the most basic of medical services. Similarly, Swedish socialists are pushing for privatization. Nearly 10 years ago, the Greater Council (a regional governing body) of Stockholm sparked Sweden's lagging health care system by adding aspects of privatization.

The Greater Council sold one of Stockholm's largest hospitals, St. George, to a private company. Within the privatized hospital's first year of operation, it outperformed other leading government-owned hospitals in efficiency by 10-15 percent. This example encouraged Swedish socialists to advocate and implement even more reforms. Citing inefficiency and inadequate service, the world's most prominent paradigms of socialized health care have been retreating to the safe haven of privatization for the last decade. As privatized health care sectors continue to outperform socialized sectors, the movement away from public care seems to be a healthy decision.

Vivisection should not be a requirement

By Josh Fisher
Opinions Editor

Somewhere between four and five billion animals are raised every year for sole purpose of being slaughtered to feed Americans. Millions more each year fall victim to educational experiments such as dissection, or are caged up for the entire span of their lives, only to suffer the pain of vivisection before death.

A bachelor of science (B.S.) in animal behavior at the University requires that a student take a specific set of classes, one of which requires vivisection, the cutting of live tissue of a hamster and placing staples in its head—the hamster is then killed in the physiology lab.

I am very proud to say that a friend of mine refused to do the vivisection out of strictly moral and ethical reasons. But as the animal behavior department said, her "option" was to get the bachelor of arts (B.A.) degree—it flat out refused to work with her on this.

Was this process of vivisection so fundamental to her education or her degree? She didn't think so, and so she graduated with a B.A., refusing to sacrifice her morals for the difference.

Her resolve, in my opinion, evidences a deeper understanding of the true nature of animals than anyone I know. Fundamentally, she understands that an animal's life is of greater value than any small amount of knowledge obtained in a vivisection experiment.

We typically justify the crimes enacted against animals because these are "inferior" life forms—dogs and cats cannot do calculus, for example, while pigs and cows cannot enjoy poetry. Regardless of this intellectual inferiority, nonhuman animals are more than the property of humans, and nonhuman animals have more value than their utility to us. They are psychological beings with an experiential welfare of their own.

We typically justify the crimes enacted against animals because these are "inferior" life forms–dogs cannot do calculus while pigs cannot enjoy poetry.

But we are convinced of our own exceptionality—animals are at the disposal of mankind, the soulless property of humans, and we lend little more worth to these sentient creatures than to the rocks or the dirt upon which we build our houses and roads.

Indeed, for all the rights and intrinsic values humanity endows itself with, must this include the right to decide life and death of conscious and feeling nonhuman animals? Is mankind the absolute pinnacle, the end product, the finality, the climax of the cosmic drama of all creation?

Not for all of us.

If this is not the case, then you must question what is "humanity" and distinguish between what is "human" and what is "animal." As a matter of biological continuity, are we not animals ourselves?

If there were no fundamental distinction between animals and humans, then there would certainly be no justification for humanity subjugating animals, keeping them in dark, unpadded cages or brutally slaughtering them. There would be no moral justification for the commerce that exists in selling flesh or for the sport in killing weaker beings—this sort of human behavior would be demoralized by our own hand because it would be like killing another living, breathing human being.

Of course not everyone believes in animal rights, but the fact remains that there are those of us who believe whole-heartedly that the same set of fundamental moral principles that govern our interactions with human animals should also govern our interactions with nonhuman animals.

The animals that are raised, chained so they cannot even move out of their own filth; the animals that are killed, cut open in vivisection experiments or dissected in the name of science; and the ones that are hunted, trapped and exploited in innumerable, unspeakable ways have lives of their own that are of importance to them, apart from their utility to us.

They not only exist in this world, but they are well aware of it; what happens to them matters to them. Each has a life that fares better or worse for the animal whose life it is, a life with biological, individual and social needs, whether these needs are a source of pleasure or a source of pain.

Although it is true that there are those who believe in vivisection as a "necessary evil" of higher education and of science, for those who do not, the University should realize that an ethical objection is indeed a legitimate objection—that the act of vivisection for a someone who is morally opposed to the practice would only come at the expense of that person's human character.

Houseparty should be held in warmer months

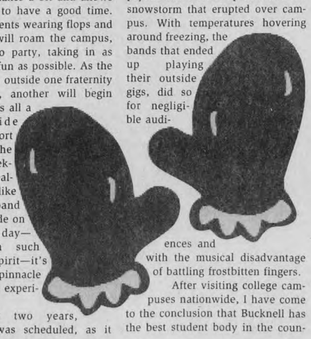
Weekend festivities would be more enjoyable if held at end of spring semester

By Tom Elliott
Senior Writer

Our university and many others like it have a special weekend dedicated to celebrating the return of warm weather each year. For us, Houseparty Weekend has traditionally been held during the latter April days, closely preluding the finals period. As of late, the Calendar Planning Committee has improperly placed it during the cold, winter months. For the sake of the student body, this situation should be returned back to normal.

No other weekend in the spring so directly affects such a large proportion of students, which is all the reason needed for it to be scheduled when it's best suited ... Planning Houseparty right before the end of the semester would indicate that the administration does indeed consider the students' interests when making policy decisions.

Thoughts of Houseparty conjure images of students happily celebrating the one weekend where the University relaxes a bit and allows the students to have a good time. Carefree students wearing flops and a Hawaiian will roam the campus, from party to party, taking in as much of the fun as possible. As the band playing outside one fraternity winds down, another will begin next door. It's all a student-wide collective effort to create the ultimate weekend. There really is nothing like a good band playing outside on a sunny day—everyone in such high spirit—it's arguably the pinnacle college social experience.



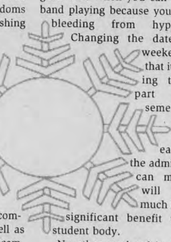
The last two years, Houseparty was scheduled, as it tentatively is right now, for the last weekend in March. Instead of open-toed shoes and T-shirts, people were bundled up in moon boots and wool coats, as they literally had to psyche themselves up to brave the snowstorm that erupted over campus. With temperatures hovering around freezing, the bands that ended up playing their outside gigs, did so for negligible audiences and with the musical disadvantage of battling frostbitten fingers.

After visiting college campuses nationwide, I have come to the conclusion that Bucknell has the best student body in the country. It's unfortunate this isn't a category in the Princeton Review rankings, because I honestly think we would win. Nowhere else have I seen such a dense collection of cool and interesting kids. Even our dorks and geeks are far cooler than the dorks and geeks on other campuses. This is why even in the face of so much undue administrative wrangling with students, Bucknellians still have such a good collegiate experience.

Most agree the administration treats the students a little too much parents would their young kids. Rules and regulations restrict freedoms on campus to an astonishing degree—all for the stated goal of student safety and happiness. The Community Judicial Board has interpreted the Student Code of Conduct to include a right to not be offended (although Dean of Students Richard Ferraro had no problems with comparing me to Larry Flynt as well as calling me a bad person over a campus-wide e-mail). Our First, Second and Fifth Amendment rights are all abridged. The list of things we aren't allowed to do is too long to get into.

The school literally rakes in around $100,000 in student fines every year. They will profit off of our digressions while imposing ever newer policies supposedly intended to combat them. Not only did visiting students have to pay to attend Houseparty, but Bucknellians did as well. Of all the thousands collected from this, those responsible for holding the events received no financial assistance. Instead, they were all subsequently fined thousands of dollars directly after the weekend (except for the ones that were on probation and not allowed to have parties), for things like their yards not being cleaned on time.

The point is: students are treated like rebellious 15-year-olds, instead of the legal adults we are. Houseparty is the weekend where the administration says, "OK, we are going to chill out for one weekend, so have a good time." But it's difficult to have a good time when you can't hear the band playing because your ears are bleeding from hypothermia. Changing the date of this weekend so that it falls during the latter part of the semester is a very small, easy move the administration can make that will have a much larger and significant benefit upon the student body.



No other weekend in the spring so directly affects such a large proportion of students, which is all the reason needed for it to be scheduled when it's best suited. Similarly, no other spring weekend is so dependent on nice weather as Houseparty is. Planning Houseparty right before the end of the semester would indicate that the administration does indeed consider the students' interests when making policy decisions.

SASA dinner a huge success

Eric Grahm—The Bucknellian

A student performs during the ribbon dance. The dance was part of the SASA dinner, which also featured traditional South Asian food.

By Kristi Johnston
Arts and Entertainment Editor

The South Asian Student Association (SASA) is a campus organization that prides itself on teaching, advancing and celebrating the cultures and traditions of the various countries in South Asia. In pursuit of this goal, it annually holds a Diwali dinner, recognizing the festival of lights that is celebrated throughout South Asia. This year's dinner was held last Saturday in Larison Dining Hall.

The event kicked off with an introduction by SASA Co-Presidents Yamini Laks '03 and Nikhil Menon '03. They introduced the club's officers and explained the meaning behind the Diwali holiday.

"The first day [of Diwali] is a celebration of the triumph of good over evil," Menon said. "Rows of lamps are usually lit up in all public places, the home and temples. The second day, prayers are continued, and during the day drums are played to get rid of the bad spirits. On the third day, family members gather and the brothers give gifts to their sisters, while the sisters prepare dinner for their brothers."

The dinner, catered by the Indian Pavilion restaurant in State College, Pa., featured many traditional South Asian foods, including vegetable pakoras, chicken Tandoori, basmati rice, Murgh Makhani and Gulab Jamun.

SASA members also provided entertainment before and after the meal. Female SASA members performed a traditional ribbon dance choreographed by Nisha Dheer '04 and Pryia Gupta '06, as well as an Indian dance choreographed by Laks.

"Our dancers were fantastic," Laks said. "They always came to practices ready to work hard, which payed off in the end."

The evening concluded with another dance choreographed by Laks, featuring both male and female performers. The final dance was so well-received that the audience demanded an encore.

"Of the four years that I have attended the SASA Diwali Dinner, this year stands out above the rest," Perry Ratcliffe '03 said. "The service was improved, the decorations were lovely and the entertainment was excellent. This event is a great opportunity to experience a piece of another culture."

SASA members and organizers were also pleased with the turnout of this year's dinner.

"This year we put on fewer dances, reduced the number of seats and added an extra buffet line," Laks said. "The dinner was so successful because of our excellent executive staff and [SASA] members. We even had some SASA alumni helping out for the dinner. The decorating crew came as early as 8 a.m. to start the setup."

Play to depict self-reliant women

"Fefu and her Friends," a play about the struggles of women, opens today

By Melinda Kummer
Senior Writer

In a world often dedicated to portraying the struggle of man, eight women will bring the struggle of woman to the stage of Tustin Studio in a display of theatrical talent and artistry.

Directed by Professor of Theater Gary Grant, "Fefu and Her Friends" showcases a group of women that has gathered at Fefu's house to discuss its volunteer social work during the heart of the Great Depression.

"Their deep emotional experiences resonate with the anxieties that plague times like our own—fraught with uncertainty," Grant said. "Chronicling the dreams, aspirations and frustrations of these intelligent and self-reliant women, 'Fefu and Her Friends' also explores freedom of expression and the forces that cripple this freedom."

Playwright Maria Irene Fornes is a veteran of more than 40 years and has steadfastly refused to compromise her point of view to please popular audiences that may be unaccustomed to seeing women at the center of the dramatic situation.

"Some audience members will be challenged by this perspective, while others will welcome Fornes' candor and wisdom," Grant said.

The set is also unique and striking.

"Rather than a mere setting, the environment for the dramatic action envisions a wider notion of space, more like a landscape that includes the audience and the entire theater building," Grant said. "As you hear the sound spill from the different rooms, you may realize that the simultaneous events you experience correspond with the characters' own experiences. The audience becomes a part of the theatrical landscape."

"The unique staging of 'Fefu' provides a one-of-a-kind theater experience," cast member Rachel Slotcavage '04 said. "The audience actually moves throughout Fefu's house, allowing them to become more connected with the acting space and the actors' movements and motivations for a clearer understanding of the show."

"It's less a presentation by the actors," cast member Hollie Barattolo '04 said. "Rather, it is a situation in which the audience physically enters the lives of the characters and is allowed to watch."

"Fornes, trained as a painter, developed a kind of magical realism in her playwriting that narrates the story on several levels at once," Grant said. "Our interpretation of the play offers a highly imagistic theater to help the audience experience this magic, and set designer David Fillmore, lighting designers Ben Farrar and Jon Hoyle '04 and costume designers Paula Davis-Larson and Kim Salsbury have realized these levels in stunningly beautiful visuals."

"Fefu and Her Friends" promises to be both intellectually and aesthetically stimulating. The presentation of ideological feminism coupled with the intense relationship between the audience and the cast is certainly a fascinating prospect.

"Fefu and Her Friends" will run Nov. 1-4 at 8 p.m. Tickets are available at the Weis Center Box Office or at the Langone Center Box Office.

String quartet uses unique strategy

By Kang Tchou
Senior Writer

This past Friday the Marian Anderson String Quartet performed the music of Franz Joseph Haydn, Coleridge Taylor Perkinson and Felix Mendelssohn during its concert at the Weis Center. The concert started in a humorous tone with Haydn's String Quartet in E flat major, Op. 33, No. 2. This piece is nicknamed "The Joke" because the composer pokes fun at the amateur performer, the audience and the string quartet format in general. The audience enjoyed this lighthearted start to the evening with rounds of muted laughter.

This beginning was in character with the quartet and its unique style and identity. The Marian Anderson String Quartet holds the distinction of being the first black ensemble in history to win a classical music competition. In keeping with its commitment to provide education in classical music, its performance followed an informal format that made classical music more approachable for the general audience.

Before each piece, a member of the quartet gave a mini-lecture describing the peculiarities of the work. Members of the audience thought this format helped them to understand the music performed during the concert.

"I liked the way the members of the quartet explained their instruments and roles in the quartet, as well as each of the pieces they played," Elena Gregorio '05 said. "Many professional ensembles maintain a great distance from the audience, but this quartet really made an effort to communicate with the crowd."

To prepare the audience for its next piece, the string quartet turned into a vocal quartet to help the audience better appreciate the piece. Violist Diedra Lawrence led the quartet and gave a vocal performance of the original "Calvary."

Returning to its instruments, the quartet then performed Perkinson's Quartet No. 1, based on the "Calvary." The audience enjoyed this 20th century piece because it represented the direction of modern classical compositions.

"I have to say that my favorite one was Perkinson's Quartet No. 1 because his work is a fresh breakout from the other two pieces," Aniela Rahardja '06 said.

The final piece of the evening was Mendelssohn's Quartet in D major, Op. 44, No. 1. The Quartet in D major was an apt representation of the beauty and mastery of composition that is characteristic of Mendelssohn, who began to compose chamber music at the age of 10.. As with the other pieces, members of the quartet also explained the piece in detail, which made the music more approachable for members of the audience who were less familiar with classical music.

Members of the University community enjoyed the unique perspective of this black string quartet and appreciated the music selection.

"[The quartet was] certainly the first African-American ensemble I encountered," Rahardja said. "Hence, it was interesting and refreshing to see it ... it brings a different diversity of music choice than a European ensemble would bring."

Other members also expressed gratitude to the Weis Center for its effort in bringing more diverse performers onto campus.

"I like the fact that the Weis Center brings diverse ensembles to Bucknell which appeal to a wider group of students and other members of the community," Gregorio said.

Campus Theatre hosts film produced by University alumnus

By Julianna Pietak
Senior Writer

This past weekend, Lewisburg's Campus Theatre hosted a film significant not only for its acclaim, but for its link to the University community as well. "Bobby G. Can't Swim" is a street drama set in the Hell's Kitchen area of New York City. It artfully yet suspensefully deals with issues of fate and redemption. More significantly, it paints a vivid portrait of the harsh reality its characters face each day.

Bobby G. is a small-time drug dealer in New York who takes a chance with a larger client. When this deal goes awry, he is made to face the consequences. The sequence of events that follows leads to murder, repentance and, ultimately, Bobby G.'s death.

The realistic presentation of these events gives the film a gripping and edgy mood, setting it apart from typical film genres.

"I simply call 'Bobby G.' a street movie. I think that gives an idea of what it's about. Yeah, it's kind of film noir, it's kind of comedy, it's kind of a gangster flick, but in my mind street comedy can encompass all of those," Writer-Director John-Luke Montias said on the film's Web site (www.bobbygcantswim.com).

Perhaps it is these elements that have combined to win the film high praise within the independent film world. It won the Grand Jury Award at the 2000 Florida Film Festival and its director took the Best Director and New Direction awards at the Los Angeles Film Festival in 1999.

What possibly means more to the University is its connection to campus. Chris Matonti, the film's executive producer, is a University graduate. Matonti previously produced "Loose Women" and "Wedding Band." He also established Matonti Films in the Tribeca Film Center and has just recently launched the Gabriel Film Group.

Berlin quartet to instruct and perform

Pianist and 1997 Van Cliburn International Competition Gold Medalist Jon Nakamatsu will work with University piano students beginning at 11:30 a.m. today. The master class is open to the public and will be held in the Natalie Davis Rooke Recital Hall of the Sigfried Weis Music Building.

At 10 a.m. this morning the Berlin Philharmonic Wind Quintet will be performing an informal concert for over 900 people at an all-school assembly in the Milton Area High School. Tonight, Nakamatsu joins with the quintet for a Weis Center Series Performance featuring Mozart's Quintet for Piano and Winds in E flat major; Hindemith's Kleine Kammermusik; Barber's Summer Music; Ligeti's Six Bagatelles and Poulenc's Sextet for Piano and Winds. Information and tickets are available from the Campus Box Office or by calling extension 7-1000.

Men's water polo places 8th at ECAC championships

By Jon Riskin
Writer

Bucknell faced its fifth-straight ranked opponent on Sunday, Oct. 27, losing 8-5 to Division III 2nd-ranked Johns Hopkins and taking 8th place at the ECAC Championship. Faced with an unrelenting schedule and an ever increasing amount of injuries, the Bison have a record of 8-15 through late October, including a 3-5 conference record.

In two months of play, the Bison have battled it out in the pool with 10 ranked opponents, including West Coast powerhouse 6th-ranked Long Beach State and Eastern rival 9th-ranked Navy. They have played several ranked teams two or three times, improving with each game despite the look of their overall record. To complicate the schedule further, the team plays most of its games away, traveling to California and Maryland for tournaments.

Leading the team are senior captains Daniel Lonnerdal, Chris Saxton and Adam Yerkes. In addition to Lonnerdal and Saxton, the starting seven is rounded out with Jamie Saettele '04, Elliot Benoist '05, James Danforth '05 and Bradley Roslyn '06 and goalkeeper Ernest Martin '05.

With all the adversity we have faced with guys leaving the team and injuries, the captains have really kept us focused on what we need to do to compete."
—James Danforth '05

Danforth, the team leader in steals with 49, was positive about the efforts of the older players.

"With all the adversity we have faced with guys leaving the team and injuries, the captains have really kept us focused on what we need to do to compete," Danforth said.

Saettele leads the team in scoring with 40 goals in 20 games played, but recently sprained his foot severely and is uncertain whether or not he will play for the remainder of the season. Other key injuries include Martin's problematic thumb and utility man Benoist's broken finger. With three starters injured, the Bison still approach this weekend's Southern Division Championships with optimism.

When asked about the injuries, Head Coach John Zeigler commented on the situation's effect on the Bison's upcoming tournament.

"The injuries have provided the opportunity for other players to step into roles. I feel that this has happened defensively, but we hope that they can step into the scoring and overall offensive game plan more," Zeigler said.

One player who will be vital to the success of the Bison is Roslyn, who scored three goals this past weekend in the Hopkins game. With Saettele possibly unavailable for the championships in Princeton, the Bison will need Roslyn and other underclassmen to step up their play and fulfill the team's scoring needs. Lonnerdal, a more defensive player in his previous three seasons, has also risen to the challenge and is currently second in Bison scoring.

If the Blue and Orange can succeed this weekend, they will advance to the Eastern Division Championships held at Brown from Nov. 16-17. Bucknell is seeded 4th in the Southern Division Championships and will face 6th seeded Washington and Jefferson next when they clash on Nov. 1 at 7:10 p.m. They will also meet 9th-seeded Slippery Rock the same day, and Zeigler feels that victories in these two matchups would propel the Bison to the Eastern Championships and give them the opportunity to earn an NCAA birth.

Women's soccer falls 2-1 to American

By Dave Cohen
Senior Writer

The Bucknell women's soccer team dropped another league game on Oct. 26 to American by the score of 2-1. Things appeared promising for the Bison after they responded to a 1-0 deficit with an Annie Greenspun '05 goal at 10:15, which was aided by Emily Keber '03.

American found the net again in the first half during the 38th minute. Greenspun talked about the importance of the team's equalizing goal.

"We were glad to score quickly and tie the game back up after American scored the first goal," Greenspun said. "It was important for us not to let that first goal by American get us out of our game. Keber gave me a perfect ball and it was a great feeling for us to see the ball in the back of the net. Although we have been having a hard time scoring lately, I feel like everyone on our team has the ability to score. I was just glad to be in the right place at the right time."

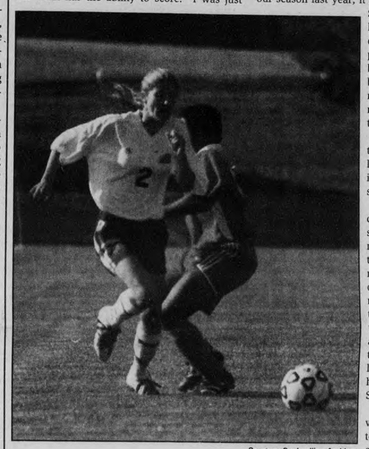
Keber believes that the only realistic goal left to play for this season is dignity.

"We have two games left, both of which we will just have to go out and play for pride and leave everything we have on the field," Keber said. "I think everyone is frustrated with how the season played out and upset because we do not get to go to the tournament."

Surprisingly, the second American goal was ultimately the winning one, as neither team scored in the second half. Laurie Purse '03 saved six shots on the day for the Orange and Blue.

Abbey Seaboyer '04 expressed the team's overall disappointment in being eliminated from Patriot League tournament contention.

"Personally, I was really upset about the game yesterday," Seaboyer said. "The seniors are some of my best friends and it's hard to imagine playing without them. Especially after our season last year, it's been a tough season," Seaboyer said. "The loss to American was definitely very disappointing, not only because it's hard to lose but because losing meant that we would not make it back to the tournament this year."



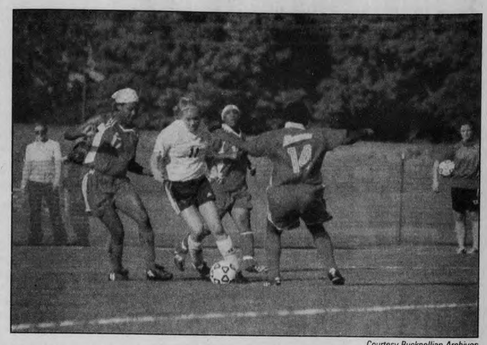
Courtesy Bucknellian Archives

Midfielder Margaret Emmitt '06 helped control the pace of the game against American.

She also admitted that it will not be easy to let the seniors go following the season's conclusion.

"The loss was especially hard for the seniors and was also really tough for most of the team because it meant that we would only have the opportunity to play together for two more games, and that we wouldn't be able to go out and make the statement in the league that we had hoped to make, Seaboyer said.

"I still believe that we have a really great team this year. We just couldn't get it done when it came down to it."



Courtesy Bucknellian Archives

Alison Cooper '05 has been an important part of the Bison offense throughout the season.

Although the team cannot reach the Patriot League tournament again this year, the Bison still have goals that they feel they must accomplish before the season's end. According to Keber, having a good time and remaining positive are key.

"I must play hard and have fun on the field in my last two games, walk away with the good memories of my four years and forget the bad," Keber said.

Seaboyer spoke more technically, conveying what the defense needs to accomplish from here on out.

"Defensively we need to try and play the ball wide and to feet," Seaboyer said. "The past several games we've been playing with a double stopper, which has actually made us more successful offensively. Other than that we need to do everything possible defensively to keep the lead when we score, because we haven't had as many goals as we would have liked this year."

On their way to the playoffs

After a 1-0 win over Mount Saint Mary's the Bison have increased their unbeaten home record to 5-0-1

By Tara Utchel
Senior Writer

The men's soccer team finished the past week of soccer with a loss and a win. On Sunday, Oct. 19, the Bison dropped a 1-0 decision over the Lehigh Mountain Hawks. A week later the team retaliated with a 1-0 win over visiting Mount Saint Mary's College, increasing their unbeaten record at home to 5-0-1. With the season nearing a close, the Orange and Blue continue to fight for a spot in the playoffs.

While most of the Bucknell students were resting over fall break, the men's soccer team was hard at work. The team traveled to Bethlehem, Pa., in search of a Patriot League win, but unfortunately came home with the opposite. The Orange and Blue fought hard against the No. 17 team in the nation. The Bison's defense held the Mountain Hawks off for 84 minutes. Unfortunately, luck was not on their side, when a shot was deflected over keeper first-year student Adam Edwards' head with 6 minutes remaining in the match.

The men did not let the devastating loss affect their play against visiting Mount Saint Mary's. The Bison scored early in the game off of a Jon Hemmert '05 corner kick. Hemmert drove the ball to the penalty kick area, which was partially cleared by the Mount's defense. Mike Lookingland '05 found the rebound and shot the ball on net. Chris Beekman '04 redirected the shot to score his third goal of the season and the game-winning goal.

Mount Saint Mary's put intense pressure on the Bison's defense with 14 shots to Bucknell's 13. Adams and his defensive stood strong and earned the shutout and the win for their team. The victory over Mount Saint Mary's brought the Bison to 11 wins in a regular season for only the fifth time in the program's history.

Bucknell, as of the Mount Saint Mary's game, holds a record of 11-3-1. The Orange and Blue have accomplished a few great feats over the course of the season. They won the Bulls Fall Classic back in early September. The team beat Pittsburgh University—the No. 18 team in the country. A few individuals have put pressure on

After a bye week, the Bucknell football team lost two straight Patriot League games to make its record 2-5 overall and 0-3 in the Patriot League. The Bison fell short in a late comeback attempt against Towson University, and lost 20-14 on Saturday, Oct. 19 in Towson, Md. The Bison then gave up a fourth quarter lead to Georgetown University, losing a heartbreaker 32-31 on Saturday, Oct. 26 in Washington, D.C.

The Bison jumped out to an early lead against Towson. Following an interception by defensive lineman Gary Carruthers '03, the Bison took over at the Towson 46-yard line with 4 minutes, 31 seconds remaining in the first quarter. Blamah Sarnor '06 followed up two big runs of his own, one for 15 yards and another for 21 yards, with a 1-yard touchdown run to give the Bison a 7-0 lead.

Both defenses dominated for most of the rest of the first half. With 55 seconds remaining in the first half the Tigers started a drive at the Bucknell 45-yard line. The five-play touchdown drive was capped off by a 29-yard touchdown pass to tie the score at 7 at halftime.

The momentum continued to turn against the Bison as the second half got underway. On the first play from scrimmage on Bucknell's second possession of the half, quarterback Todd Wenrich '03 was picked off, and the Tigers returned the ball 29 yards for the touchdown, and a 14-7 lead. On the first play of their next possession, the Tigers put the game further out of reach for the Bison, after a 44-yard touchdown pass made the score 20-7. Towson missed the extra point attempt following an unsportsmanlike conduct penalty after the touchdown.

The Bison made a valiant effort at a comeback in the fourth quarter. After Wenrich went down with a recurring shoulder injury, Cole Ciesnolevicz '05 led the Bison down the field and capped off the 14-play, 78-yard scoring drive with an 11-yard touchdown pass to Jim Horan '04. The Bison trailed 20-14 with 2:44 remaining in the game, but did not get the ball back in time to mount another comeback attempt, and the final score remained 20-14 Towson.

The only times that the Tigers were able to score was on the big plays. They did not score on a play of less than 29 yards.

"Basically, you can't allow a team to have the big plays," Head Coach Dave Kotulski said.

Bucknell went into the Georgetown game trying to keep the losing streak to two games, and looked like it was on the right track from the get-go. After receiving the opening kickoff, Ciesnolevicz connected with Albert Marquardt '04 on a 43-yard pass on the first play of the game. Three plays later, Samor ran the ball in from 5 yards out for the touchdown to give the Bison a 7-0 lead.

On the first play of the second quarter, Georgetown fumbled a Bucknell punt, and the Bison recovered the ball at the Hoya 24-yard line. The Bison could not capitalize on their good field position, and had to settle for a field goal, which kicker Chris Lundberg '03 knocked through the uprights from 29 yards out.

The Bison tacked on another touchdown on their next possession. Ciesnolevicz ran the ball in from 3 yards out to cap off a 10-play, 70-yard scoring drive, which made the score 17-0 in favor of the Bison. Bucknell took that lead into the locker room at halftime thanks to a blocked field goal by Anthony Lewis '05.

The Hoyas showed that they were not out of the game on their first possession of the second half. A 34-yard touchdown pass capping off a six-play, 64-yard scoring drive, shrunk the Bison lead to 17-7. On their next possession, the Hoyas fumbled the ball on their own 20-yard line, and the Bison recovered. Raphael Darrington '05 topped off the four-play Bucknell scoring drive with a 7-yard touchdown run to push the Bison lead to 24-7.

The Hoyas continued their comeback late in the third quarter on a 10-yard touchdown pass to make the score 24-14 Bison. On their next possession, the Hoyas marched 49 yards in six plays, and connected on a 20-yard touchdown pass to cut the Bison lead to 24-20.

Midway through the fourth quarter, the Bison took over the ball on the Georgetown 24-yard line following a failed fourth down conversion by the Hoyas. Following a Bison penalty, Ciesnolevicz connected with Marquardt from 30 yards out to extend the Bison lead to 31-20 with 8:07 remaining in the game.

On the ensuing drive, the Hoyas moved the ball 70 yards in seven plays, and capped off the scoring drive with a 17-yard touchdown pass. After failing the attempt at a two point conversion, the Bison led 31-26 with 5:41 to play.

After the Bison were unable to produce a solid drive, the Hoyas got the ball back with 3:06 on the clock. They drove the ball 81 yards in 15 plays, converting twice on fourth down plays, to win the game. The game winning touchdown pass from 19 yards out gave Georgetown a 32-31 win.

After a loss like the one to Georgetown, the Bison look ahead to their four remaining games with one goal left.

"We are playing for a winning season and pride now," Kotulski said. "It's just a matter of making some plays. We've got to find a way to win."

Even though Wenrich is still questionable for next week's game at Holy Cross, Ciesnolevicz has quickly become comfortable running the offense.

"It is hard not to feel comfortable out there. I am confident throwing to anyone on the field," Ciesnolevicz said.

After going on a five-match Patriot League winning streak, the Bucknell volleyball team finally was defeated by the Lehigh Mountain Hawks on Saturday, Oct. 26.

The Bison battled valiantly in the first game of the night but came up short, losing a tough 39-37 opening game. In game two the Orange and Blue retaliated and scored a 30-24 victory. Unfortunately, this was the only game the Bison were able to hold off the Mountain Hawks. Bucknell lost the remaining two games 30-24 and 30-21.

"I definitely felt we could have beaten them," Chelsea Anderson '06 said. "The first game was a very intense game. It isn't very often when you have games that go all the way up to 40. Both of our teams played with good ball control, which led to long rallies. We came out strong with the momentum in the second game and beat them, but in the third and fourth game we just broke down a little. We started to come back, but in the end it was too late."

Melanie Ghiz '03 led the offense with 18 kills, and Chelsea Robertson '05 and Jackie Leahy '05 each contributed 10 kills to the Bison effort. Defensively, the Bison were led by Brandi Trapasso '04 with 23 digs and Anderson with 21. Breean Trapasso '04 added 49 assists and 11 digs to the Bison effort.

The Bucknell volleyball team defeated Patriot League foe Lafayette on Friday, Oct. 25. The Bison beat the Leopards in three quick games by scores of 30-20, 30-18 and 30-24.

Brandi Trapasso led the team with 11 kills and 13 digs, while Jennifer Wrigley tallied a team high 12 kills. Breean Trapasso had 31 assists in the Bison victory.

On Friday, Oct. 18, the Bison started the weekend off with a 3-1 victory over Colgate. The Orange and Blue lost the first game of the night, 30-24, but came back to win the next three consecutive games, 30-24, 30-27 and 30-20, to clinch the Bison victory.

Many players reached personal milestones in their careers in this game. The Bison were led by Ghiz, who tallied a career match high with an impressive 24 kills; and Wrigley had 15 kills and a total of 12 digs, which included her 1,000-career dig. Wrigley is only the fourth Bison to accomplish the 1,000 dig mark in the Bucknell record book.

Even though their five-game winning streak is over, the Bison are still optimistic for the future.

"The game against Lehigh is in the past," Anderson said. "It's just a little obstacle to our season. We definitely are more excited about the present and future and have many goals for our upcoming games."

The Bison now hold a 12-10 overall record with a 6-3 Patriot League record. The Bison take on Navy on Friday, Nov. 1 at 7 p.m. in Annapolis, Md. Bucknell will then face first-place Patriot League rival American University on Saturday, Nov. 2.

X-Country prepares for P.L. champs

By Evan Honeyfield
Staff Writer

The cross country teams enter the championship season this Saturday as they head to West Point, N.Y., to take on several Patriot League foes.

The women's race looks to be a showdown with Army and American. The Bison fell to the Black Knights earlier this season by only two points. Since that time, both Army and Bucknell have appeared to improve from race to race.

"The season has increasingly become more impressive team-wise. We have grown from being such a young team to being a strong group, achieving both individual and team goals each week. I feel we have a definite chance to repeat as league champions," Theresa Dennis '03 said.

Dennis, the top returning runner in the league from last year's league championships, should be in the hunt for an individual title as well.

"I have to be smart with how I race and use my strong points. I feel the outcome is strongly in my favor based on how the season is unfolding," Dennis said.

The men should also be in the thick of things with American and Army. Although the Bison are looking for a win, they are also hoping to use the meet as a turning point.

"The season's been a little disappointing. After a great race at Army early on, we've struggled in terms of guys running consistently," Jesse Graytock '03 said. "And the loss of Greg [Costello '03] has obviously hurt as well. But I still believe that we have the personnel to be a great team."

Although the team race shakes down to two primary opponents, the Bison will mainly be battling the inconsistency that has hurt them so far.

> Our biggest competition at leagues will be ourselves. If we can run the way we know we can, we will win.
> —Lou Palma '03, co-captain

"Our biggest competition at leagues will be ourselves. If we can run the way we know we can, we will win. What the other teams do will not matter as long as we do what we have to do," Co-Captain Lou Palma '03 said.

In addition to hopefully leading the men to a team title, Bryan Johnston '03 should also be in the chase for an individual title. Johnston's main competition will come from American's Frank Malpigli, Army's Eric Motzenbecker and David Welch, Colgate's Luis Di Nuzzo and Holy Cross's Shane LeBeau, who is known for his dangerous racing style in championship races.

Like Palma, Head Coach Kevin Donner is not overly worried about the competition.

"Both teams just need to run their own races and run to their capabilities. We cannot worry about the other teams. Two team championships and two individual championships are not out of the question," Donner said.

Hopefully both teams will return this Saturday night with two cups and some individual hardware as well.

It's all about the monkey

There's been an outrage in the animal kingdom. Ever since last Sunday, organ-grinding monkeys everywhere have been up in arms, screeching out against the recent injustice that has unfolded during the latest installment of that quirky human ritual known as the "World Series."

And a staggering injustice it is. I mean, they spend day in and day out working their little prehensile tails off for a good meal, while this "rally monkey" character just bounces around on the scoreboard for a few minutes, and—bam!—he's the nation's fuzziest media darling.

One minute he's just your average capuchin; the next, his furry likeness is being affectionately waved about by a stadium full of fervent major-league baseball fans. He's on T-shirts, bumper stickers, signs and all sorts of other ballpark paraphernalia. Heck, even Curious George must be jealous.

The cuddly capuchin isn't alone in his renown on the diamond, though. He actually joins a menagerie of baseball's most memorable beasts. There are a few who have nuzzled, flapped and crawled their way into the legacy of America's pastime.

During most of the franchise's history, the Philadelphia/Kansas City Athletics boasted a resilient cartoon elephant as their mascot. But when the soon-to-be-notorious Charles Finley took over ownership of the hapless squad in 1960, and brought his taste for all things outlandish with him, he replaced it with an animal he could better relate with, introducing the fans at Municipal Stadium to "Charlie O.," a big, brown mule.

Charlie O. tagged along after the A's wherever they went. When the franchise moved to Oakland, so did the mule. Finley even let him hang out in the press box, the field and various other parts of the stadium generally restricted to human personnel.

Despite all his big-eared charm, Charlie O. was not quite as beloved among the players and managers as he was among the media and fans. While they were out taking care of business around the bases, the 800-pound ungulate was taking car of his own "business" wherever he felt it necessary. The fruits of his labor were, needless to say, a bit malodorous.

Long after Finley dragged around his aromatically-challenged buddy, another eccentric baseball owner charged onto the scene with a ubiquitous quadruped. Marge Schott, owner of the Cincinnati Reds from 1985-1999, did everything her own way. That included demanding the constant presence of her St. Bernard, Schottzie.

Schottzie, who weighed more than the team's second baseman, was given free reign of the field. Schott made sure that her canine compadre's presence was appreciated—or at last acknowledged—by everyone. She rubbed the dog's fur on manager Lou Pinella's jersey for good luck, and coerced Eric Davis into wearing a floppy-eared dog hat during a press conference. Schottzie even made an appearance on "David Letterman."

The rally monkey has grabbed himself a place in history.

When Schottzie passed away in 1991, a crestfallen Schott introduced the Reds to Schottzie 02, who took over as the stadium's new over-pampered good luck charm. In 1998, Schott insisted that Mark McGwire, then in the midst of chasing down Roger Maris' home run record, pet Schottzie 02 for good luck, and McGwire, always a gentlemen, obliged. If he didn't need luck before that, he certainly would afterwards—he was allergic to dogs.

Not all of baseball's noteworthy critters have been quite as prominent or showy as Charlie O. and Schottzie. Sometimes their influence is only recognized behind the scenes. Such was the case for a very timely rat at Fenway Park in 1975.

We all remember watching the grainy, spine-tingling footage of Cartlon Fisk emphatically persuading his towering long-ball to stay fair during game 6 of the World Series. But who should we thank for that fantastic footage?

As it happens, those few seconds of documentary excellence came to us courtesy of an unnamed rat, or at least that's how it goes according to legend. NBC director Harry Coyle put a camera inside the left-field wall for the game, and told cameraman Lou Gerard to keep the frame on the ball.

Gerard lost his focus, though, when a massive rat meandered across the floor beside him. With his eyes on the rat and not on the ball, he left the camera pointed aimlessly towards the batter. The footage that resulted won Coyle a director's Emmy and was voted by TV Guide as the best sports video of the 20th century.

Meanwhile the humble little varmint scurried back to the dark recesses of old Fenway, graciously letting his human counterparts stride away with all the glory. It's doubtful he'll ever appear on a T-shirt or a bumper sticker, but the presence of NBC's rat will resonate with every showing of Fisk's unforgettable antics.

Occasionally, animals have inadvertently fallen into the limelight through their own misfortune. In 1983, a seagull caused a huge flap by simply being in the wrong place at the wrong time. Future Hall-of-Famer Dave Winfield was finishing his warm-up tosses in Toronto when the gull perched itself on a nearby fence. Winfield chucked the ball in the bird's general direction, hoping to shoo it away, but instead clocked the avian bystander right in the head.

The misdirected throw was curtains for the little gull, and this ornithological mishap led to Winfield's arrest on charges of animal cruelty.

He was eventually acquitted, but received a smattering of boos from fans all over the league for years to come.

This is just a sampling of baseball's zoological history—there are countless critters who have left their mark, literally and figuratively, on our pastime, some of whom may go forever unrecognized.

So how will the rally monkey stack up once the fanfare has disbanded? Surely he has etched himself a special place in the hearts of the baseball faithful already, but it remains to be seen if he'll continue on his meteoric rise to immortality.

Perhaps he'll remain as the Angels' spunky cheerleader. Perhaps he'll keep his options open and search for an even more prestigious position in the baseball world. Who knows where he could lend his illimitable talents next.

Rumor has it we could use a new commissioner.

Kids at play

As Darin Erstad waved off Tim Salmon to make the last out of game 7 of the Fall Classic, you could see them in the dugout, holding each other, one showing his age, the other weeping openly. It wasn't Jackie Autry crying for her deceased husband and it wasn't Michael Eisner in the retro-Mickey shirt clinging with all of his strength to John Travolta. It wasn't Kenny Lofton and it wasn't Barry Bonds who sat there wondering if he'd ever see this again.

No, it was Giants manager Dusty Baker finally showing the oppressive weight of a baseball season stretched as far as it could conceivably go, with his 3-year-old son, Darren, bawling unremittingly over his shoulder. This may seem like a morbid depiction of the "Greatest Game on Earth's" greatest single game, but believe me, it gets worse.

In a flurry of stupidity that hovers over him like a rain cloud over Wile E. Coyote, Bud Selig, Fuhrer of baseball, came out after the World Series and issued a fatwa about children in the dugout. That's right, children in the dugout.

According to ESPN.com, a baseball official said, "This has become a travesty. We look ridiculous and unprofessional." I see that major-league baseball officials subscribe to the Saint Peter school of child management. I prefer to take a more Jesu-centric stance and say, "Let the children come unto me."

What is this bourgeois culture these people want to graft onto America's proletariat pastime? First, it was their hairstyles that felled Jason Giambi's auburn tresses as Steinbrenner demanded his team look clean-cut. Then they went after the uniforms; no more baggy shirts or ripped pants or dirty hats. Sorry guys, you'll have to send the batboys out to do laundry during the seventh inning stretch or you won't be allowed to take the field. Now they're attacking kids in the dugout.

The main contention is that Darren Baker almost got run over at the plate in game 5 of the series after he went to go pick up a bat and J. T. Snow had to pull him aside so he wouldn't get hurt. So now we're worried about children running out onto the field who may get hurt? Why don't we focus on keeping the fans with knives in their seats rather than letting them attack a first base coach à la Tom Gamboa before we start worrying about a batboy being too close for comfort to the action.

	Barry Bonds	Troy Glaus
Average	.471	.385
Homers	4	3
RBI	6	8
Runs	8	7
Slugging	1.294 (record)	.846
Walks	13 (record)	4
OBP	.700 (record)	.467

Is it really that big of a deal that children are in the dugout? Why does baseball feel the need to become a corporate bouillabaisse of '50s haircuts and shirt and tie slides? We're not talking about setting up a day care and a ball pit, we're talking about letting the game inspire youths to succeed instead of boosting a car.

I say baseball needs to look over its shoulder or check its pulse for a second. Let's start thinking about more kids in the dugout, not fewer. Give something back to the fans instead of gouging us for all we're worth when all we want is some extra sauerkraut.

And while we're on the topic of Selig screwups, let's discuss the World Series MVP decision. As much as I despise Barry Bonds with the fiery hot passion of a million suns, he deserved it. His team did not win, but there are precious few people who have ever reached the World Series and performed as he did. Look at the chart, Bonds broke three World Series records. What did Troy Glaus do? He did the same as any other player in the Angels lineup.

The Most Valuable Player award is just that, the man who a team can't play without. Bonds is that man. Glaus is not. Just because the Giants got stomped like a cigarette butt when Sister Catherine walks through study hall doesn't mean that he didn't put up one of the single best World Series performances in history.

And what about the managerial hunt that took place during the series. Selig wants to fine the Mets for being too vocal about the whole Lou Piniella-Art Howe debacle. Now I understand the argument that all should be quiet on the Eastern front during the California World Series, but Selig has his priorities askew. He's upset with Seattle and Tampa Bay, but he's only going to fine the Mets? That doesn't make sense.

Where's the accountability there? If you want to fine the Mets, that's fine. Just be fair and fine the other two teams. Talk about looking unprofessional. How about we get the 4-year-old children out of baseball's front office.

Changing seasons

First snow has fallen on the University campus and with this transformation to the upcoming winter, the landscape of sports society has changed too. Out are baseball and MLS soccer. IN are hockey and basketball. By the way, did anyone see the giant flashes of light from the Mods Tuesday night when we lost power? It was like fireworks without the sound! Hopefully my article can emanate those fireworks as we conclude the baseball season and introduce the basketball season!

The Anaheim Angels ended their 41 years frustration of not winning the big one by defeating the San Francisco Giants to win the World Series in seven games. The rally monkey won again. This series epitomized teamwork. While the Giants had Bonds, who lived up to his claim of baseball slugger smacking four homers in the Series, batting .471 and had an on-base percentage of .700, the Angels had the rally monkey.

Michael Jordan returns to the NBA with the Wizards again this season.

An indistinguishable face, the rally monkey's identity changed with the need or situation presented. I ask Bonds to bow to the monkey and suggest that instead of fighting with Jeff Kent on where in the order he should bat, calling a truce with his teammates might assist his quest for a championship ring.

We saw the emergence of a couple studs for fantasy baseball owners for years to come. Twenty-year-old, (yes, he could be in your arts and sciences class) Francisco Rodriguez exploded onto the baseball scene with his fearless style of going after each hitter from pitch one.

Rodriguez, who wasn't even on the Angels roster at the beginning of the season, brought youthful vigor to a team that already gets carded at local bars. Troy Glaus took home MVP honors, but the rally monkey got my vote. (Yes, the rally monkey will be appearing on "Jay Leno!")

"We're not a team that sits back and waits for the three-run home run," Glaus said. "We try to create situations to put pressure on the defense and pressure them into making mistakes—doing things like that, keying on the situational hitting."

Glaus, who looks like a candidate for the next "Superman" movie, blasted multiple homers and clutch hits, most notable his game 6 two-run double in the eighth inning that led to a 6-5 Angels victory.

The Angels-Giants series will most be remembered as being the first time two wild card teams played in the World Series. Of course, ever since the New England Patriots' improbable Super Bowl Championship, it's been clear that a complete team can endure and succeed over star individuals.

Switching gears onto the hard court, the 2002-2003 NBA season began on Tuesday and promises to be another exciting season! We have the "usual suspects" of the L.A. Lakers, Sacramento Kings and San Antonio Spurs bringing back strong teams that will contend yet again. We saw the emergence of the high flying Dallas Mavericks and scrappy N.J. Nets rise to "giant" status. For the first time, instant replay will be joining the referees to assist on crucial game calls.

No one is quite sure how this will be used or abused, but a system close to football's coaches challenge system is sure to evolve. The zone defense is also in its infancy, but unlike college ball where its use is widespread, pro ball insists on indulging as often as we see Christina Aguilera wearing something resembling clothing.

Let's begin with the young guns from the South, the Dallas Mavericks. After what seemed to be a decade of lottery picks, the Mavs have finally found a winning combination. Out are the old trio of Jason Kidd, Jamal Mashburn and Jimmy Jackson, replaced by a more cohesive core group of Dirk Nowitzki, Steve Nash and Michael Finley. Led by ferocious coach Don Nelson and funded by broadcast.com! Founder and Dairy Queen-loving owner Marc Cuban the Mavs are the hottest combination since peanut butter and jelly! Finishing second last season in the Midwest Conference and being ousted by the Kings in the Western Conference Semifinals, the Mavs look to improve on a suspect defense (ranked 28th) and take the next step towards an NBA championship trophy.

Next we have my hometown boys from Jersey. The N.J. Nets with triple double threat Jason Kidd look to dominate the Eastern Conference for the second straight season. With new additions Dikembe Motumbo, Rodney Rogers and Chris Childs, they are set to do just that. Swingman Richard Jefferson will replace Keith Van Horn nicely, fitting alongside bad boy Kenyon Martinto complete a sizable frontcourt.

Around the league ... Michael Jordan is back once again, Shaq's big toe is improving and I am over my cold! Grant Hill is trying for his third time to return from a lingering knee injury. If healthy, he could put the Magic over the edge with Tracy McGrady and company. The Lakers are set with Kobe and Shaq, but this time they will have to battle clutch Mike Bibby and former Michigan Wolverine Chris Webber. Who can forget Rick Fox and Doug Christie's scuffle a couple days back that intensified this Western Conference rivalry? If Patch Adams were here he'd ask, "What's your love strategy, gentlemen?"

The Celtics with Paul Pierce and Antoine Walker are poised to bring it to the Nets. Watch out for the rookies this year. Duke star Jayson Williams will be dribble the ball for the Bulls, and Drew Gooden looks to continue his winning ways from Kansas. Give a watch to some of the game this weekend and, who knows, maybe I will see you in Davis Gym!

Finally, a word to the wise: beware of 15-year-old girls that invite you to their place of work. The Decker Effect looms! Take care everyone!

Construction is problematic for some Parts of the new Athletic Recreation Center became accessible shortly before fall break, but reactions to the facilities among students and staff have been varied.

By Ainsley Maloney
Staff Writer

Just as any new facility brings about new opportunities, with them will come a fair amount of new problems. Many people have seen just that with the recent opening of the new Recreation and Athletic Center, and reactions to the facility have been mixed.

Since its official opening shortly before fall break, a few glitches have presented roadblocks that everyone has been forced to work around. During a recent swimming and diving practice, the pool's filters malfunctioned, causing the water to change from blue to brown.

This left the coaches with no other choice but to pull their athletes from the water.

Rather than becoming frustrated, they found other ways to get around the situation. They decided to hold team goal meetings and run their athletes through exercises outside of the pool instead — a response that is critical to making a positive adjustment to the new facility.

"Being adaptive saves heartache," Assistant Diving Coach Errol Carter said. "It doesn't make sense to waste time and energy complaining about stuff you have no control over. You have to work with what you've got; adapting makes us stronger."

Similar roadblocks have occurred outside of the pool as well. With a majority of the free weights still located in the Fieldhouse until the new weight room is finished, completing a workout requires relocating back to the old building. While this may be frustrating for some, Strength and Conditioning Coordinator Jerry Shrek doesn't feel it has turned many away from the new facility.

"We're still going through some growing pains," he said. "There are still a lot of changes to be made, but the feedback from the student body has been positive."

Shrek's expectations for the new center by the time it is complete remain high.

"In January, the free weight room will be one of the top facilities in the Patriot League," he said. While these situations are only temporary setbacks, a bigger concern is adjusting to the new surroundings and learning how to work the new equipment. Some may be turned away from the environment's "social scene."

"There's nowhere to hide! Here, everyone can see you struggling to lift the 50-pound weights," Associate Professor of Psychology John Ptacek said.

On the other hand, students have found little to complain about.

"The new cardio area is so amazing," Hannah Kaczka '06 said. "It's such an improvement and much more advanced. It actually makes me want to work out more because the environment is so much more enjoyable."

Similar responses have come from student-athletes as well. The new facility has seemed to improve overall attitudes and spirits since athletes are now practicing at more convenient times while being in a much better atmosphere. Athletes are also hoping that the new facility will attract more hype, more attention and, therefore, more support.

"All of the teams really deserve an up-to-date facility for how hard we work, and I'm hoping it will attract a bigger audience at our meets," Sarah Petcavage '04, a member of the swimming and diving teams, said.

On the other hand, the controversy seems to lie in just that. Some professors are concerned that the new center puts too much focus on athletics while taking away from academics.

"I think it's hard to deny that it sends a visible signal of the universities priorities," Professor of East Asian Studies Erik Lofgren said.

Associate Professor of Classics Janet Jones agrees, adding that her concern is not with athletics in general, but with the focus being set too much on certain sports and not enough on others. She is upset that a lacrosse field was lost due to the construction of the center.

"I'd like to see the resources spread more broadly and across all the different teams rather than just one or two sports," Jones said.

Not all professors agree. Ptacek feels that the facility provides a medium between athletics and academics, while, in a way, uniting them.

"Athletics have as much of an opportunity to educate as traditional academics," Ptacek said. "[They] have the potential to teach a lot of things such as confronting challenges, working together with people and finding a certain balance in your life. Coaches are just another form of educator and they may even have a greater impact than we can."

Since everyone responds to change differently, it is natural for reactions and opinions to be mixed. By the end of the year, the center will no longer be so unfamiliar and most of the glitches will be worked out. Perhaps then some opinions will change; for some people, that will probably not be the case. Either way, it is important for everyone to keep in mind that the center is still considered to be a work in progress.

Dan Fellon—The Bucknellian

The new center offers a state-of-the-art environment for students to work out. While some find the new facility appealing, others think the University places too much emphasis on athletics.

the most assists and shutout records in a single season.

Looking at the record, the 2002 season proves to be one of the best in men's soccer history. The record conceals the fact that the Bison are fighting to keep post-season play in their future. All three of Bucknell's losses have been to Patriot League foes: Holy Cross, No. 13 American and No. 17 Lehigh.

With the tougher Patriot League games out of the way, Bucknell is striving to win the remaining three league games against Lafayette, Navy and Army. With these three wins, the Bison will finish in the top four and will advance to the playoffs.

The Orange and Blue meet Lafayette on Wednesday, Oct. 30 in Easton, Pa. Kickoff is 7 p.m. and will be broadcast live on the Bison Sports network. On Sunday, Nov. 3, Navy will travel to Lewisburg for a 2 p.m. match.

Field hockey improves to 3-2 in P.L.

The 2-1 victory was over Fairfield and was the second straight win for the Bison.

BY ASHLEY HALL
Staff Writer

The Bucknell field hockey team, lead by first-year student Kelly O'Brien's two goals, made its last home game of the season a successful one on Saturday, Oct. 26. The 2-1 victory was over Patriot League foe Fairfield and was the second straight win for the Bison in the league, improving their league record to 3-2.

The first goal was only 2 minutes, 23 seconds into the game when O'Brien received a pass from Cara Turner '05 and capitalized on it. Fairfield evened the score off a penalty corner, with only 5:40 to play in the first half. This goal was scored by Dani Brown with an assist by Rebecca Odenwaelder.

In the second half of the game, O'Brien scored her second goal to break the tie with 5:43 left to play. This was scored off a pass from Amy Marvel '03 during the last home game of her field hockey career here at Bucknell.

"Our win over Fairfield was great. It was an important game in the Patriot League for us and we rose to meet the challenge," Kelly Burrows '03 said. Goalkeeper Sonja Wettergreen '03 recorded nine stops, while Fairfield goalie Lauren Thomas had 14.

On Oct. 22, the team competed in Loudonville, N.Y. against Siena to pull off a 2-0 win in this non-league match.

The two goals were scored just a minute apart in the first stanza. Kirsten Nilsen '06 shoveled a pass off to Carli Cataldo '06 at the 22:13 mark for the first goal, giving the Bison a 1-0 lead. Marvel scored off a penalty corner at 23:12. This was Marvel's fourth goal for the season.

Bucknell outshot Siena 11-7 in the match. Liz Jordan '06 started this game and recorded three saves for the Bison while Wettergreen stopped one in the second half.

On Sunday, Oct. 20 the field hockey team took time away from fall break to traveled to to battle the Burlington, Vt., Catamounts and come away with a 2-1 loss.

Vermont's Christine Layden scored an unassisted goal off a penalty corner at the 20:52 mark in the first half.

Just 18 minutes into the second half of play, Meiko Boynton '05 tipped one in off a Cara Turner '05 assist. This was Boynton's seventh goal of the season.

Kristen MacDonald scored the final goal of the game off a penalty, sealing the Catamounts' win. Wettergreen made seven saves for Bucknell, while Holly Colberg had two for Vermont. This was the Catamounts' spark after a four-game losing streak putting them up to 5-11. Bucknell had four shots while Vermont recorded ten.

Bucknell's record now improves to 7-9 overall and 3-2 in league play. The next match for the Bison is their last conference game.

It is at American University on Saturday, Nov. 2 at 1 p.m. This is an important game to try to clinch a playoff spot with a victory at American.

Greeks actively support Million Penny Project

By Caitlin McKee
Staff Writer

The third annual Million Penny Project needs your spare change to raise $10,000. The project will benefit the United Way's Union County Campaign. The University's fraternities and sororities have joined forces to run the project.

"The Inter Fraternity Council, the governing body of the frats, and the Panhellenic, the governing body of the sororities, works together to run the project. It is our way to show the campus our unity," Project Coordinator Janet Serafin '04 said.

The fraternities and sororities are supporting the United Way's Union County Campaign for many reasons.

"We decided to donate the money to the United Way's Campaign because the campaign will use the money to help places in Lewisburg that are in need. This way, the Greeks can help the University and Lewisburg to better their community. We hope to bring the entire school and community together through the common goal of raising money for this cause," Project Coordinator Evan Gropper '04 said.

The Greeks also hope supporting the United Way will strengthen their relationship with the University's administration.

"The United Way was brought to our attention by Dean Conrad and President Rogers, who are both affiliated with the organization. We hope following their suggestion and supporting an organization that the administration supports will increase the lines of communication between the administration and the Greeks. We also hope to show the administration our positive side by working together with them on this project," Gropper said.

Serafin and Gropper are working closely on the project to guarantee its success.

"In the past, the project has not done that well. This year, we are making sure the fraternities and sororities really work together on the project. We think more efficient cooperation between the fraternities and sororities will help make the project succeed," Gropper said.

To raise the $10,000, the Greeks are holding several fundraisers. Donation cans are located all over the campus and Lewisburg. The Harvest Games, held last Saturday, benefitted the project. The games attracted a variety of participating groups that competed in such games as pumpkin catapulting.

"We were really pleased that such a wide range of groups from campus participated in the games. We were very pleased with the results," Gropper said.

Each fraternity and sorority is also raising $500 for the project through its own fundraisers.

"Kappa Kappa Gamma ran a car wash to support the project. Phi Gamma Delta (Fiji) had a registered non-alcoholic party and charged a $2 admission that will go to the project," Gropper said.

Gropper and Serafin are confident they will hit the $10,000 mark.

"The project is definitely going well. I have absolutely no doubt we will raise above and beyond our goal of $10,000," Serafin said.

Reverse abroad: Saudi Arabia to Lewisburg, Pa.

By Hsiang-Lin Yang
Contributing Writer

Many people have heard of the popular Greek proverb, "know thyself." How many have actually accomplished this? Especially in a time that trembles of a potential World War III, identity is becoming ever more important. I am a Taiwanese citizen born and raised in Saudi Arabia. Does that really explain who I am? I walk among my fellow Saudis on the beach every day, yet I still speak Mandarin and eat my meals with chopsticks. I've read Arab newspapers my whole life, yet my political views are very different from my Saudi neighbors. In essence, simply tracing your cultural background will not lead to self-discovery.

As silly as it sounds, you first have to actually realize the importance of self-identity. Before I came to the United States three years ago, I never realized the uniqueness of being born and raised in a foreign country. Every day I would mingle with other Taiwanese kids who lived nearby. Women completely covered in black satin were a more common sight than McDonald's. It was actually an anomaly for me to see a Caucasian strolling down the beach. I took all of these cultural observations for granted and went on with my everyday life.

When I first arrived at St. Andrew's School, my U.S. boarding high school, I was awe-struck. It was a new, yet somehow familiar, environment. I was still a foreigner, but women wore shorts and there was grass everywhere.

I began asking myself many questions: Who am I? Am I Saudi Arabian? Or am I Taiwanese? What are my passions? Why do I react a certain way when I encounter different situations? I asked myself all types of personal questions.

As the first semester passed, I experienced many harsh times that exposed my insecurity. When some people made fun of my cultural upbringing, I didn't know what to say or just didn't have the guts to make a comeback. When I was in Saudi, my habits and mannerisms were accepted and I felt at home. But now here in the United States, everyone seemed to view me both figuratively and literally as an alien. The anger and humiliation just kept building like a disease inside me. When it became too much to bear, I exploded and began looking at everything and everyone around me with utmost cynicism. Thankfully, my friends and my Chinese teacher were there to help me. They noticed my depression and encouraged me to think about what could have caused me to become so hostile.

I began asking myself many questions: Who am I? Am I Saudi Arabian? Or am I Taiwanese? What are my passions? Why do I react a certain way when I encounter different situations? I asked myself all types of personal questions. Gradually, I became more confident of myself and who I was. Now if you ask me these same questions, I can instantly reply, "I am Taiwanese. My passions are exercise, martial arts, breakdancing and computer and video games."

I used to get offended when people joked around with me because I thought they were being rude, but I have learned that in the United States, sarcasm is more prevalent than even McDonald's.

Because I have come to understand myself better, I can explain my feelings or behavior towards certain cultural differences. One U.S. custom that still surprises me is the equality in parent-child relationship. Throughout my childhood, I had been taught to respect my elders, especially my parents. Now even after three years in the United States, I am still surprised at how my fellow classmates talk to their parents as though they were talking to their friends.

During the University's last Parents Weekend, I got the wonderful opportunity to dine with friends and their parents from my hall. Because the dinners were very fancy, I had ample time to talk with the parents and make observations. I noticed that my friends constantly joked around with their parents in a mini-verbal battle. There were several moments in their conversations in which I would have been scolded had I said that to my parents. Though my relationship with my parents is far from totalitarian, my parents have made it distinctly clear to me that there are times when joking or rebuttals are not appropriate. in those instances, I must show them the respect that the Chinese tradition requires.

When I am home with my parents, I follow the rules of Chinese culture. When I am here in the States, I can be more easygoing and outspoken. And when I am among my Saudi natives, I have to remember to accept drinks only with my right hand and to eat rice by curling it into a ball with my hands.

Similarly, though I have lived in Saudi my whole life, the Arab parent-child relationship also intrigues me. Under Saudi tradition, the children must treat their father with the greatest respect since he is considered the head of the family.

Furthermore, male children in Arab families receive better education than their female counterparts. Women have extremely few job opportunities in Saudi. The teen-age males go on to bear the family name while the females are married at a very young age into another family. This tradition still surprises me, though I've grown up with it.

In my journey to self-discovery, I have not only gained more self-confidence, but I have also learned to adjust to three different cultures. When I am home with my parents, I follow the rules of Chinese culture. When I am here in the States, I can be more easygoing and outspoken. And when I am among my Saudi natives, I have to remember to accept drinks only with my right hand and to eat rice by curling it into a ball with my hands. All of this is only from my experiences. Everyone has his or her own paths and choices to make. In the end, I know each and every one of you will, like me, find out that life is more livable when you can see your true self.

Cell phone etiquette 101

Although convenient for some people, cell phones can be both an annoyance and a distraction for others

By Alyson Walker
Features Editor

As the professor lectures on Beethoven, the familiar strains of the composer's Fifth Symphony resonate through the room. No, it's not an orchestral arrangement. The motif is being beeped out by a cellular phone, which a student quickly turns off, only after checking the caller ID.

Sound familiar? Around the nation, there are similar situations occurring. Cell phones are going off in churches, musical performances, libraries and even on college tours.

"I had a woman on my tour who was a 'cell phone screamer.' She was talking so loudly on the phone that she distracted the tour. Finally, she got off and asked me to repeat what she missed," Tour Guide Student Coordinator Julie Schmidt '05 said.

—Julie Schmidt '05

Although most people consider cell phones a convenience, many Web sites have emerged that include proper etiquette, listing when and how to take phone calls. Certain rules seem simple, such as turning off phones during public events like concerts and movies, but there are still people who have yet to get a clue. Not only can cell phone misconduct be rude, but it can also have serious repercussions.

"Choosing a college is a monumental decision that will affect the rest of your life. I often receive feedback from prospective or current students regarding why they fell in love with the University," Schmidt said. "I've found that it is more times than not the small details on the tour that attracted them to pursue our institution. When a cell phone call distracts prospective families, the impression of the entire tour can become distorted."

Establishments in parts of Europe are reserving areas to be "mobile-free," denoted by the red circle and slash over a phone, according to www.computersathome.com. Cell phone users, like smokers, have their own sections in restaurants and train compartments. This allows a beep-free peace and quiet for the non-cell phone users.

In Israel, a tape of actor Joseph Yadin requests that all audience members of theatrical and symphonic events to turn off all phones.

New York City Councilman Phil Reed proposed legislation that would fine people $50 for having cell phones go off during performances, according to CNN.com.

"Particularly in movie theaters and other places, unfortunately, people are using the cell phones. Sometimes they'll call in the middle to tell people what the action on the screen is," Reed said. "People spend good money. They just want to sit back and relax, and you've got some lout in front of you that just feels like he wants to perform."

Certain U.S. states have also passed or are in the process of passing legislation regarding cell phone use while driving. In New York, hand-held phones can only be used in case of emergency. Hands-free phones are still allowed. Violation of this law leads to a $100 fine.

While perusing the "Ten Commandments" of cell phone usage, remember that although most of them are not illegal (the exception being rule five in certain states), these guidelines could determine whether you're cell phone savvy or stupid.

The Cell Phone Ten Commandments

*Thou shalt not subject defenseless onlookers to cell phone conversations. When people cannot escape the banality of your conversation—on a plane, on a train, on a bus, in a cab, or at the dinner table—spare them.

*Thou shalt not set thy ringer to play "La Cucaracha" every time thy phone rings. Or Beethoven's Fifth, or the Bee Gees, or any other annoying melody. Is it not enough that phones go off every other second?

*Thou shalt turn thy cell phone off during public performances. I'm not even sure this one needs saying, but given the repeated violations of this heretofore unwritten law, I felt compelled to include it.

*Thou shalt not wear more than two wireless devices on thy belt. This hasn't become a big problem yet. But with plenty of technojockeys sporting pagers and phones, Batman-esque utility belts are sure to follow. Let's nip this one in the bud.

*Thou shalt not dial while driving. In all seriousness, this madness has to stop. There are enough people in the world who have problems mastering vehicles and phones individually.

And furthermore ...

*Thou shalt not wear thy earpiece in the presence of thy friends. This is not unlike being on the phone and carrying on another conversation with someone who is physically in your presence. No one knows if you're here or there.

*Thou shalt not speak louder on thy cell phone than thou would on any other phone. These things have incredibly sensitive microphones, and it's gotten to the point where I can tell if someone is calling me from a cell because of the way they are talking, not how it sounds. If your signal cuts out, speaking louder won't help, unless the person is actually within earshot.

*Thou shalt not grow too attached to thy cell phone. For obvious reasons, a dependency on constant communication is not healthy. At work, go nuts. At home, give it a rest.

*Thou shalt not attempt to impress with thy cell phone. Not only is using a cell phone no longer impressive in any way (unless it's one of those really cool new phones with the space-age design), when it is used for that reason, said user can be immediately identified as a neophyte and a poseur.

*Thou shalt not slam thy cell phone down on a restaurant table just in case it rings. This is not the Old West, and you are not a gunslinger sitting down to a game of poker in the saloon. Could you please be a little less conspicuous? If it rings, you'll hear it just as well if it's in your coat pocket or clipped on your belt.

University professor Ulmer named chair of Judaic studies

By Rachel Gold
Senior Writer

With a desire to provide a more diverse curricular profile, the University hired Assistant Professor of Religion Rivka Ulmer as the MacArthur Chair of Jewish Studies.

Associate Professor and Chair of the Religion Department Carol White said that the need for a faculty position in Jewish studies also stemmed from a desire to expand offerings within the religion department.

"The field of Jewish studies, as it has developed in the United States in the last 30 years, encompasses a broad collection of disciplinary approaches including literature, philosophy, sociology, anthropology, textual and foreign language study and international relations," White said. "The field of Jewish Studies covers broad regions of the globe and encompasses important questions about racial, ethnic, political and religious identities."

Ulmer is well-qualified for her position. Her research includes rabbinic literature in its sociological and historical context, Hebrew manuscripts, Jewish Legal history (halakah), comparative religion, Jewish magic, Jews in Germany, Jews in Egypt and the history, theology and philosophy of Judaism from the classical period to modernity. She is the author of 10 books and numerous articles.

Ulmer has extensive experience teaching at institutions of higher learning. She has taught at Brown University, Harvard, Hebrew Union College-Jewish Institute of Religion and the University of Copenhagen, and was most recently at the University of Pennsylvania.

The Religion department feels honored to have Ulmer.

"Professor Ulmer is a distinguished scholar of international fame," White said. "The department sought someone who would strongly and positively represent Bucknell University to the scholarly, religious and national communities as a reflection of its dedication to diversity in both scholarly course offerings and student population. We have found such a person in Professor Ulmer."

Ulmer plans on using her position as the MacArthur Chair, a position partially funded by a grant from the John D. and Catherine T. MacArthur foundation, to increase campus knowledge and awareness about Judaism.

There are only eight students in her class, Matriarchs, Daughters and Wives: Women in Jewish Literature, Law and History.

"The students seem very interested in the topics we discuss. Unfortunately, there are only women in the class. I was hoping there would be some males, but the dynamic of the class is wonderful," Ulmer said. "All the students keep journals and since it is a small class, everyone feels comfortable enough to share personal accounts."

Marnina Cherkin '05 is taking Ulmer's course and finds it an interesting part of her education.

"I enjoy the class because it enriches my knowledge of my own religion. We study feminist perspectives on Jewish texts because the majority of them, if not all texts from antiquity were written and reviewed by men," Cherkin said. "Looking at these texts, like the Torah and the Misnah, allows us to learn about women and their roles in society."

Ulmer feels that it is important for students to learn about the Bible and New Testament when studying Judaism. She uses a Bible puzzle to allow students the opportunity for hands-on activities that make learning about the Bible more entertaining. Ulmer believes that the study of canonization is also important.

"Judaism has a lot to offer. It is important for students to learn about more than just the Bible and the Holocaust, although those are two very important topics, but to also view Judaism as a civilization and learn about various aspects of the culture," Ulmer said.

White agrees with Ulmer that it is important for students to learn about all cultures.

"Courses in Jewish Studies not only complement those currently offered in the religion department, but enrich the entire curriculum of the College of Arts and Sciences, particularly in the humanities and social sciences, by filling a lacuna in the curriculum that we can no longer afford to ignore," White said.

—Assistant Professor of Religion
Rivka Ulmer

Cherkin feels that the course provides her with a different perspective on Judaism. She also agrees that studying religion is valuable to students.

"I think it is important to study religion because even though it seems that we live in a secular society, religion is a dominant force. It is important to learn about all religions since they are influential in global decisions," Cherkin said.

White believes that the addition of Ulmer and her position will benefit the Jewish Studies program.

"[The MacArthur Chair of Jewish Studies] will add rich disciplinary and cultural diversity to the courses available for all students at Bucknell, and add courses in areas under-represented in the curriculum," White said.

Tyler Kidder—The Bucknellian

Professor Rivka Ulmer, of the religion department at the University, has recently been named the MacArthur Chair of Jewish Studies. Ulmer plans to increase campus knowledge and awareness about Judaism.

Ulmer regularly visits Berelson Center for Jewish Life to talk with the students. She is interested in learning from students what it is like to be Jewish in America. With the money she is given with the MacArthur title, Ulmer intends to bring Jewish speakers and musical performers to the University.

"I want to bring a klezmer band, which plays Middle Eastern music, and also well known musical artists," Ulmer said.

The University has a lot of new programs to look forward to now that Ulmer is chair. Educationally and culturally, the University is developing. The University campaign funded Jewish Life and Learning fund that has helped to bring in a full-time Jewish chaplain and provide support to the Jewish chaplain office. During the past two years, the University has sponsored visiting distinguished scholars positions and a Jewish colloquium series, bringing to campus a number of important scholars in a variety of areas of Jewish Studies, including literature, philosophy, ethics and gender.

"Jewish studies at Bucknell is not just about understanding Jewish religion, but rather a complex and rich history and lineage of intellectual thought, social, political and cultural developments," White said.

Ulmer agrees with the importance of religious studies.

"Everyone should take a course about Judaism. You learn about yourself and humanities in general. The Bible is important for all of Western society," Ulmer said.

Abroad perspective: London, England

By Jennifer Jenchura
Senior Writer

This past summer England was in love with England, and I witnessed the fascination. "The festival atmosphere around the capital." "It was a champagne atmosphere." These are actual newspaper quotes used to describe the intense spirit of nationalism felt among the English when I stepped off of my first trans-Atlantic flight in London last June.

I began to think an internship in a foreign country was a wonderful opportunity to go abroad, work in a field of interest, gain valuable lifelong skills and grow as an individual. Surprisingly, I was not nervous about leaving the continent for the first time and going to live in a triple room with college students I did not yet know. I just left and hoped for the best. I was soon taking London's public transportation system, the Tube, to work every day, just like any other Brit!

I lived in a big house near Notting Hill with 20 other American college student interns. I was set up with an internship related to my major in a small firm in the financial district and was exposed to all the facets of the firm, doing real projects and working with British people.

The best part of my experience was working with the people. Every Monday, they wanted a full update on how I spent my weekend and what I saw. Although I had to work most of the week, I was able to visit France, Scotland and Ireland, in addition to many places within England such as Bath, Brighton, Salisbury, Stonehenge, Leed's Castle and Windsor.

It took me a couple of weeks to realize that this particular summer was a very special one for England. Not only had I arrived on this special four-day weekend to celebrate the 50th anniversary of Queen Elizabeth II's reign, the night before I arrived, over a million people showed up at Buckingham Palace for a pop concert and three tons of fireworks. Needless to say, the morale of the country was extremely high. The Queen's Golden Jubilee was in full force and World Cup soccer was to start soon.

Jenchura standing by Court No. 1 after a long night of camping out for Wimbledon tickets. A number of tickets are traditionally set aside for last-minute purchase the day of play.

It did not take me long to adjust to pubs opening at 7 a.m. to catch the World Cup games broadcast live from Korea, especially when a roaring cheer erupted from within the city each time a goal was scored—loud enough to wake me up. I claimed more popular English sports such as soccer and tennis as my new pastimes. My friends and I watched the games at nearby pubs, just to feel the famous atmosphere. The streets were almost empty while any pub, bar or coffee shop with a television was crammed with England fans.

The path to Buckingham Palace was still decorated with flags to celebrate the Queen's 50-year reign, but soccer (football to them) became England's new monarchy. I was amazed to find out that most of the population knew at least one player on the team and that most offices either had radios tuned to every game or were frequently checking the BBC sports Web pages, even during games that England was not playing in. With poster boy David Beckham as England's steadfast captain, just about every single woman seemed to be in love with the English soccer player. His name repeatedly popped up in conversations all over town with English supporters talking about his extensive media coverage and penalty kick skills.

As Beckham led England to a pivotal 1-0 upset over mighty Argentina, more than four million people across the country skipped work to watch. It might as well have been a national holiday. Never mind the Jubilee—God save English football.

Even a non-sports fan would have appreciated the electric atmosphere displayed by the countless flags expressing encouragement for England. People were proud to be English. Even a couple of weeks later when the actual Jubilee celebrations had ended and Brazil knocked England out of the World Cup, the mood did not waver. Wimbledon tennis became the focal point of nationalism, especially when a Brit still had a chance to claim victory in men's singles.

The World Cup is held every four years, and this year England was much more successful than in 1998. It was not uncommon to see people wearing red St. George's crosses painted on each fingernail symbolizing England, which the Union Jack does not do.

The Union Jack is the flag of Britain—England, Scotland, Wales and Northern Ireland. England has its own flag just like the other countries. England is part of Britain, yet they are still a fairly independent bunch; the soccer team was English, not British.

England rediscovered a love for the St. George's flag, though the joy of victory was followed by the disappointment of a defeat by Brazil. The fact that so many people from different backgrounds can wrap themselves in this antique symbol shows that there might be a little chivalry behind the blinding, beery bravado.

As the final whistle blew between England and Brazil, the sweet dreams had all evaporated and a hangover engulfed the country. Instead of the loud cheers, waves of anguished gasps floated out of packed pubs and into the empty side streets. I visited Covent Garden Market later that day, but it was not until I returned to there two weeks later and saw what a crowded area it is supposed to be did I realize how collectively depressed the entire nation really was on the Friday that England's World Cup hopes died.

What is even more amazing is that the whole event is a sight that won't be repeated for another four years.

Although in terms of morale it was a weekend of dejection and despair for England, but pride was revived that Monday when Wimbledon began. This famous annual event seemed to rescue the hearts of a nation desperate to continue to celebrate their happy spirit that had started three weeks before with the Jubilee.

What is different about this sporting event is that the tournament sets aside a substantial number of tickets for purchase on the day of play. Thousands of people sleep out overnight and form a long line in hopes of a chance at good seats. With this method, England can rest assured that every match will be packed. There is a general lottery for advance ticket sales, but since the '20s, tennis fans have been lining up for last-minute tickets to Wimbledon in what has become known simply as "the queue."

One of my friends from work told me about the thrill of queuing (waiting in line) at Wimbledon. I asked my roommate what she thought about sleeping under the stars at Wimbledon Park. At this point Wimbledon was already in the third round of play and I warned her that it would be crowded. Even if we queued for hours we still might not get in. We also had no tent, just the comforters from our beds. In spite of these reasons, we thought we would give it a shot and I am glad we did.

We dressed in layers, packed our comforters into suitcases and hopped on the Tube to Southfields Station. We joined the queue around midnight. Queuing for the championships is, for many, part of the "Wimbledon Experience." The atmosphere was rich with excitement. The air was filled with smoke from barbecues, there were several card games going on and everyone appeared to be in good spirits. Hundreds of queue stewards made sure it remained orderly. We asked some locals what our chances of getting tickets were. They said you never know how close to the front of the two-mile line you are because there are two lines from opposite directions that converge into the turnstiles at the entrance in the morning. We were confident we would get ground admission, but we hoped for tickets to a major court.

I slept remarkably well and promptly at 7:30 a.m., the queue supervisors woke us up and informed us the queue would be moving towards the turnstiles at exactly 8 a.m. The sun was shining and everyone was out to enjoy the day ahead. Tennis club officials added to the excitement by giving out free guides and stickers. Closer to the turnstiles, volunteers distributed stickers declaring "I've Queued At Wimbledon 2002," which fans affixed to their jackets like badges of honor.

The queue moved along and at about 10 a.m., we stored our luggage for the day and soon after officials came around with wristbands for courts where the key contests are played. My roommate and I chose Court No. 1 and were ecstatic that we would be sitting in on some major matches with top-ranked players. Although I was just a novice tennis fan, the pubs had replaced soccer with tennis matches all week, so I recognized a few of the better-known players on my court, including American Jennifer Capriati.

After going through security and waiting some more, we were finally able to purchase the tickets we had wristbands for. I was so excited to be going to Court 1 that I did not care where I would be sitting, which was good because you do not get a choice. The officials simply look for your wristband and hand out random tickets that could be for anywhere in the stadium.

Inside, Wimbledon was gorgeous and filled with flowers. It was like entering a garden except only tennis players were allowed to stand on the grass tennis courts. You do not see any tacky court advertising at Wimbledon. It represented a bit of purity in a world of over-commercialized events.

I realized England was in rare form that summer as the country had united in spirit over the Queen's Golden Jubilee, World Cup soccer and Wimbledon all within a month of each other ... Needless to say, the morale of the country was extremely high.

We went right to the entrance level printed on the tickets. I was puzzled at first because the only seats in front of us were the first 15 rows of the very bottom of the whole stadium near the grass. Those seats have the best views, so I thought they couldn't possibly be ours. Like a little kid at Christmas, I peaked down near the very bottom rows just to see if the seat number matched my ticket. The day just got better and better especially when we realized that we indeed had tickets to Court 1 of Wimbledon in the third row from the ground!

I had never been to a tennis match before, but I was in awe of the formal processes of judges entering and players entering wearing their tennis whites (a requirement for Wimbledon). The crowd was very much into the matches. Unlike most of the popular American sporting events, fans here clapped for good play, not because they were rooting for a particular player.

The Capriati match was the most crowded. I could not believe I was almost close enough to touch the grass. Being so close, you could see the emotion on the players' faces.

There were a total of five matches scheduled on our court and I stayed for every one of them. In the middle of the afternoon, my friend and I decided that in honor of our great day we should treat ourselves to champagne along with Wimbledon's famous strawberries-and-cream dessert.

My day at Wimbledon was the best day of my whole trip abroad. The guards practically had to usher me out after the last match of the day was finally called for darkness around 7 p.m. By the time I picked up my luggage and took the crowded Tube home, it was about 11 p.m. I could not believe I had spent the past 24 hours at Wimbledon. I enjoyed every second of it. (So much that I even called my mom at 5 a.m. EST to have her look for me on television.)

When I arrived back to Notting Hill, I was exhilarated and in disbelief that I had been a part of the aura that takes place only on the hallowed All-England Club grass courts.

Working and living in England last summer was the one of best experiences of my life. Once I left, I realized England was in rare form that summer as the country had united in spirit over the Queen's Golden Jubilee, World Cup soccer and Wimbledon all within a month of each other.

Living in the city and working with Londoners exposed me to the culture in a way other programs could not. My internship more than exceeded my expectations; I got more out of the experience than I ever imagined possible.

Meal plan conversions plagued by problems

By Rachel Laskow
Editor-in-Chief

Despite a conversion date of Oct. 28, Dining Services is still in the process of changing new fraternity members' meal plans to their respective houses.

"What happened this year was that there were a number of new people involved in the process," Director of Dining Services Tim Tenon said.

The conversion is also taking longer than expected because there has been a delay with the conversion forms that new members have to fill out. According to Assistant Director for Fraternity and Sorority Affairs Shauna Irwin, fraternities should have been able to provide new members with the appropriate forms from Administrative Services.

"It is an unfortunate situation and it was compounded when people didn't get the forms and the conversions couldn't be made in a timely manner," Tenon said.

Tenon said Dining Services will still recognize the Oct. 28 conversion date.

"We will search the meal plan usage of the pledges. If they haven't gone over their allotted usage, we will not penalize them for the lateness of forms. If they have gone over their totals, we will only charge for those

It's that special time of year when Bucknellians both young and old truly feel the spirit of our University—when we invite alumni back to campus to see our progress and pride. Together we celebrate the University's life, past and present. Eight Homecoming hosts and hostesses are elected from the student body to reign over the weekend's festivities.

Leading this year's activities are the Homecoming hosts and hostesses—Seniors Laura Day, Melissa Milanak, Amanda Robie, Jenny Schlack, Aaron DeRosa, Sharif Kotb, Nikhil Menon and Omar Zalatimo.

"The process to select hosts and hostesses lasts about a month. In the fall, registered student organizations, faculty and staff are invited to nominate seniors for host/hostess. Then, a screening committee studies the nominations and narrows the field to 12 men and 12 women to be on the final voting ballot. The committee considers who would represent the senior class well in their commitment to Bucknell through academics, social service, athletics and loyalty to the University. Finally, the entire student body votes to select the final four hosts and four hostesses," said Kristin Stetler, assistant director of the Office of Alumni, Parents and Volunteers.

Each year, the host and hostesses are a group of some of the most involved students that the University community will ever encounter. These students carry on a 31-year tradition at the University and represent

Faculty Approves Living Wage, Merit Aid

Living Wage

— Faculty approves $9.00 wage floor for all University support staff, as soon as fiscally possible

CONDITIONS

- $1.25 million projected cost for implementation
- Does not include benefits
- Does not include student employees
- Staff positions to be re-evaluated, to keep wages proportional to level of work

Merit Aid

— Faculty approves pilot plan outlining experimental implementation of merit aid

OBJECTIVES

- Strengthen reputation of University, increase student diversity
- Enroll more middle-income students
- Enroll more performing arts students
- Maintain ROTC program
- Promote athletic equality

Living Wage

By Sandi-Jo Galati News Editor

Members of the faculty voted in support of a living wage motion proposed by Associate Professor of Geography Paul Susman and Professor of Religion Mary Evelyn Tucker. The motion recommended to University President Steffen Rogers "the immediate implementation of a wage floor of at least $9 per hour for all Bucknell support staff (including Dining Services)" at a faculty meeting held Monday.

"I interpret the faculty's vote for the motion as a statement of support for Bucknell to do everything it can to live up to its Mission Statement call for 'compassion, civility and a sense of justice,' and to encourage the administration to find the money to ensure that every staff worker gets enough to cover basic living costs," Susman said.

Susman's motion arose from a recommendation presented to the faculty by the University Committee on Planning and Budget at the September faculty meeting. The proposal, commissioned by the administration last spring, called for a minimum $9 per hour wage after four years of successfully holding a position at the University.

Susman instead motioned that the $9 per hour wage be implemented as soon as the University budget permitted.

"My view is that a living wage, one that would enable a family to live without needing public or private assistance, should be a moral obligation. People should be paid enough to put food on the table and buy clothes for their children," Susman said. "That's why my motion recommends 'immediate implementation.'"

Susman's initial motion at the September faculty meeting was what he believes to be the impetus for Rogers and the administration to develop a wage plan for $9 per hour to be implemented pending budgetary allowances.

"My hope is that the president will work hard to find the funds so that all Bucknell staff workers will have at least $9 per hour plus benefits," Susman said.

Rogers presented a preliminary plan to the faculty in which he recommended that Vision 2010 resources be committed to increased nominal wage, salary compression, performance evaluations, promotions and rewards.

"I had already committed to increasing the wage," Rogers said. "I have also talked to people about putting a plan in place as a component of Vision 2010."

Rogers also committed to hiring an external firm that would classify all employment positions on campus to ensure "equal pay for equal work, no matter who you happen to be at the University."

A study set to be complete by January 2004 will make certain that a

Merit Aid

Members of the faculty voted in support of a pilot plan outlining the experimental implementation of merit aid and rejected a proposal to distribute monies allocated to the athletic component of merit aid equally among all sports at a special faculty meeting last Monday. The pilot program was initially presented to the faculty last month by the Committee on Admissions and Financial Aid (CAFA,) headed by Assistant Professor of Psychology Arthur Shapiro.

"The greater Bucknell community has gone through a long, thoughtful process in considering the concept of merit aid and responding to the current program design," Vice President of Enrollment Management Kurt Thiede said. "Given the institution's long-standing position on need-based financial aid, this lengthy discussion was necessary to get us to the place we are now."

Prior to endorsing the merit aid plan, the faculty voted against a proposal by Professor of Geography and Environmental Studies Ben Marsh to amend the section of the CAFA plan that limited the athletic component of merit aid to basketball players, and instead extend athletic merit aid to all sports.

The justification for the motion set forth by Marsh was aimed to guarantee the same equality among students participating on athletic teams and students in the classroom.

"If we look at the academic portion [of the merit aid pilot plan] we see grants designed for students to contribute to the entire community," Marsh said. "We should treat athletics as we do all else."

Just as students receiving merit aid for exhibiting outstanding academic or performing arts skills will enrich all other students, Marsh contended that students on all athletic teams should be granted the opportunity to participate with a student awarded merit aid.

"Good questions have been asked throughout this process and I believe good answers have been provided," Thiede said. "We are entering this 'new territory' cautiously—an appropriate approach, with a measured plan that will guide our future decisions."

Entering the "new territory" of merit aid is a decision that ultimately will be the responsibility of the Board of Trustees at its meeting later this month. The results of both faculty votes will be available for the board in determining whether or not merit aid is an appropriate direction for the University.

Faculty involvement in the implementation of merit aid began last February with a special faculty meeting, in which faculty members were given the opportunity to voice preliminary concerns regarding merit aid. These concerns were brought before the Board of Trustees at its April meeting, during which the board approved merit aid implementation and commissioned CAFA to draft a pilot program for merit aid with the stipulation that it would be written with strict adherence to

Cavanagh delivers inaugural lecture for biomed engineering

Eric Graham—The Bucknellian

Named the Emmitt Memorial Chair of biomedical engineering, David Cavanagh delivered a speech about the importance of the new major at the University. Biomedical engineering will be offered to students as a new major next fall.

By Elisabeth Salemme
Staff Writer

Assistant Professor of Biochemical and Chemical Engineering Daniel Cavanagh gave the inaugural Emmitt lecture in biomedical engineering entitled "Biomedical Engineering: New Opportunities in Education, Research and Industry" last Saturday.

Biomedical engineering is a new major that will be implemented at the University next fall.

Cavanagh has been named the William C. and Gertrude B. Emmitt Memorial Chair in biomedical engineering. William and Gertrude Emmitt are being honored by their children, Virginia '59, Richard '67 and William Jr. '69, with a $3.2 million gift that established the William C. and Gertrude B. Emmitt Memorial Chair in biomedical engineering. The gift will allow biomedical engineering to evolve from a minor at the University to a major.

"There are some things that happen at a university that change that university forever, and the idea of having a biomedical program at Bucknell is one such as that. However, you can't just have the idea. You have to have the support to make that idea a reality and that is what has happened here in the last two or three years," University President Steffen Rogers said. "We've seen a wonderful idea that grew from the faculty to create a program for themselves and for their students and to find the Socratic support we have received from the Emmitt family to make that idea a reality."

Public Safety Log

Wednesday, Oct. 30

TAMPERING WITH FIRE EQUIPMENT—Public Safety responded to Swartz hall for a fire alarm activation and discovered that unknown person(s) activated a pull station for no reason. The incident is under investigation.

INFORMATION / POWER OUTAGE—The University and surrounding areas experienced a 3.5 hour loss of power due to weather conditions. Public Safety contacted the appropriate University officials and personnel to handle the issue.

INFORMATION / SUSPICIOUS INCIDENT OFF CAMPUS—A student reported to Public Safety that she, and at least one other person, became ill after consuming beverages at an off-campus restaurant a weak earlier. The students suspected that unknown person(s) had placed an unknown substance in their drinks. The report was filed too late for any forensic testing to be completed. Information was shared with the police.

MEDICAL TRANSPORT—A student requested transportation to Evangelical Community Hospital for treatment of a toothache. A Student Health Services driver contacted and transported the student, who later returned to campus.

HARASSMENT BY COMMUNICATIONS—A parent reported that he received a suspicious call at his off-campus home soliciting funds for the University. Upon investigation, it was determined that the caller was not a student. Public Safety recommended that he contact the local police department.

VANDALISM—A student reported to Public Safety that his vehicle was egged by unknown person(s) while parked in the Sigma Phi Epsilon Fraternity parking lot. The incident is under investigation.

Friday, Nov. 1

VANDALISM—A Public Safety dispatcher reported to Public Safety that unknown person(s) had struck the Public Safety building with paintballs shot from a paintball gun. The incident is under investigation.

UNDERAGE CONSUMPTION / POSSESSION—Public Safety responded to Vedder Hall for the report of underage drinking. Upon arrival, Public Safety cited a University student for underage drinking and two University students for underage possession of alcohol in their room.

Saturday, Nov. 2

FOUND PROPERTY—While on routine patrol, Public Safety found a bicycle on the grass on Seventh Street near Moore AveNUE. The bicycle was returned to Public Safety for storage until the owner can be located.

INFORMATION / WELFARE CHECK—Public Safety received a call from the parents of a student to check on their son's welfare. Public Safety and University officials attempted to locate the student with negative results. The student later responded to a note placed on his door and reported that he was well.

CRIMINAL MISCHIEF—An employee reported to Public Safety that unknown person(s) broke five window panes in an external door at McDonnell Hall. The incident is under investigation.

INFORMATION / BROKEN WINDOW—Public Safety responded to McDonnell Hall for the report of a broken window. No witnesses or suspects could be located in a search of the area.

UNDERAGE CONSUMPTION—Public Safety responded to a report of underage consumption at Smith Hall. Upon arrival, it was determined that three individuals were non-University students and they were escorted off campus. One individual was a student who had consumed alcohol, although under the age of 21. The student was cited by the University and Lewisburg Police Department for underage consumption.

Sunday, Nov. 3

VEHICLE ACCIDENT / HIT & RUN—While on routine patrol on Fraternity Road, Public Safety was stopped by a Susquehanna Transit Company bus driver who reported a vehicle had struck the rear of the bus and left the scene. Upon investigation, the reported vehicle and student driver were located and taken into custody by East Buffalo Township Police Department. University charges are pending. The investigation continues.

TAMPERING WITH FIRE EQUIPMENT—Public Safety responded to a fire alarm at Vedder Hall, which was caused by a discharged fire extinguisher in the stairwell area. No witnesses or suspects could be located in a search of the area. The incident is under investigation.

Monday, Nov. 4

INFORMATION / DISORDERLY STUDENT—Public Safety responded to Marts Hall for the report of a student harassing an office employee. The student was gone when the officer arrived. The employee was advised to call Public Safety, should the student return.

INFORMATION / SUSPICIOUS PERSON OFF CAMPUS—A student contacted Public Safety and advised that a suspicious male had been loitering near her off-campus residence and knocked on the door and spoke with both her and her roommate on several occasions. The student advised Public Safety that she felt unsafe. Lewisburg Police Department responded to take a report.

INFORMATION—Public Safety responded to Trax Hall for the report that unknown person(s) removed the screen from a student's ground floor window. No signs of entry were detected.

Tuesday, Nov. 5

INFORMATION / WELFARE CHECK—A University official requested that Public Safety attempt to contact a student whose mother was concerned for her welfare. Public Safety responded to Coleman Hall and spoke with the student, who was well.

INFORMATION / WELFARE CHECK—A student's mother contacted Public Safety and requested someone check on the welfare of her son, who resides in the Delta Upsilon Fraternity House. Public Safety made contact with the student's roommates, who advised Public Safety the student was well. A message was left for the student, with his roommate, to contact his home residence.

a diversity of majors, athletic interests, cultures and social service actions. Their collective activities range from president of the senior class to resident assistant, soloist and treasurer of Two Past Midnight, ROTC-cadet battalion commander and an editor on The Bucknellian.

"The eight seniors selected represent the true meaning of Bucknell spirit. They are very well-rounded, and they seem to care about the Bucknell community and the community at large. On top of this, they have a keen awareness of the importance of their academic work and have committed themselves to balancing their workload and leadership on campus," Stetler said.

All the hosts and hostesses have expressed how honored they feel to have the support of both students and faculty in recognition of their accomplishments while at the University.

"It is undoubtedly an honor and an exhilarating feeling to be selected as a Homecoming host. I am overwhelmed to be representing the Class of 2003 this weekend," Menon said. "Being a Homecoming host is a great end to my Bucknell life, but I strongly believe that it is also a beginning to my life as a Bucknellian outside of the University."

All of the hosts and hostesses agreed that this honor does not change them, but as they prepare to start the next phase of their lives, each feels that their overall four-year Bucknell experience has cultivated a deep personal growth.

"My experiences at Bucknell have provided me with the traditional collegiate atmosphere that offered each student the space and setting to grow and mature in character, as well as intellect," Day said. "I will always remember Bucknell as home to my close friends, tough challenges, satisfying accomplishments and the catalyst that guided and prepared me for the next step in life. The lessons I have learned will carry with me through all my future endeavors."

Some students came onto campus ready to be leaders, while others had to work hard to discover where they fit into the University culture. The University has allowed for personal growth and inspired many to become leaders within their own communities.

"I am a very different person now from when I arrived at Bucknell as a freshman. When I first got here, I was quiet and did not really speak out. Ever since I got involved on campus through the Residential Colleges, my musical experiences and everything else I have done, I have allowed myself to become more outspoken and open," Robie said. "Bucknell has allowed me to mature throughout my four years here. I have loved my experiences and made the most of the college experience. I believe I have become a better, more mature person because of my time as a Bucknellian."

As a collaborative group, the hosts and hostesses represent many parts of the University. Having the opportunity to be a Homecoming host or hostesses is also a symbolic honor bestowed only upon highly motivated individuals.

"By being a hostess, I represent pride and school spirit for the Class of 2003. Being a member of the Homecoming Court is a symbol of the dedication, commitment and love I feel for this institution. Bucknell has made me a better person in that is has allowed me to excel and build upon the foundation that was already me," Schlack said.

The hosts' and hostesses' role goes beyond the weekend's festivities, as hosts and hostesses will be strong representatives of their class for future alumni events.

"Being a hostess is another wonderful opportunity and experience to help me be more active in happenings with the University and to contribute to the campus community. It helps me gain another perspective into Bucknell," Milanak said.

The hosts and hostesses will be honored today by the Alumni Association Board of Directors and attend the McDonnell Hall Dedication. On Saturday, they will serve as greeters at the O'Leary Psychology and Geology Center Dedication and at the all-campus post-game reception. They will also be recognized during halftime of the football game vs. Lafayette. Once they graduate, they will be asked to remain strong representatives of their class for event and reunion planning.

"Hosts and hostesses will be able to service as a bridge between the Class of 2003 and Bucknell in the future," Menon said.

extra meals, and not the total number of days until we get the forms processed," Tenon said.

Traditionally, new members have been able to eat at their fraternities after accepting a bid.

"Right off the bat, we want pledges eating at the house. We want pledges to get to know brothers," said Aziz Megji '03, Interfraternity Council President and member of Phi Kappa Psi Fraternity.

Irwin also recognizes the importance of new fraternity members being able to eat with their new brothers.

"It is important that bonds be built between brothers and new members. I also challenge people to look at other ways to build bonds," Irwin said.

According to Megji, both the fraternities and new members lose money during this time period because the fraternities feed new members. At the same time, many new members are not using their Dining Services meal plans.

Sigma Phi Epsilon (Sig Ep) President Brian Lowe '03 feels that new members eating at the house is a privilege that comes with joining most fraternities.

"Instead of having to deal with the overcrowding of the Bison and the cafeteria, and the strict hours and rules placed upon students, members who come to the house can have meals throughout the week and have access to food 24 hours a day, every day," Lowe said.

This year, Dining Services requires that students who convert to a fraternity meal plan maintain seven meals per week, or 50 blocks with Dining Services. For example, new members who had a 19-meal-a-week plan, will receive credit for 12 meals. They can put the credit towards the fraternity meal plan.

"I committed to Dean Ferraro and Shauna Irwin that I will make an effort to complete the process as soon as possible and keep the individuals from suffering financially," Tenon said.

Lowe does not think that the conversion is fair because he believes it is a way for Dining Services to keep students' money that they would normally never intend to use. According to Lowe, a meal plan that costs $1,338 at the beginning of the year is worth only $262, with nearly half a semester remaining.

"This is money that should rightfully be a student's money. Meal plan conversions have long been an expected and fair system in which both fraternities and Dining Services worked together. This year marks the first year that this is not the case," Lowe said.

According to Lowe, Sig Ep has had a difficult time with the conversion process.

"Typically fraternities budget based on the money they will receive from the conversion of meal plans. With us basically getting back a third of what we had planned on, we are working on ways to come up with the nearly $10,000 shortfall the Dining Services has left us with to pay our kitchen expenses," Lowe said.

Tenon said Dining Services has planned for the conversion.

"We had budgeted that there would be a conversion in late October, so it doesn't put a burden on us that we didn't plan for," he said.

Members of the Greek community and Dining Services have plans to make the process easier in the future. Tenon believes that a written policy and procedure would help the matter in the future.

"After we get everything finished for this year, we will start setting time frames for next year. If we have a firm conversion date, we can let fraternities know in the spring what pledge credit would be so they can plan ahead for the fall," Tenon said.

Irwin suggested that people be given the conversion forms during Fall Recruitment, so that they would be more informed about the conversion and could ask brothers questions about the conversion.

Although there were some challenges in the conversion process, Irwin sees the situation as a learning process.

"It is nice that people can see that there is a collaboration between this office, fraternities and Dining Services," Irwin said.

Fastow pleads innocent to 78-count indictment

HOUSTON—Former Enron Corp. Chief Financial Officer Andrew Fastow pleaded innocent Wednesday to a 78-count federal indictment charging him with masterminding complex financial schemes that enriched him and helped doom the energy trading powerhouse.

Victorious GOP moves on issues

Riding an election wave that put Republicans in control of the House and Senate, the Bush administration on Wednesday made clear it would move quickly on two priorities: creating a homeland defense agency and stimulating the economy with permanent tax breaks. Republicans held the House going into Tuesday's midterm elections and consolidated their power by seizing the Senate when Democratic incumbents lost in Missouri and Georgia.

New charges against sniper suspects

White House in hunt to fill SEC Chairman seat

WASHINGTON—Harvey Pitt's resignation as head of the Securities and Exchange Commission was just the first inkling that the White House was in for a night of good news. A sweeping GOP victory at the polls removed the need for any political maneuvering by the White House over Pitt's departure, White House sources said. Despite the celebrations, White House officials late Tuesday were already revamping what one source called "our dog-eared short list" of candidates to replace Pitt.

DNA identifies Titanic mystery child

TORONTO—Nearly a century ago, Canadian sailors buried an unidentified infant who died on the Titanic and, touched by the tragedy, called him the Unknown Child—a symbol of all the children who were lost when the luxury liner sank. Now at last, the child is known. On Tuesday, Magda Schleifer, a retired Finnish bank clerk, visited the grave, which DNA tests have now established holds the remains of one of her relatives.

Gay sheep shed light on sexuality

Gay sheep that mate only with other rams have different brain structures from "straight" sheep, a finding that may shed light on human sexuality, U.S. researchers said on Monday. The differences are similar to those seen in some homosexual humans, but probably only go a small way to explaining the causes of different sexual preferences, the team at Oregon Health Sciences University said.

Yemen attack raises legal questions

The United States took a bold step in its global war on terrorism this week when a CIA-operated unmanned aircraft blasted a vehicle to bits in the Yemeni desert, killing six alleged members of al-Qaida. The killings also raised questions about the legal underpinning for such tactics—and whether the U.S. military has the right to use them anywhere in the world.

HOMECOMING 2002

Aaron DeRosa
Major:English

Aaron has served as the chief editor of the Mirth Grinder, sports editor of The Bucknellian and president of the Slam Committee. He was awarded the 2002 University Prize for Men, a prize for English literature and composition, held a West Branch internship and was named 2001 Mr. Bucknell. After graduation, Aaron plans to pursue his doctorate in English literature at Johns Hopkins University, New York University or University of California at Berkeley.

"Having the courage to put your hand down when you've been convinced that everything you'd previously thought was wrong is the greatest lesson anyone can learn. Changing your mind doesn't show weakness, it's the best argument I can think of in support of evolution. On the road of Bucknell life, there are those who carry their backpacks over their shoulders, and there are those that wheel them around in those little suitcases ... don't be like that. Sling the bag over your shoulder and walk because there is nothing more rewarding than looking back after four years and thinking, 'I carried my bag this far and there's no reason to think I can't keep walking."

Sharif Kotb
Major: Economics with a concentration in finance

Sharif is a member of Bucknell Student Government, serving as as the Class of 2003 vice president. He is also part of the Muslim Student Association, the Middle Eastern Association, the Men's Club Volleyball team and is also a Resident Assistant. He has served internships for J.P. Morgan Chase and Pricewaterhouse Coopers. After graduation, Sharif plans to work in New York for five to 10 years, while working toward his MBA, and then plans to move back to Egypt to start his own business.

"I've had two rewarding experiences while attending Bucknell. Crazy to some, but true ... seeing snow for the first time freshman year, and going skiing a week later. Second, having a close relationship with all or most of the faculty I've interacted with during the past three years. In terms of advice to future Bucknellians, I would have to say work hard and play hard from the first minute you step foot on campus. Only then, can you look back at your college years and not regret a single moment."

Laura Day
Majors: International Relations and French
Minor: Japanese

Laura has been involved in Bucknell Student Government since 1999 and is currently president of the Class of 2003. She worked as an intern and a tour guide for the admissions office, served as both news editor and managing editor of The Bucknellian, served on the Fiscal Affairs Committee and the Presidential Advisory Committee. She has served internships with the Union/Snyder County Courthouse, Hydro-Air Components, Inc. and in Congressman Jack Quinn's District Office. Laura has been awarded the Kari M. Conrad Award, the President's Award for Academic Excellence, the Jeanne Litkus award in French, News writer of the Year by The Bucknellian, the Coca-Cola Scholarship, Certification in the Japanese Language and has been named to the Mortar Board National College Honor Society. After graduation, Laura plans to attend law school and concentrate in commercial litigation.

"From the day I first looked at Bucknell as a prospective student, the students walking across the academic quad, smiling and laughing, demonstrated the warm and welcoming social climate at this university. When leaving the quad and entering the classroom, the energy and sincere devotion of the professors represented the first-rate academic aura of Bucknell. Without hesitation, maximizing on this balance between academics and character growth has been my most rewarding experience at Bucknell. If I were to leave one piece of advice to the future Bucknell students, I would stress the importance of not taking for granted the extreme wealth of opportunity Bucknell affords each student and to capitalize on these four years in order to grow in both intellect and moral being."

Omar Zalatimo
Major: Biochemistry

Omar is the Bucknell Student Government vice-president for operations, and has served as the Muslim Student Association president and Interfraternity Council Community Service/Philanthropy Chair. Omar is a member of the Community Judicial Board and Lambda Chi Alpha Fraternity. He received the The Stephen A. Barowsky Prize, has made the Dean's List and served as Materials Research Science and Engineering Center undergraduate researcher. After graduation, Omar plans on continuing his education in medical school.

"My most rewarding experiences at Bucknell have been being an orientation assistant and a teaching assistant. I enjoyed those experiences because I was able to help the newer students get acquainted with our school. The greatest piece of advice I can give future Bucknellians is that our University is unique, in that it provides us with the opportunity to do anything we desire. We have faculty, administration and staff who are very open and willing to help us in all of our endeavors. Make the best of these once-in-a-lifetime opportunities."

Jenny Sue Schlack
Major: Secondary Education/English

Jenny is a Battalion Commander for ROTC, was a Resident Assistant, women's rugby president, varsity cheerleader, Student Ambassador Coordinator for Reunion 2002, Senior Gift Drive solicitor and an Executive Board member in Alpha Chi Omega Sorority. She is a National Advanced Leadership Regimental Honor graduate and a Distinguished Military Graduate of Bucknell University for 2003. She was also named Mortar Board National College Senior Honor Society. After graduation, Jenny plans to serve as an officer in the United States Army.

"The most rewarding experience I have had at Bucknell is realizing the amazing family I have acquired throughout my time here. The friends I have made through the years have completed my college experience and because of them as well as all of the people I have become associated with, I have developed into the person I am today."

Amanda Robie
Major: Music Education

Amanda is the manager and alto section leader of the University Chapel Choir, alto section leader of the Concert Chorale, a teaching assistant and member of the Opera Company, a member of the Weis Center Student Cultural Collective, a former resident assistant, and a member of the Social Justice Residential College and former Junior Fellow for the Social Justice Residential College, a member of the Silhouettes a cappella group and a tour guide. She was awarded a research grant this past summer in Music Education and second place in National Association of Teachers of Singing. After graduation Amanda plans to attend graduate school in vocal performance or teach high school chorus.

"My most rewarding experience has been all of the activities that I've been involved in while I've been here at Bucknell and the friends that I've gained through this involvement. My advice is to get yourself involved on campus. You meet so many new people through these experiences and it really adds to your college experience."

Major: Psychology & Anthropology
Minor: Chemical & Biological studies

Melissa is a member of the Mortar Board National College Senior Honor Society. She has been treasurer for the Psi Chi Honor Society, faculty correspondent and music chair for Kappa Alpha Theta Sorority, a member of the jury panel for the Community Judicial Board, treasurer for the Psychology Club, treasurer for the Musical Theater Club, treasurer and soloist for Two Past Midnight coed a cappella group, manager of Concert Chorale, National Anthem soloist at University football, basketball and soccer games, cantor for the University's Catholic Campus Ministry and Saturday Evening Mass Music Coordinator. She has been awarded The Edwin and Florence Fetterman Scholarship, the Meerwarth Award and the Ethel Ward Grant. She has made the University Dean's List four times and made the National Dean's List three times. Melissa also interned at Geisinger Hospital in Lewisburg as a pediatric neurology intern.

"I plan to either pursue graduate studies and work as a research assistant at the University of Ulster in Northern Ireland or work as a research assistant next year. I then plan to pursue graduate doctoral studies in clinical psychology the following year."

Nikhil Menon
Major: Management and Economics
Minor: Philosophy

Nikhil is a member of Phi Beta Kappa, co-president of the South Asian Students Association and served as a Resident Assistant. He was awarded the President's Award for Distinguished Academic Achievement and interned at the Bank of Tokyo-Mitsubishi. After graduation, Nikhil plans to work in an investment bank, and plans on keeping close tabs on the University.

"One of my most rewarding experiences has been as a Resident Assistant the last two years. I have learned and experienced a tremendous amount with an amazing group of people. I believe that future Bucknellians should attempt to be open-minded and global at all times. I believe in gaining as many different experiences as possible. The world is ours to mold and shape as we see fit and Bucknellians will play a vital role in that."

Merit Aid to be implemented as soon as Class of 2007, University officials say certain guidelines established by the board.

"I like to see cooperation between the faculty, the administration and the Board of Trustees," University President Steffen Rogers said. "The way that the process worked this time we are all in accord, but this is a major policy decision that definitely rests in its final form with the Board of Trustees."

The guidelines around which CAFA drafted the pilot program include developing a finance plan involving fundraising, maintaining the current socioeconomic environment of the University, limiting the non-athletic to athletic dollars spent to a 3-to-1 ratio and establishing annual goals for review. If the Board of Trustees approves the pilot program, merit aid implementation may begin as early as this admissions year, with the Class of 2007.

"This discussion and the resulting program design represent a clear recognition that the student marketplace continues to change and that we want to put ourselves in a position to be ready to meet the challenges and take advantage of the opportunities presented by this changing environment," Thiede said. "I believe we need to implement this pilot program, manage it carefully and evaluate it closely before we can determine its actual impact."

The objectives of merit aid, as outlined in the pilot program, include enrolling of more students academically, strengthening the reputation of the University, increasing diversity on campus, drawing more performing arts talent on campus, drawing more middle-income students to the University, maintaining the ROTC program, solidifying overall financial assistance and promoting athletic equality, particularly in basketball.

Many faculty members had previously voiced reservations about basketball players being the only athletes awarded merit aid specifically for their sport. In the current plan, six of the 42 available scholarships will be awarded to basketball players.

"We have one set of goals in terms of academics and we have a different set of goals in terms of athletics," Rogers said. "The reason for choosing basketball as the target sport of merit aid is that all of the other Patriot League schools have chosen basketball."

When merit aid was first implemented among the Patriot League schools in 1998, the only sport for which merit aid could be offered was basketball.

"It is the league's decision to make basketball the marquee sport. They intend to to use it as a marketing tool and to provide an identity for the Patriot League, that in my estimation, does not exist now. We need to be competitive in that market," Rogers said.

Merit aid was later extended to include all sports except football when American University joined the Patriot League, because they already offered merit aid to all sports.

> "I saw the opportunity to have merit aid as a tool that we could use to improve our ability to compete for specific students both on the academic side and the athletic side."
> —Steffen Rogers, University president

Currently, Bucknell and Colgate are the only Patriot League schools that have isolated themselves with the Ivy League in their refusal to offer merit aid. According to Rogers, Colgate is monitoring the progress of the merit aid debate at Bucknell closely, and he anticipates that if Bucknell implements merit aid, Colgate will have no choice but to follow suit.

"We have found ourselves in a situation in an athletic conference that has dealt us some cards that we are not happy with, but regardless, we have to play," Professor of International Relations Stephen Stamos said.

According to Rogers, offering athletic merit aid to other sports is not something he foresees in the near future. He described merit aid as a "slippery slope" that must be monitored closely. The pilot program was intentionally designed with three-year limit, after which CAFA expects to have collected enough data to determine the future of the program.

"I see a limited merit program as a tool that we can use to improve our ability to compete for specific students both on the academic side and the athletic side," Rogers said. "I have no urge to go to a full-blown merit aid program. To implement a full blown program would be very expensive, completely unnecessary and a huge cultural change for the University that might change Bucknell in a way that I don't want to see happen."

After securing the approval of the faculty, the administration and CAFA are looking ahead to the Board of Trustees meeting with greater confidence in the prudent design of the merit aid plan.

"I am encouraged by the positive outcome of the meeting," Thiede said. "I believe that various members of the Bucknell community have been diligent in their efforts to ensure that as this pilot program is implemented the University has considered the myriad sides of the issue."

Class of 2003 Senior Gift Drive

Salute the Past, Savor the Memories,
Secure the Future

Did you know…?

-Last year, alumni, parents and friends gave over $24 million to support Bucknell.

-Their support off set tuition, enriched academic programs, and improved facilities.

-Their support also provides a $6,900 "Silent Scholarship" to every single student.

Help secure the future for the next generation of Bucknellians, and continue the tradition of support.

Please visit the LC tables next Monday thru Thursday from 11 a.m.–1 p.m., or on Wednesday from 5:30 p.m. to 7:30 p.m. to learn more about the gift drive or to make a gift.

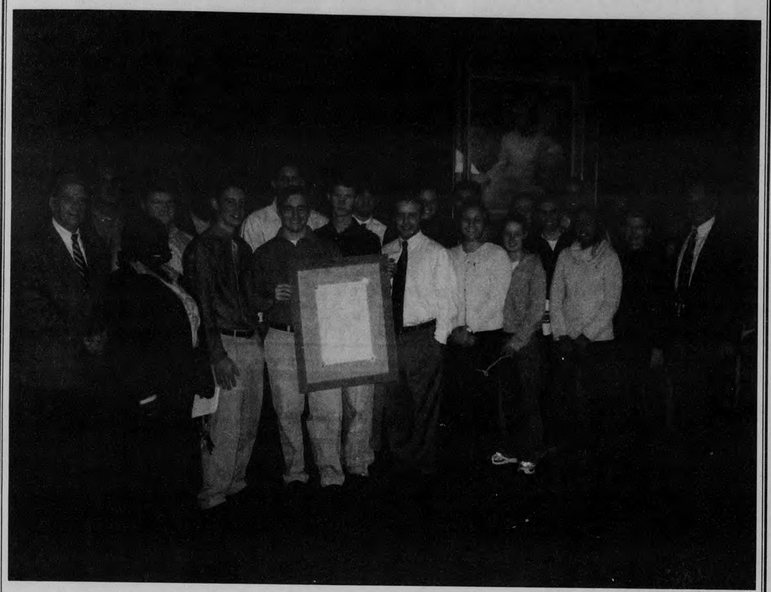
Campus dry for Alcohol Awareness Week



Courtesy of IFC

Fraternity and sorority presidents, the presidents of the Interfraternity and the Panhellenic Councils and several University officials, including University President Steffen Rogers, were on hand last Sunday to recognize the Alcohol Awareness Week Proclamation, deeming the week dry, and continuing the fight against alcohol misuse and abuse.

just wage would be established position by position.

"We have a grossly out-of-date classification system. We want to pay the same amount for the same level of work across the University," Rogers said. "We do not know if we are at that place now, but we want to be sure that we are so that every one feels that they are properly compensated."

With the support of the faculty and the preliminary plan outlined by Rogers in place, Susman is hopeful that the money necessary to support living wage will soon be within the budget of the University. Until then, he and the members of the Bucknell Caucus for Economic Justice (BCEJ) will continue to advocate and publicize living wage on campus.

"I intend to keep the issue alive and I assume the students of BCEJ along with other faculty members will continue to promote the issue," Susman said. "We understand that there may not be money in the budget today, but the numbers presented by President Rogers at the faculty meeting reveal that it might take less money than some believed."

Currently, the administration estimates that the cost of increasing the wage of all casual workers, including Dining Services personnel, to $9 per hour and adjusting the salaries of workers earning more than $9 per hour accordingly will cost about $1.25 million, as opposed to previous estimates that ranged from $4 million to $6 million dollars.

"As I see it, the administration took a large step forward, and with the faculty endorsement calling for the inclusion of Dining Service workers and others, I think the University is moving toward finding the money to implement the $9.00 wage floor," Susman said.

Cavanagh discusses advent of biomedical engineering at University

BIOMED

Cavanagh joined the University in 1999, following the completion of his doctorate from Northwestern University. He earned his bachelor's and master's degrees in biomedical engineering from Northwestern University.

In his second year as a graduate student at Northwestern, Cavanagh was one of five engineering graduate students to be awarded a McCormick School of Engineering and Applied Science Graduate Tutoring position. This provided him with an introduction to undergraduate engineering education.

In addition to conducting research at Northwestern, Cavanagh also carried out some of his doctoral research in the Department of Anesthesia at the University of Pennsylvania. Cavanagh has been working in the lab with graduate and undergraduate students, using both experimental and numerical research techniques. Cavanagh is currently co-director of the Biomedical Engineering program, along with Professor of Biomedical and Mechanical Engineering James Baish.

"We talk a lot at Bucknell about bringing the best and the brightest to the University, and when we say that we talk about students most of the time. In this case however, the Emmitt family has allowed us to bring to the University the best and the brightest in terms of the faculty," Rogers said.

"Professor Dan Cavanagh is an excellent choice as the inaugural holder of the Emmitt Memorial Chair in Biomedical Engineering. His commitment to our students and their education, his commitment to exemplary teaching and learning and his dedication to the new biomedical engineering program and the profession are fully consistent with the finest traditions of the College of Engineering, and our mission," Dean of Engineering James Orbison said. "The College of Engineering welcomes the biomedical engineering program as a valued and integral engineering program in the college."

Approximately 240 people were invited to the lecture, including members of the Emmitt family, members of the University administration and the faculty in the College of Engineering. The lecture was also open to the public.

The evolution of the Biomedical Engineering minor at the University involves the integration of the traditional engineering program and the medical and biology programs to create engineers with medical and biological focuses.

According to Cavanagh, there are about 90 graduate and undergraduate programs across the nation that offer some form of biomedical engineering study programs. There are presently no biomedical engineering programs at undergraduate or non-doctoral colleges and universities like the University's program.

Cavanagh said there are many different reasons for bringing biomedical engineering to the University.

"The fundamental reason for the field is we want to design a better artificial heart; we want to design a better artificial vision system. We want to help people," Cavanagh said.

Orbison believes that the biomedical engineering degree will also serve as another admissions draw for incoming students.

"I believe there have been, in the past, an unknown number of high school students who were interested in a biomedical engineering degree program, and thus did not apply to Bucknell because we were unable to offer that educational option," Orbison said. "I expect our new biomedical engineering program will attract additional applicants to Bucknell who would not have otherwise applied. All indications from other biomedical engineering programs across the country are that these applicants will be highly qualified. This additional program may also enhance the attractiveness of our other programs as well, due to an increase in the comprehensiveness of our educational offerings."

Cavanagh spoke of the integration of the fields of biology, engineering, physics, chemistry and mathematics to create the biomedical engineering focus.

"About 50 to 60 years ago there were the engineers on one side and the biologists and physicians on the other side. Really, the fields were not too integrated. What they started seeing was that an engineer would need help from a biologist, and a biologist would need help from an engineer, so they had to start working together to solve some of these very complex problems. We started to get engineers who have a medical and biological focuses applying the Bucknell engineering skills to the medical problems," Cavanagh said.

There will be three different specialization for the biomedical engineering major, which include biotransport, biomechanics and materials and bioinstrumentation and bioimagry. Next year's class will have a target capacity of approximately 12 students, who will specialize only in biotransport. Presently, there are about 15 students with a biomedical engineering minor.

In the future, when the biomechanics and material and bioinstrumentation and bioimagry specialization are offered for the major, it is expected that approximately 48 students will be a part of the biomedical engineering program at the University.

The primary faculty for the biomedical engineering program include Baish, Cavanagh, Professor of Chemical and Biomedical Engineering William King, as well as a new member. Affiliated faculty include Professor of Biology Mitchell Chernin, Assistant Professor of Electrical Engineering Steven Horner, Assistant Professor of Biology David Penick and Assistant Professor of Chemical Engineering Margot Vigeant.

The requirements for the minor include three courses from a list of biology courses and engineering courses, and students must take the senior-level Capstone course BME-454. The requirements for the major will include this Capstone course, as well as new courses that will be designed at the sophomore-level.

Cavanagh said that students who choose to major in biomedical engineering must be qualified engineers and must have a strong background in a life science.

According to Cavanagh, the lab for the biotransport specialization will be more research-based than in other engineering lab courses. Topics for study in the specialization of biotransport include advanced courses in chemistry, fluid mechanics, heart transport and cellular transport.

"What I really want to do is integrate lecture and lab," Cavanagh said. "This will be a very, very hands-on curriculum. The classes are going to be small because we are not looking to have a very large program, because we want to have a very good relationship with our students."

Cavanagh discussed the many challenges of the biomedical engineering program. He said developing the program in general involved many obstacles that had to be overcome, including having qualified and enough faculty members to fill the requirements, having resources that are proper for biomedical engineering and being able to incorporate all the biomedical engineering course material into a four-year degree. He also said that presently, there are not many college-level textbooks on biomedical engineering, so determining exactly what course material to implement into the courses was another obstacle.

"The other primary challenge is an increased recognition of a degree in biomedical engineering. People in industry are still a little skeptical about it," Cavanagh said. "What they are realizing now is that the integration of both areas would add more assets to that company."

Faculty's decisions have an important impact on University

At this week's faculty meeting, members of the faculty voted in support of two motions: the implementation of a merit aid program and a $9 minimum living wage for casual workers. The various presentations to faculty members by their peers and the administration on both issues, and the thoughtful debate that ensued, are unique to the University.

The University is one of the last Patriot League schools to adapt a merit aid program. Although the faculty's support does not mean that merit aid will immediately be implemented, it does have an impact on the Board of Trustees. The faculty's approval supports the Board of Trustees' previous vote in favor of merit aid. The board will vote on a specific merit aid pilot plan at the end of the month. Again, the faculty's view of merit aid will affect the Board's final decision about merit aid, and therefore have an impact on the University.

The living wage has also been a prevalent issue at the University. For the past three years, many members of the campus community have tried to get an increased wage so that all employees of the University can support their families. Many also feel that the current wages are not sufficient. The $9 wage would benefit Dining Services workers and would be executed as soon as the budget could support it.

Even though the faculty's endorsement of a $9 wage does not have a direct impact on the Board of Trustees, it still influences the campus community. By favoring the new wage, the faculty is supporting all University workers, as well as the local community.

Despite many issues that currently directly affect the faculty, such as faculty evaluations and switching to a 3-2 course load, faculty meetings are largely devoted to improving the atmosphere of the campus community as a whole. This fact was exhibited at the most recent faculty meeting.

The dialogue among the faculty that took place at this faculty meeting and others is unique and does not happen at many universities.

Letters to the editor

Aid should be for everyone

To the Editor:

As the parent of a scholar-athlete who is considering applying to the University, I find it perplexing that only one sport is being considered for merit-aid. In fact, why shouldn't athletes be given the same opportunity as academic-based scholarships or arts awards. I do not think schools should significantly modify their criteria for acceptance for athletes.

When creditable candidates are identified, who meet entrance criteria and are truly gifted, in whatever area, they should be eligible for funding. I have always encouraged need-based scholarships with donations to my alma mater, but outstanding candidates in all areas should also be identified and encouraged to attend. Funding is an incentive.

Other prestigious schools have funds for this purpose, and if the University is to place an importance on academic scholarship, musical and art talents and athletics, then funding should be given and an effort to support it must be launched.

While funding will not be a sole criteria on where my son may apply or attend, it will have an impact. Those prestigious academic schools that support their athletes with funding will have an advantage.

Sincerely,
Howard Solomon, Ph.D

"The Vagina Monologues" should be for women only

To the Editor:

I am a rape survivor. I now devote my life to ending violence against women. I express that commitment in many ways; as a women's self-defense instructor and as a board member of Susquehanna Valley Women in Transition. I am proud to share this commitment with V-Day Bucknell (VDB). I agree wholeheartedly with Val Lam '04 when she says violence against women affects everybody and that ending violence will take everybody. However, I disagree with Eve Ensler and VDB's decision to include a male monologue in the play "The Vagina Monologues" ("TVM").

Because women have often shaped and understood their lives according to norms or preferences of female behavior as expressed by men, there is a sense in which women have not shaped or even known their own experience. "TVM" presents women's experiences as removed from these norms. Women-only projects put women's voices at the center, a rare opportunity in a male dominated society. "TVM" creates a symbolic women's space where women's voices are the focus. That focus has now shifted away from women's voices onto one male voice.

Whether real or symbolic, women-only spaces serve the primary and necessary function of empowering women by encouraging and fostering autonomy. Without autonomy women can never hope to end their oppression and the violence it manifests. There are many ways men can, and should, support women in the struggle to end sexist violence. One important way is for men to respect and encourage women-only ventures.

There is no contradiction between fighting to build independent women's organizations and at the same time recognizing that it is not women alone who will ultimately end patriarchy. Women-only spaces working in conjunction with appropriately focused co-sex organizations is, by far, a more effective means for achieving the equality for, and ending violence against, women than either proposition alone.

There is a set of competing values at work here, both with valid viewpoints. What is being lost is the understanding that values of inclusiveness and breadth of scope can work in tandem with narrowly defined political goals for the purpose of individual events like "TVM." Every attempt should be made to preserve and encourage the rare and empowering women-only space. It serves needs and purposes that can't be duplicated anywhere else. Because men also suffer from prescriptive gender roles, they will only benefit from the deconstruction of those roles through the effects of these spaces.

Sincerely,
Laura Kamienski

Professor evaluations should be made public

By Andrea Dill
Chief Copy Editor

It's the most wonderful time … of the year. No, not the approaching holiday season, I am talking about professor evaluation time. This is a time that should make every Who down in Whoville grin. At the end of every semester, professors hand out a sheet or two on which students can feel free to unleash. What, from the student perspective, seems like a relatively empty event has the potential to be a helpful exercise.

Many schools of evaluation exist. There are those who believe in writing only kind things, which may or may not reflect their professor's actual job performance. You know, people who write that the professor never said anything bad, not mentioning the professor never said anything good, either. These are people who still subscribe to the idea that if you don't have anything nice to say, don't say anything. I have very little patience or tolerance for such glossing over. Unfortunately, I cannot unilaterally squash people's freedom to evaluate as they see fit. The fact that they can justify writing only pleasant things about a bad professor instead of offering constructive criticism is mind-boggling. If not out of self-respect, they should tell the whole truth for the benefit of future students.

Then there are those whose primary goal seems to be capturing as many freebee class minutes as possible. To accomplish this objective, they seem to randomly circle answers, scribble pithy responses and jet out of the classroom shortly thereafter. That is a distracting whir of activity for the third group of people, those who seem to truly care.

This thoughtful bunch writes more than yes or no answers, giving reflective responses to the evaluations' open-ended questions. Obviously, there is a wide spectrum of evaluators. Some students might glide across into another group depending on their partiality or distaste for the professor in question. Generally though, a solid percentage of the class seems to regard evaluations with the seriousness they deserve.

Sadly, I overshoot that fine line. In fact, I am a professor evaluation zealot. Throughout the semester, I plot what to write in the catchall, "Are there any other comments you have to make about either this course or this professor?" section of my evaluation form. My intent is not sinister. I am not out to get professors for the hundreds of pages of reading, cumulative exams and papers they assign. Rather I like a review that reflects the nature of the professor and the course. I am that nerd on the middle-right side of the classroom who sits there scribbling frantically. I am that frenzied fool who writes five times as much as anyone else in the time allotted, so as not to sit after class finishing up my evaluation.

The professors are crafty when administering evaluations. Often, professors distribute evaluations at the end of one of the last days of class. As a result, students have to weigh their desire to join the raging snowball fight on the quad versus their obligation to produce thoughtful evaluations. I doubt the winter wonderland weather is the primary reason why students blow off the evaluations, but perhaps it is a subconscious factor. By the time the first couple of students have stuffed their evaluations into the undersized manila folder, there is often a line of eager evaluators behind them, frothing at the mouth like bookworms awaiting the next "Harry Potter" installment.

Like many people though, I often find myself depressed at the holiday evaluation season, for the Grinch has stolen the results of all the evaluations. The findings should be available to everyone because word-of-mouth estimations and Rate the Profs' sparse entries are not enough. These alternate assessment avenues are helpful, but they likely fail to give an accurate perception of a professor or course due to limited sampling data. The University should make the fruits of my carefully planned and speedily executed evaluation labor accessible, as well as all that my less ardent classmates have to say.

I want statistics, written reviews and even pie charts. Give me empirical data on which to base my course and professor selections. More than anything though, I would like to see which professors are getting holiday bonuses for their hard work and which are getting stockings full of coal. I want proof that my evaluation fervor is worth it.

Over the semesters, professors have emphasized the importance of giving these evaluation forms earnest consideration, and many students have done just that. We should get a tangible return on our evaluation time investment. It is time for the Grinch to embrace the holiday spirit by returning the evaluation results to all of the Whos down in Whoville.

Latin American strategy showing signs of distraction

By Mike Niebauer
Senior Writer

When Plan Colombia was first implemented by the Clinton administration, its goal was to fight drugs by restricting the growing of coca leaves and exportation of pure refined cocaine exported to the United States. Through U.S. monetary aid and military training of Colombian government forces, a foot was to be placed on the neck of drug trafficking in Colombia.

The fact that cocaine production is also a great cash generator for two sides in a three-sided decades-long civil war was just a side issue. The existence and durability of the civil war might just weaken our effort and endanger the efficacy of the entire operation.

The leftist FARC guerrillas and the rightist paramilitary groups have successfully adapted to the Plan Colombia airborne cocaine spraying program by switching from cocaine as a sole funding source. Both combatants have diversified by replacing cocaine to a great degree with a rich new vein of financing by stealing oil and gasoline from a very long and vulnerable Colombian energy pipeline.

Semana, a Colombian centrist news magazine, reports in an October article that "the theft of oil and gasoline by the paramilitary rightists and their leftist enemy FARC guerrillas has become an alternative financing source for Colombia's civil war.

The financing from this theft has begun to rival cocaine in profitability and is making new headaches for the newly-elected conservative President Alvaro Uribe's government. Carlos Castano admits that his right-wing forces will totally substitute gasoline and oil for the cocaine financing they have used in the past. Uribe views the thefts as a national security problem due to its economic and military implications.

This unintended benefit from drug war intervention works to the advantage of the combatants since there is less investment in stolen gasoline than in cocaine production and it generates cash instantly. It costs a mere $182 to install each valve needed to pierce the pipeline and obtain hoses to siphon off the fuel. The process is dangerous but it requires few people and the market is local gas stations. Government authorities estimate that the guerrillas have stolen and sold a total of $73 million in oil and gasoline supplies since 2001.

The financial investment of the drug war is certainly being funneled to purposes not originally intended or openly planned for.

Ironically, this actually lowers the costs of cocaine production. Since gasoline is used extensively in cocaine refining operations, there is a double benefit to all sides except the beleaguered government.

The pipeline has been bombed 933 times in an effort to hurt government income from sale of the precious national resource. Semana magazine states, "Many local residents are helping the leftist FARC in its pipeline dynamiting operations by digging holes around the pipeline at night as the FARC blow the line later with explosives." The United States is forced into assisting in the security of the pipeline in support of the Colombian government.

The U.S. Congress has approved $6 million in aid for this purpose and with $68 million for 2003 in Plan Colombia money this year (yet to be approved) it is hoped to stop the bombing. Impressively, 56 have been arrested this year for gasoline theft compared to two arrests in previous 15 years. Like the longest civil war in Latin America the Colombian fight goes on.

The Bush administration may be showing signs of distraction as the U.S. economy slows. Marcela Sanchez in The Washington Post stated, "The U.S. State Department's budget for anti-drug efforts other than Plan Colombia have been reduced 45 percent to the 2001 levels. Plan Colombia's budget has been increased seven percent but is being diffused to deal with 'terrorism' as well so it translated to another cut in real terms for the drug effort." The terrorism mentioned is the protection of the oil and gas pipeline, troop training and law enforcement efforts in the region as well.

Perhaps the United States has over-promised our Colombian government allies and underestimated their domestic Colombian opposition. Has the Bush administration been distracted by its new international focus and definition of pre-emptive war in the war on terrorism elsewhere?

The financial investment in the drug war is certainly being funneled to purposes that were not originally intended or openly planned for in this deepening involvement.

With no clear concept of an exit strategy in sight and a slowing economy the effort is showing signs of distraction while the mission is growing dangerously complicated and unfocused.

The United States must pay more attention to what our neighbors in Latin America think of us. If Colombia is to be the example of U.S. involvement on the continent, Latin Americans may have their fears of an over involved and interventionist United States in the region once again sadly confirmed.

Third party needed to regain democracy

By Kevin Brown
Staff Writer

While we have been asleep for the last 20 years, corporate America has been awake. They have been pushing and organizing and lobbying, so that now they have put a stranglehold on the Republican as well as the Democratic Party.

But "we, the people" are starting to wake up. We see that our two party system has become saturated and corrupt with the money of corporations; we see the privatization of public assets; we see our environment being polluted; we see lower wages for workers than in the 1970s (inflation adjusted); we see high corporate crime with minimal punishment; we see energy conservation slowing and renewable resources taking a back seat to fossil fuel and nuclear energy and we see our politicians doing nothing about it.

Grass-roots democracy is the basis of the Green Party. Their "Ten Key Values" platform opens with the sentence, "Every human deserves a say in the decisions that affect their lives; no one should be subject to the will of another."

Consider the record of former President Bill Clinton. Under his administration, 10 million people were kicked off of welfare (out of 14 million total recipients) He refused to sign the International Land mine Ban Treaty. He became the first president since Nixon not to force auto makers to improve their mileage per gallon. Clinton expanded corporate welfare programs and let big money and big business dominate his presidency.

The Democratic Party is a shadow of its former self, and has become a Republican Party look alike, so much that at the presidential debates in 2000 former Vice President Al Gore and current President George W. Bush agreed on 37 percent of what was discussed.

Additionally, in 2001 both parties received over $100,000 each from Enron alone. As Robert Reich, former Secretary of Labor under Clinton, put it, "The Democratic Party is stone dead. Dead as a doornail." The two-party system has molded itself into one, the Dem-Rep Party. Now there is room for another, a "third" party, to answer the call of the masses and work toward meeting the needs of "we, the people" not the needs of "we, the rich and powerful."

Grass-roots democracy is the basis of the Green Party. Their "Ten Key Values" platform opens with the sentence, "Every human deserves a say in the decisions that affect their lives; no one should be subject to the will of another."

The Greens only accept donations for their campaigns from individuals, never corporations, so they remain free from being slaves to a corporate government. I use the Green Party as an example just because it is the one I am most familiar with, but there are many parties in the United States that fall all over the ideological spectrum. If you are a person who is looking for change in the way politics is run in this country, then look seriously into third party candidates. This option allows you to not only vote for a person whose ideology you believe in, but also to show current officials that if they want your vote, they will have to work for it by acting in your best interests.

Our political parties have grown tired and are unable to meet people's needs. Last Tuesday, instead of voting for a candidate who takes you for granted and is simply using you to serve its corporate master and further the "democracy gap," you could have voted for an alternative candidate. One that is striving, without corporate money or influence, to address issues that concern all Americans, not just the rich and powerful. As Louis Brandies, Supreme Court Justice once said, "We can have a democratic society or we can have great concentrated wealth in the hands of the few. We cannot have both."

Conservatives Club's attention-getting mechansims similar to Eminem

By Jacksy Jiang
Writer

"May I have your attention please! May I have your attention please! Will the real Slim Shady please stand up?" The University, full of intelligent and sophisticated students, could learn from Eminem.

For a month now, students have been leading discussions about free speech and the war on Iraq, among other topics.

Some people even went to the dean and their parents to complain about "The Counterweight." What a wonderful scene! It seems that the University is having an "intellectual war"—much credit is lent to the Conservatives Club (BUCC).

Now let us bring up our old friend Eminem, whose attention-getting mechanism consists of promoting violence and sexism or bashing gays and women. Yet, people do not hate Eminem even if they find offense in his songs, because they know that he says such remarks not for the purpose of making arguments.

On the contrary, people like him because they find him funny, different, cool and rhythmic.

The Conservatives Club is brilliant—instead of popularizing and establishing themselves as a strong group on campus, they achieve this "popularity" by drawing reactions. Everybody on campus knows about the them, and even now I imagine the group is celebrating its "attention drawing" success.

By the same token, just because people like him does not mean that they necessarily agree with the radical, obscene or offensive lyrics.

The BUCC does something quite similar. They make strange, somewhat illogical, radical and offensive arguments, not for the sake of arguing, but purely for the sake of drawing attention.

They are brilliant—instead of popularizing and establishing themselves as a strong group on campus, they achieve this "popularity" by drawing reactions. Everybody on campus knows about the BUCC, and even now I imagine the group is celebrating its "attention drawing" success.

Is it necessary to expend so much time and energy on writing articles or counter-arguments (or going to the dean of students) to fight against them? I do not really think so.

Attention is what they want, and attention is what they are getting—they wanted a reaction, and we gave it to them.

In my point of view, until the BUCC sets forth a logically consistent argument or contributes to the intellectual discourse on this campus, why bother to argue with them? The best thing to do is to ignore them.

Simply reacting to the group's absurd arguments is fueling the fire of controversy and discord on this campus.

If the BUCC irritates you, why not just ignore it? On the other hand, if it is a source of comic relief, or if you appreciate its humor, then stand up, give them your attention, laugh and be the "real Slim Shady."

United we spend?

Nov. 29, 2002 is "Buy Nothing Day," the first stirrings of a prophetic "no."

Since its launch in the Pacific Northwest 11 years ago, "Buy Nothing Day" has grown into a worldwide celebration of consumer awareness and simple living. Observed on the day after Thanksgiving, America's busiest shopping day of the year, the campaign has sparked debate, radio talk shows, television news items and newspaper headlines around the world.

On this unofficial opening day of the Christmas shopping frenzy, millions of glassy-eyed consumers flock to department stores and malls, as predictable as pistons, pumping billions of dollars into the economy.

What sort of explanation could one offer for this trend? Is this phenomenon really so surprising for a culture so dependent on the machinery of corporations and the advertisement industry?

Look around you—everywhere your eyes could possibly come to rest is filled with some sort of corporate message, logo, deliberately misleading and lyrical advertisement campaigns. They are on T-shirts, on cars and blimps, on buildings and pencils, in movies and on television, magazines and newspapers, playing on your deepest thoughts and emotions in order to convince you that you need some product. Indeed this advertising culture is impossible to escape. And like a powerful narcotic, these heavily manipulative corporate messages and images define our mental environment as a fictitious and imaginative unreality.

Yet Americans have not quite woken up to the absurdity of it all!

We are trained to value abundance above all else, and the repercussions of such over-consumption, wastefulness and recklessness are admittedly Earth-shattering and mind warping. Stuck in the cold iron treads of a mindless machine, the human spirit, prideful contrariness and fierce independence have been oddly tamed, commodified and marketed. American consumers value little of the simplicities of everyday life.

Surely there is more to life than being a consumer!

The monkey wrenchers of the Ruckus Society, a California-based direct-action group, dropped a boxcar-sized banner ridiculing over-consumption smack in the middle of the Mall of America. Other more restrained types created and distributed the Gift Exemption Voucher—a polite way of saying, "Let's not get each other anything this year, out of principle." In Seattle, helpful Buy Nothing Day celebrants offered a free-of-charge credit-card cutting service outside a downtown mall.

Spend time with family and friends, rather than money on them, was the message. Wouldn't you rather spend time with the ones you love instead of standing in line waiting for your "soma" fix? Yes, it is cliché, but are the things of most worth pursuing not love, ritual, freedom? These are the things no one can buy, and these things have more value than any product of any corporation.

"Buy Nothing Day" on Nov. 29 will challenge you to step out of the consumer stream for a mere 24 hours, if for nothing else as a personal experiment and a public statement; to deny the inane compulsion to define yourself by the "things" that surround you.

The shining hope for a revolution in human consciousness lies in the actions of everyday people—indeed it is the revolution of everyday life.

Alcohol awareness week fails to raise awareness

By Tom Elliott
Senior Writer

As a senior, I have now seen four alcohol awareness weeks come and go. Each time I anticipate the week with great hope, excited to learn more about alcohol. Yet every single time, I don't learn a damn thing. Alcohol awareness week is, in fact, a huge misnomer.

As a senior, I have now seen four alcohol awareness weeks come and go. Each time I anticipate the week with great hope, excited to learn more about alcohol. Yet every single time, I don't learn a damn thing. Alcohol awareness week is, in fact, a huge misnomer.

Indeed, it would be amazing to learn more about something that so many college students have such a passion for. Yet, instead, this fun-sounding week is plagued with endless horror stories about people drinking and driving, and other forms of reckless drunkenness. As Dean of Students Richard Ferraro loves to point out, there is so much more to alcohol than using it to get drunk.

Wouldn't it be nice if this week had events like a wine tasting class? Our university is supposed to be filled with budding intellectuals. So how, might I ask, are we supposed to be intellectuals if we are not properly skilled in wine tasting? If I were to receive an invitation for dinner at some young woman's home, who happens to be the daughter of an aristocrat, I would certainly be uncomfortable once the discussion turns to pocket watches and the distinctive suppleness of the merlot.

It would be a decidedly useful thing to learn what type of wine to serve with a particular meal. I wish I had a nickel every time I've wondered whether penne al vodka should be served with white or red? I don't have a clue. I would probably buy a box of Franzia. Instead, we have a non-alcoholic karaoke event at Uptown. Not only does this fail to raise awareness, but doesn't everyone know there's no such thing as non-alcoholic karaoke.

In the spirit of multiculturism, wouldn't it have been nice if there was an event this week where people of varying ethnic backgrounds educate us to the preferred drink of their culture? It seems every country has a drink that's special to their heritage.

For example, Sangria for the Spanish, Ales for the English, Sake for the Japanese, Tequila and its various drinks for Mexico, the Russians could bring Stoli and other vodkas, Chianti for Italy, Ouzo for Greece, Schnapps for Austria, Pilsner Urquell for the Czechs and various wines for France. This very limited list goes to show that I have a lot to learn.

Wouldn't it be nice to have an event where people shared their expertise with different drinking games? There is simply so much to learn: Beer pong is played differently on every campus it's played, there are dozens of different versions of quarters as well as card-oriented drinking games and maybe some alumni can pass on old classics like Whale's Tails. After all, college students always appreciate learning new ways to "binge drink."

To some it may be surprising that in a recent study published in The Onion, it was revealed that binge drinking was actually often an agreeable thing. In part it read, "Data collected at bars and fraternity parties on the UMass campus has yielded unexpected conclusions with regard to the practice of binge drinking," study head Dr. Albert Greaves said. "Over the course of our research, a consistent pattern emerged demonstrating that binge drinking seriously kicks ass."

So while I have read the posterboards taped in the Langone Center with stories of idiots who have done stupid things, I have yet to learn the proper glass in which to serve a Manhattan. Quite frankly, I was shocked by the demonstration behind the stadium in which it was revealed that intoxication impairs your driving. Drinking and driving is unsafe?! Next thing I know, they'll try to make me aware that unfiltered cigarettes are unhealthy. I could go on, but I think I need a drink.

Republicans take control of the Senate

Following the GOP's victory over Democrats, for first time in decades, a Republican president is backed by a Republican majority in House and Senate

By Jim Leahy
Senior Writer

Americans went to the polls on Tuesday to change the direction of the nation and voice their opinions on how the current administration and Congress runs the country on a daily basis. All votes have been counted—well, almost all of them—and the people have spoken. So, what happened on Tuesday?

The Republicans won. Big. The GOP took back control of the Senate, gained seats in the House of Representatives and is projected to maintain the majority of governor's mansions, all in a midterm election.

Many of the key races were won in shocking fashion and Republicans are now preparing to begin their legislative agenda. The following results were as of Wednesday morning.

In Pennsylvania, the races were all but surprising. Democrat Ed Rendell, former mayor of Philadelphia, won a sweeping victory over his Republican challenger Mike Fisher. Rendell won the state by a comfortable 9 percent margin, in a race that was basically decided months ago.

Union County voted widely in favor of Fisher, with 64 percent voting for the Republican and only 33 percent voting for Rendell, according to www.unionco.org.

The local member of the House of Representatives, Republican Don Sherwood, won 91 percent of the votes from this area. University Director of Student Health Services Dr. Don Stechschulte ran as a write-in candidate and his results were not available. For state assembly, Republican Russ Fairchild easily defeated the Green Party candidate by gaining just under 90 percent of the vote, www.unionco.org reported.

There were some very interesting gubernatorial races around the nation. In New York, where the Democrats pleaded with Independent Tom Golisano to leave the race and throw his support to their candidate, H. Carl McCall, incumbent Republican George Pataki defeated McCall by a 16 percent margin.

The Democratic National Committee tapped the Florida race as the one most desired. In the end, Republican incumbent Jeb Bush defeated the challenge of Bill McBride by a 13 percent margin. The most surprising outcome was the victory of Republican Robert Ehrlich Jr., who defeated Democrat Kathleen Kennedy Townsend in a race that sends the first Republican to the Maryland governor's office since Spiro Agnew in 1966, according to The Washington Post.

The governor races were mixed, with the Democrats winning states like Michigan, Pennsylvania and Illinois.

Republicans were able to win Massachusetts, Florida, Maryland and Georgia. Despite some Democratic gains, the Republicans were also able to maintain their majority, The Washington Post reported.

Courtesy of Reuters

Florida Gov. Jeb Bush celebrates his victory over Democratic challenger Bill McBride in Tuesday's elections. After a tight race between Democrats and Republicans across the country, Tuesday's election resulted in GOP control of the Senate, as well as the acquisition of important seats in House of Representatives and other political positions at the state level.

Republican Elizabeth Dole defeated Erskine Bowles in North Carolina by 9 percent; Republican John Sununu defeated Democratic Gov. Jeanne Shaheen in New Hampshire by a 3 percent margin.

Republican John Cornyn of Texas defeated Democrat Ron Kirk by 12 percent, and Democrat Mark Pryor of Arkansas defeated incumbent Republican Tim Hutchinson by an 8 percent margin, The Washington Post reported.

There are still two outstanding Senate races—South Dakota and Louisiana. In South Dakota, there will most likely be a mandatory recount. With 100 percent of voting precincts reporting their results, Democratic incumbent Tim Johnson holds a lead of only about 500 votes out of about 335,000 cast, according to The Washington Post. This is a big race because it is seen as an informal poll on the job that the other senator from South Dakota, Tom Daschle, is doing.

In Louisiana, incumbent Democrat Mary Landrieu and Republican challenger Suzanne Haik Terrell will have a runoff election on Dec. 7 to decide who wins. This stems from the type of election that Louisiana runs on Election Day. All candidates are put on a single ballot and a candidate winning a majority of the vote is elected. If a candidate wins less than 50 percent (Landrieu won about 46 percent), the top two candidates participate in a runoff, The Washington Post reported.

Many believe that the Republicans will be able to advance their agenda now that they hold control of not only Congress but also the presidency.

Bush now has a Congress that will work with him and he will have much more freedom in creating policy. Many questioned his tactic of spending so much time on the campaign trail. It now looks like he made the right move.

Americans spoke on Tuesday and their voice was united behind the President. Republicans received more support, bucking the historical trend that has the party of the president losing seats in a midterm election.

The next two years promise to be important, and the 2004 presidential election will receive great attention, especially if the Republicans fail to deliver on their campaign promises.

Congress was much more interesting and the site of important history.

"We have to underscore what has happened in terms of American history. I have been checking. The last time a Republican president won seats in the Senate and the House in a midterm election—Theodore Roosevelt, 100 years ago. That is extraordinary," Tim Russert said on MSNBC.com.

The House was the scene of many interesting races. With control of the Senate in such a narrow range, it was the focus of this election.

According to The Washington Post, in Missouri, Republican Jim Talent beat Democrat Jean Carnahan by about 24,000 votes (1 percent) in a special election to replace the appointee who took her husband's Senate seat. Democrat Mel Carnahan was killed just weeks before his election and posthumously defeated current Attorney General John Ashcroft.

In Minnesota's election, another race affected by a candidate's death, Republican Norm Coleman defeated former Vice President Walter Mondale by about 43,000 votes (2 percent), after Mondale replaced the late Sen. Paul Wellstone on the ballot. Democrat Frank Lautenberg defeated Republican Doug Forrester in New Jersey by 10 percent after replacing embattled Republican Sen. Robert Torricelli on the ballot just weeks before the election.

Sharon calls for general elections in response to tensions in Parliament

By David LaRoss
Staff Writer

The long-running dispute within Israel's current government has proven fatal, as the left-leaning Labor Party, which was partnered with Prime Minister Ariel Sharon's conservative Likud Party to form a majority coalition, quit the government on Oct. 31. Its members abandoned all of their appointed posts in the Cabinet and withdrew their legislative support for Sharon.

Sharon has now called for the next general election to be held in three months, effectively dissolving the government.

The two parties had been engaged in a low-level power struggle for months when the argument over funding for settlements on occupied land finally caused the split.

The union between Labor and Likud had long been acknowledged as an alliance of convenience, designed to combat the Palestinian nationalist movement. It is no surprise that it fragmented over a relatively minor issue.

This does not make the loss any less drastic because it left Sharon with the support of only 55 of the 120 members of Parliament and five empty cabinet positions. Sharon managed to survive three motions for votes of no confidence brought on Nov. 5. Had any of the three succeeded, he would have been forced to hold new elections within 90 days and step down as prime minister if he could not assemble another majority coalition in Parliament after those elections.

Sharon was confident that he would survive the crisis.

"I believe I will have to lead this nation for several years to give answers and solutions to the issue of security, the issue of the political process, the economy," he said.

This turns out to have been a moot point because on Tuesday, Sharon voluntarily called for new elections, setting an expected date of Jan. 28, 2003.

This announcement followed Sharon's effort to assemble a new coalition with more right-wing groups, in particular the National Union-Yisrael Beitenu, whose seven parliamentary votes would have given the prime minister a slim majority.

According to ABC News, Palestinians voiced concern over the prospect of a Sharon government composed entirely of right-wing elements. The previous coalition had a reputation for taking a general hard line against Palestinians, and they fear that Israeli military action will escalate with a solidly conservative group in power.

Sharon assured the U.S. government that Israel's policies would remain constant, but right-wing groups demanded that Sharon refuse some of U.S. President George W. Bush's goals for the area—notably the creation of a Palestinian state—if they were to join the coalition. According to CNN, Sharon found these demands unacceptable and broke off negotiations entirely, deciding instead to call new elections.

"We hope the Israeli people will elect a government that can deliver peace," said Cabinet Minister Saeb Ereket in an Associated Press article.

The Parliament was not Sharon's only concern—the withdrawal of Labor ministers from government has left important posts vacant. Among those who have been tapped to fill the void is former Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu, who accepted the post of foreign minister on four conditions.

First, Netanyahu wants agreement on whether to exile Palestinian leader Yasir Arafat, a divisive issue in Israeli politics. Netanyahu and Sharon agree that Israel should exile Arafat. Second, he wants agreement on whether Israel should work towards the creation of a separate Palestinian state. Sharon favors the idea, while Netanyahu opposes it. The third issue is the location of a new fence along the border of the disputed West Bank territory.

Finally, Netanyahu demanded that Sharon call a general election within a few months, a demand that has been met. While Netanyahu will serve as foreign minister until a new government is formed, he will run against Sharon for the Likud Party leadership in primary elections and may recover the position of prime minister if he succeeds.

Gov. Ventura and Dean Barkley speak to media in St. Paul. On Tuesday, Ventura appointed Barkley as the senatorial replacement for the late Paul Wellstone.

By Michael Dudzinski
Staff Writer

A blow to Senate Democrats, Gov. Jesse Ventura, I-Minn., appointed a fellow Independent Party leader as interim senator, following the tragic death of the late liberal Sen. Paul Wellstone.

The former wrestling star chose his former campaign manager, Dean Barkley, as a suitable replacement. As if the tension between the Democrat and Republican leaders was not stark enough, the decision continued the existence of an evenly split Senate.

Prior to Wellstone's death, Senate Democrats held a slight advantage with a 50-49 majority following Sen. Jim Jefford's, I-Vt., disaffiliation from the Republican Party last year. Gov. Ventura's decision resulted in the Senate being once again split, yet this time with 49 seats apiece. According to CNN, the quest for majority status within the Senate affirms the highly influential role of third party leaders in American politics.

When questioned by The New York Times about his main objective as senator, Barkley said, "as much mischief as I can."

His statement is far from the truth. His neutral stance towards the two major parties further implicates the fate of Homeland Security legislation and various appropriations measures, which was emphasized by The New York Times.

MSNBC points out that the Independent senator undermines the significance of his colleague, Jim Jeffords, to the Democratic Party. The Barkley vote has suddenly emerged as invaluable to the Democrats if they wish to maintain a slight edge. Unlike Jeffords, who almost always votes with Democrats, Barkley may not be as promising to the Democratic agenda.

Although the duration of Barkley's interim status is unknown, the decisive swing vote may revive the lost momentum of the Republican Party. When party-backed legislation is brought to the floor in a split Senate, the Barkley vote would prompt Vice President Dick Cheney to break the tie in favor of the Republicans. CNN cited Cheney's importance as a tiebreaker prior to Jefford's disaffiliation from the Republican Party.

Under Minnesota state law, the interim senator is only to serve until the election results are certified on Nov. 19. At that time, the victorious candidate would be sworn in as senator, replacing his late predecessor. CNN explained that Senate rules take precedence over state law, which would permit Barkley to serve until January.

Ventura hinted it is highly probable that this would be the case. If so, it will provide the Republican Party with an incentive to bounce back over the next couple of months if it can effectively win the Barkley vote.

Ventura signaled that he would appoint a suitable replacement for Wellstone, suggesting the appointment of another Democrat.

When memorial services turned partisan, the governor angrily criticized Democrat and Republican leaders, according to MSNBC. To express his disdain for party politics, Ventura had decided it would be appropriate to select an independent candidate.

As a result of Tuesday's elections, the GOP has once again regained control of the Senate. The appointment of Barkley is an added bonus to the Republican Party.

It is now possible for Senate Republicans to get an early boost even before their takeover in January.

The Republican victory may entice Barkley to back the agenda of the upcoming majority party. Analysts point out he can make or break the Republican Party's momentum before the end of his interim term.

Getting involved on Election Day

Student shares how she participated in Tuesday's election

By Michelle Johnson
Writer

What were you doing on Nov. 5? Most University students were probably attending classes, studying, hanging out with their friends, doing laundry or running around completing errands. Some people may even be wondering about the significance of that date. This is not a surprising phenomenon since we live in the "bubble" and sometimes go an entire week, if not more, without watching the news. For those of you who don't know where I am going with this, Nov. 5 was Election Day. Voters of all ages flocked to the polls this year to make some critical choices.

Political Perspective

This was an important election for both major political parties in the United States. Democrats were scrambling to maintain their narrow majority in the Senate and many were optimistic that this would be the year they could take back the House as well. Republicans were fighting for a sweep of both houses of Congress. Add to this a few volatile gubernatorial races and you end up with one of the most interesting Election Days in recent years.

All this is occurring on such a large scale, that sometimes one person can become a little overwhelmed. How can I make a difference? This question was on the mind of many concerned and civic-minded Americans in the days leading up to Nov. 5. For some people the answer is to not vote, but for others, it is to find a candidate they believe in and possibly engage in grass roots political activity. This can range from petitions and protests to "get out the vote" actions like campaigning. This year I was able to participate in just such an activity when several University students traveled to southern Pennsylvania to campaign for Democrat Jim Maza, a candidate for senator in the state General Assembly.

My day started out at 8 a.m. when we left the University to make the two-hour drive to Maza headquarters in Souderton, where we received instructions about where to go. Two other University students and I were assigned to a church in Lansdale, where we handed out literature about Maza, Joe Hoeffel, a U.S. Congressional candidate from the Democratic Party; and Ed Rendell, the Democratic candidate for Pennsylvania governor. Most people at least took the pamphlets that we handed them. There were some people who refused and there were even some that were mildly rude about it. But in the end, it was a great way to feel that you were making a difference and educating people about their voting options.

During the course of the day, I worked at three different polling places. I met a few interesting people, including those who were campaigning for the opposition. We talked to a sweet elderly woman about why had she switched over from running for mayor on the Democratic ticket to being a staunch Republican supporter. Despite having to stand in the cold for about nine hours, I felt good as we headed back to the University. I had gained the invaluable experience of working on a political campaign. I got to interact with different people from different places and hear about what was important to them.

Working at this level of politics goes beyond just voting. You are not only focusing on what you believe, but instead are trying to convey your beliefs to others because you feel that they might be beneficial to potential voters.

For those who feel that their vote is just part of some undistinguishable aggregate that has no real impact, political participation outside of the voting booth offers immediate satisfaction and a gratifying feeling that they are actually making an impact in a tangible way. It enables people, especially those who are considering careers in the government, to see first-hand the inner workings of the system. Personal benefits can include résumé building, travel experience and in many cases a little extra spending money as most candidates are willing to pay campaign workers for their efforts. I would highly recommend students here and at every college find a candidate in whom they believe and work to get them elected.

Out of the three candidates we had on our ticket in the Souderton area, two of them were successful. Rendell was elected the next governor of Pennsylvania with a 53 percent to 45 percent victory over Republican candidate Mike Fisher according to CNN. Hoeffel also defeated his Republican opponent, Melissa Brown, in a 51 percent to 47 percent win.

As for the candidate for who we were specifically campaigning, Maza, unofficial poles had him losing to the Republican candidate Rob Wonderling in a 60 percent to 40 percent margin. Even though this was particularly disappointing due to the time and effort that had been expended, I learned that it is not really about winning or losing. It is about standing up for what you feel is right and not being discouraged by the setbacks that will inevitably occur along the way.

Men's soccer gains 2-0 home victory over Navy

After a 1-0 loss to Lafayette, the Bison's postseason fate in the Patriot League is now out of their own hands

By Tara Utchel
Senior Writer

The men's soccer team rebounded with a powerful 2-0 victory over Navy on Oct. 30 after losing to Lafayette 1-0 on Wednesday. Bucknell still has a chance to make postseason play, but the loss to Lafayette took the Bison's fate out of their hands. A playoff berth now depends on the results of other league games.

"It would great to find a way of getting into the playoffs," Mike Lookingland '05 said. "It can happen, and I think it will give us another chance to show what our program is made of, and maybe get into the NCAAs and start to make a name for ourselves."

Bucknell did not allow the loss to Lafayette to affect them. The players held their heads high as they played Navy last Sunday. Christopher Beekman '05 scored the first goal of the game in the 21st minute. Nick Taylor '03 tore through the center midfield and drove in a crisp pass to Eric Brunton '06.

From the left corner of the field, Brunton crossed a lofted ball over the outreached hands of the Midshipmen's keeper. Beekman leaped from the 4-yard line and headed the ball into the top right corner of the net.

"Against Navy, we finally started putting ourselves in a position to score goals. We took half-chances in hope to get a rebound," Tom Ryan '03 said. "In other games, such as Lafayette, it seemed that we waited for the perfect shot. So before the Navy game, we really practiced on our offense and fortunately it paid off."

Dennis DeLuca '05 earned the second and final goal of the game. DeLuca received a pass from Ori Adrabi '05 and ripped a shot from 40 yards out.

"It was the prettiest goal I have seen since I have been here," Lookingland said." The keeper had no chance of even coming close to making the save. In fact, no one could have saved that shot at the speed it was traveling."

"They laid it all on the line against Navy. It was our first 90-minute game on both sides of the ball this season," Head Coach Brendan Nash said. "We attacked throughout the game and created many good scoring chances. When Navy did attack, we did a very good job of preventing them good shots on goal."

The 2-0 win over Navy put the 2002 team in the record books for a variety of accomplishments. Bucknell captured its ninth shutout of the season. The team is only one shutout shy of tying the program's record. Adam Edwards '06 has played in goal for all nine of those games. Taylor, with his 12th career assist, tied for 10th on Bucknell's all-time top 10 list.

"Nick Taylor is outstanding every game he plays," Nash said.

Bucknell, with its 12th win, tied the school record for the number of wins in a season. The Bison have two remaining games and have a chance to beat that record.

Last Wednesday, the team played well against Lafayette, but took a loss to the Patriot League foe.

The men's soccer team did not allow its loss against Lafayette to affect them. The Bison play Army this weekend.

"We played hard and Lafayette played hard. We knew it was going to be a 1-0 game, it was just a matter of who made the most of their chances," Nash said.

Despite the poor field conditions caused by a constant fall of sleet and the near-freezing temperatures, the Bison managed to showcase their talents as a team. The offense failed to seal the deal by not putting the ball in the net.

> —Head Coach Brendan Nash

The second half did not measure up to the team's first-half performance.

"The main setback in the Lafayette game was that we came out flat in the second half and they just pounced on every 50-50 ball and just seemed to outwork us in that half," Lookingland said. "I thought we dominated the first, but it was reversed in the second half. We could of played with a little more urgency, I think."

Lafayette managed to break the game's scoreless streak with a goal in the 73rd minute. The Orange and Blue could not retaliate with a tying goal. The score remained 1-0 for the rest of the game.

"Right after the game the team did not respond well," Coach Nash said. "We have had some tough breaks and the team did not handle the officials, the opponent or the loss very well. Once we got back to practice, the team got back on track for our remaining games."

The Bison will be back in action when they play Army at home on Sunday.

"Even though our fate of the tournament is not in our hands, we still feel that we should win the next two games," Ryan said. "Army will be a special game because it is a league game and because it is the last time the seniors will play on our home field. Overall, we are very excited about the games to prove to ourselves and our fans that we are one of the best Bucknell men's soccer teams ever."

The match on Sunday against Army is a special day, not only because it is Homecoming Weekend, but because it is the last time the Bucknell community will have a chance to see the 2002 team and its seniors play in Lewisburg. Kickoff is at 2 p.m. on West Fields.

Bison drop fourth straight

Bucknell turnovers proved to be too much to overcome, as the Holy Cross Crusaders turned three first quarter turnovers into 24 first quarter points, and went on to beat the Bison 38-21 last Saturday in Worcester, Mass.

The momentum was against the Bison from the get-go. Two plays after receiving the opening kickoff, quarterback Cole Ciesnolevicz '05 was hit in the back field and fumbled the ball. Holy Cross recovered on the Bucknell 23-yard line. Four plays later, the Crusaders connected on a 1-yard touchdown pass to take an early 7-0 lead.

On the ensuing Bucknell possession, Ciesnolevicz was intercepted at the Bison 26-yard line. The Bucknell defense was able to hold the Crusaders to a field goal, like they have done so many times this year. The Crusaders knocked in the 35-yard field goal to make the score 10-0 with 8 minutes, 55 seconds to play in the first quarter.

Bucknell scored all of its points in the second half, as Todd Wenrich (above) threw a 4-yard touchdown pass and ran 2 yards for a score.

The Bison offense could not get the ball moving on their next possession, and had to punt. Three plays later, the Crusaders connected on a 32-yard touchdown pass to make the Bison deficit 17 points midway through the first period.

Two Bucknell possessions later, the Bison were stuck deep in their own red zone. The Bison punt attempt was blocked, and returned five yards for a Holy Cross touchdown to make the score 24-0 at the end of the first quarter.

Things did not improve too much for the Bison in the second quarter. After forcing the Crusaders to punt on the first drive of the period, Ciesnolevicz was intercepted for the second time, and the interception was returned 22 yards to the Holy Cross 48-yard line. The Crusaders were able to put together their first impressive drive of the game, moving the ball 52 yards on 10 plays. The scoring drive was capped off by an 18-yard touchdown pass to make the score 31-0.

"It was turnovers and mistakes that caused the problems in the first half," Head Coach Dave Kotulski said.

After taking a 31-0 deficit into the locker room at halftime, the second half did not start in Bucknell's favor.

Bison defeat Navy Midshipmen 3-1 but fall to American

By Brent Butler
Sports Editor

The Bison Volleyball squad fell 3-1 to Patriot League foe American University last Saturday. American has been at the top of the Patriot League for the past couple of years and has proved difficult to beat in the past.

"Heading into the American game we were pretty pumped up because the last time we faced them it was a really good match," Chelsea Anderson '06 said. "We really held our own last time we played them."

"As we got into the match, the first two games didn't go the way we wanted them to. American was playing really well, and we just didn't have the emotion and didn't play with any heart," Anderson said. Bucknell fell in the first two games, 30-11 and 30-15.

"After the first two games, we went into the locker room and realized that we had to pick up our game and play like we know we can. We came out in the third game and played much better and beat them," Anderson said.

After intermission the Bison came out as a different team, avenging the first two games losses, beating American 30-28. In the final game of the match the Orange and Blue fought valiantly, falling short at the end, to lose by a close 30-27.

Melanie Ghiz '03 (above) marked team-high 14 kills for the evening. The Bison lost to American.

"We definitely picked up the momentum and were happy with our play in the last two games. If we would have started the match the way we played in the third game, we definitely would have beaten them," Anderson said.

"We showed a poor offensive and defensive production, but continued to battle throughout the match," Head Coach Cindy Opalski said. "We beat ourselves with many unforced errors."

Melanie Ghiz '03 led the team with 14 kills on the night. Breean Trapasso '04 added 40 assists to the Bison effort, while Jennifer Wrigley '03 and Chelsea Anderson '06 tallied 10 digs each during the match.

Blamah Sarnor '06 runs with the ball at Saturday's game against Holy Cross. The Bison lost 38-21.

After receiving the kickoff to open the half, the Bison looked as though they were putting together a solid drive when Ciesnolevicz was intercepted for the third time.

Two plays later, Stephane Pluviose '04 picked off a Crusader pass and returned it 19 yards to the Holy Cross 11-yard line. Seven plays later, Raphael Darrington '05 ran the ball in from four yards out to put the Bison on the scoreboard at 31-7.

The Bison looked as though they were driving in for another score to begin the fourth quarter, but Ciesnolevicz was hit in the back field, and fumbled the ball. The Crusaders recovered and returned the ball 33 yards to the Bucknell 35-yard line. The Crusaders, connecting on a 1-yard touchdown pass 10 plays later, made the score 38-7 with 9:57 remaining in the game.

On the ensuing Bucknell drive, Ciesnolevicz was intercepted again, but the Bison defense was able to force a fumble two plays later, recovering the ball at the Holy Cross 33-yard line.

On the next drive, Todd Wenrich '03 replaced Ciesnolevicz at quarterback and completed three out of his four passes on his first drive, including an 8-yard strike to Jim Horan '03 for a touchdown. The Bison trailed 38-14 with 6:49 to play.

On the last Bison possession of the game, Wenrich led his team down the field, and capped off the 13-play, 74-yard scoring drive with a 2-yard touchdown run of his own. The Bison lost their fourth straight game 38-21.

Even though this game seemed as though it was very one-sided, while the Bison actually outplayed the Crusaders according to statistics, they could not overcome the five turnovers. The Bison were still not happy with how they played.

"We didn't do our job keeping the other team out of the end zone," Pluviose said. "We are just not making the plays, and the other teams are."

The Bison were somewhat satisfied with their effort in the second half, even though it was not enough to pull out the game.

"We fought through the second half. The players decided they were going to keep on playing," Kotulski said.

Bucknell looks to turn their season around when they host Lafayette College for Homecoming Weekend this Saturday at Christy Mathewson-Memorial Stadium.

"We need to come out with a different mentality to stop teams no matter what the situation is," Pluviose said.

Johnston wins Patriot League X-C title

Bryan Johnston '03 poises himself to take the lead from American rivals. Johnston stayed near or on the pace throughout the 8,000-meter race before drawing away to a dominating 8-second victory.

Bryan Johnston '03 put on a dominating show to win the men's individual title at the Patriot League Cross Country Championships held at West Point on Saturday. His performance led the men to a 3rd-place finish, while the women's team finished 2nd in an intense race that was lost by a single point.

The women's race broke early with Samia Akbar from American University taking it out hard. The rest of the field quickly strung out. Theresa Dennis '03 moved into 2nd place and was able to hold the position to finish 48 seconds back to lead the Bison.

"Three or four of us ran together for the first 1,000 meters, then Samira took it hard up the ski hill. I wish I would have won, but I let her go too early," Dennis said.

American had a strong advantage early on, but the Bison held tough and worked up through the field, closing the gap. Niki Piper '03 ran perhaps her best race of the season finishing in 6th place.

Alison Cole '06 moved up nicely to finish in 8th. The meet was so close that it took several minutes for the release of the official score, which came out in a one-point favor of American (42-43).

Dennis, Piper and Cole each earned 1st team all-league status for their performances while Katie Pfeifer '05, Jamie Gow '06 and Kayla Halloron '06 earned 2nd team All-league for their top 20 finishes.

The men didn't fare quite as well as the ladies, finishing with 82 points in a distant 3rd place to No. 28 American and No. 46 Army. Almost the entire field was together through two miles. Slowly the lead pack dwindled and Johnston was the sole Bison in a mix of four American runners, a couple cadets and a few others.

Courtesy of the cross country team

Rachel Tutmaher '06 leads a charge of Bison runners, from right to left, Jamie Gow '06, Jen Malcolm '04, Megan Schollenberger '06 and Nichole Lynn '03. The team ran well, falling short a mere point.

As planned, Johnston made his move with about 1,500 meters to go. He quickly put a gap between himself and the rest of the lead pack, finishing eight seconds ahead of second place in a course record time of 25:43.

American's strong front running dominated the race from early on, but the race for second took a while to unfold. About halfway through, as the front pack was dwindling, Army was able to move a pack of six runners slowly up in the standing. In the end, Stephen Schaefer '04 was the only other top 20 finisher for the Bison, finishing in 18th. Nick Mousetis '04 (21st), Wes Reinhardt '04 (22nd) and Eric Furst '03 (24th) completed the scoring for the men.

The Bison now begin their final preparations for the regional meet on Nov. 16 at West Virginia. Dennis and Johnston will both be looking to individually qualify for nationals while leading their two teams.

game of the night, the Bison easily defeated the Midshipmen, 30-23. The Orange and Blue captured the second game 30-26 after hitting with a .333 percentage. The midshipmen returned after the intermission with a renewed vigor and were able to steal one game from the Bison by the score of 30-26, but Bucknell responded in the fourth game and finished off Navy with a 30-23 victory.

In the fourth and final game the Bison hit a .361 percentage which helped lead the team to victory.

Breean Trapasso tallied an impressive 47 assists for the Bison. Jackie Leahy '05 marked a team high 16 kills on the night, while Brandi Trapasso '04 and Ghiz '03 each had 13. Brandi Trapasso led the team with 25 digs, while Carolyn Dougherty '05 added 15, Breean Trapasso added 12, Chelsea Robertson '05 added 11, and Wrigley '03 added 10 to the Bison victory.

"We definitely picked up the momentum and were happy with our play in the last two games. If we would have started the match the way we played in the third game we definitely would have beaten them.."

With only a few more games to go in the regular season, the Bison are optimistically looking towards the playoffs.

"I am definitely looking forward for the playoffs," Anderson said. "I think we have a pretty good chance of going all the way."

The Bison now hold a 13-11 overall record and are 7-4 in the Patriot League. At 7 p.m. tonight the Bison will host Patriot League foe Holy Cross in the Davis Gymnasium.

This match will be broadcast live on the Bison Sports Network on WMLP-1380AM and over the Internet at www.BucknellBison.com. The action will be called by the "Voice of the Bison" Doug Birdsong. Bucknell will also host Army tomorrow.

Dear Harvey ...

Barry Bonds just can't catch a break. Blame it on fate, blame it on luck, blame it on his bad attitude. It probably wouldn't even be inaccurate to assume that the constant barrage of monkeys climbing on and off his back and chewing away at his soul are simply soldiers in the army of some overseeing force of justice, watching over baseball and ensuring the sports world that no such self-absorbed figure as Bonds ever gets his due.

Still, justice or no justice, Bonds got jipped. On Oct. 26, seven innings into what seemed to be the final game of the World Series, he was voted the unanimous Series MVP. Vindication was just around the corner. Then his team dropped a five-run lead, the game and then, the next night, the whole Series. Bonds' .471 batting average, 4 home runs, .700 on-base-percentage and World Series-record 13 walks would be left without reward to fester deep within his bitter memories.

It's difficult to harbor much sympathy for the cantankerous slugger, but it can certainly be said that his World Series numbers will go down in history as one of the most spectacular losing efforts in sports.

It's a soul-devouring experience to have unfurled the performance of a lifetime and still walk away without the spoils. Historians and fans tend to direct their fond memories towards winning performances, and in doing so often neglect some of the greatest efforts of all time.

Just ask Harvey Haddix. Remember his name from MasterCard's Memorable Moments campaign? Of course not—he wasn't on it. But sometimes his name is included on the list of pitchers who have achieved the Holy Grail of single-game performances, a perfect game. After all, if there is such a thing as "most perfect," Haddix's performance on May 4, 1959 was just that. Almost.

Haddix's name is tailed by an asterisk, and it's got to be the most gut-wrenching asterisk in any record book. "The Kitten," as he was known, pitched nine perfect innings that day. When his Pirates could not score, he went on to pitch a 10th perfect inning. And an 11th. And a 12th. In the 13th inning, he lost it all: the perfection, the no-hitter and even the win. Haddix was robbed of history because his team picked a bad time to "practice non-violence at the plate," as Roger Angell would have said.

While the topic of bad timing is on the table, it's only appropriate to bring up one of the greatest comebacks ever orchestrated on Monday Night Football. A 1994 showdown between the Broncos and the Chiefs presented a familiar fourth-quarter predicament: John Elway's Broncos were down by three with just over four minutes left in the game. But Elway, the indisputed king of comebacks, turned in a masterful performance as he guided his Broncos into the endzone with 1 minute, 29 seconds remaining.

There aren't a lot of comebacks that have been more scintillating, more jaw-dropping or more improbable anywhere in the sport's history. Unfortunately for Elway, one of the few that was, happened to take place in that final minute and 29 seconds remaining on the clock that evening in Denver. Football's other master of miracles, Joe Montana, led his Chiefs right back down the field to steal the victory with eight seconds remaining. One of Elway's greatest comebacks never made it into his tally of game-saving drives.

While Elway went on to garner plenty of redemption later in his career, some athletes never got around to kicking the curse of second-best. Take, for example, Alydar. In the 100-plus years of history associated with horse racing's Triple Crown, he's the only horse to have placed second in all three races, all three times to the same rival. Alydar possessed all the qualities that define a Triple Crown winner; he had stamina, speed, consistency, durability, heart and just plain brilliance.

He had one big flaw, though: he was born in 1974, which means he shared a foal crop with Affirmed, who had all of those qualities and a little more. While Alydar got a little closer to his nemesis with each race, missing by just a nose in the Belmont Stakes, he was doomed to become only the means to another horse's glory. While Affirmed went home with the Triple Crown trophy and eternal fame, Alydar was left to sniff longingly at the trail of botanical residue that had floated off of the flower blankets draped upon Affirmed's shoulders, with nothing to show for his efforts and his brilliance but the nation's sympathy.

Many athletes and teams have been afflicted with the wretched epidemic of "seconditis" over the years—far too many to include in a single column. There's Sammy Sosa, who's hit over 60 home runs in three different seasons—enough in each case to have eclipsed Roger Maris' old record—yet did not even lead the league in home runs in any of those three years. As far as teams go, perhaps no squad is more unfortunate than the Buffalo Bills, who made it to, but lost, the Super Bowl four years in a row, one time by one point in the final four seconds.

The list goes on and, of course, will continue to grow. There's always somebody forced to cope with heartbreak, the unfulfilled dreams or the faulty whims of justice. But that's just how it goes.

There's a story that goes with Haddix's tale that goes as follows: In the wake of his heart-wrenching stumble from perfection, he was inundated with sympathy—the usual prize for those who falter on the verge of great accomplishments. He got one letter, though, upon which was jotted only four words: "Dear Harvey, tough sh-t."

The 34-year-old lefty eventually came to peace with the realization that those four words laid out for him. There will always be losers, and sometimes in the process of losing they will be subjected to great agony. But if they are lucky—and most of them are—they will be fortunate enough to step back out on the mound, the field, the track or wherever they belong, and have the pleasure of trying again what they failed to achieve the first time around.

For the price of a 37-cent stamp, maybe someone should let Barry Bonds in on this little secret.

Looking ahead

Let's start with some encouraging news out of the NBA for future Olympic basketball teams. On Tuesday night swingman Kobe Bryant of the Los Angeles Lakers agreed to play for the U. S. Olympic basketball team in 2004, citing how "world order" needs to be restored after the United States debacle this past summer in the World Champions, failing to even reach the Final Four. (If you remember, most American basketball stars took the summer off to recover from the NBA season, so the United States was not properly represented.)

Kobe's presence will open the floodgates to what should be a true All-Star cast and a comparable team to the original Dream Teams. With Jason Kidd, Kevin Garnett, Tim Duncan, Shaq and Bryant anticipated to be the American starting five in 2004, competing countries have already begun to fight over who looks better in silver or bronze! How about Vince Carter, Allen Iverson, Tracy McGrady, Chris Webber and Ben Wallace off the bench to spare the spent players for a minute or two? I can hear the American anthem playing already.

How about some college football? Let's begin with the No. 1-ranked team, the Miami Hurricanes. Hmm, wait a second, it seems that they are ranked No. 2 in the AP poll while ranked No. 1 in the USA Today/ESPN poll.

Did you see Miami last week going yard-to-yard with the New Jersey Rutgers juggernaut football program? Actually, it was actually quite amazing to see the Scarlet Knights putting up quite a fight, holding to a 17-14 lead with six minutes to play. Then everything fell apart and Miami realized that they are the No. 1 football team in the country and started to play like it (28 points in 6 minutes).

The Hurricanes, led by quarterback Ken Dorsey who already has 20 touchdowns, and running back Willis McGahee with over 1,000 yards rushing and 16 touchdowns of his own, usually dismiss opponents before the first half whistle, but Rutgers held strong. Hobbes is sporting a healthy 13.5 yards per catch with 19 receptions on the year, and Carty is working the WR/special teams' role very well.

and attend the No. 19-ranked Penn State vs. Illinois football game. We had no idea we were in for a landmark occasion. Once we found some hot chocolate and wrapped blankets around us, we witnessed a record setting performance by running back Larry Johnson. Johnson, who rushed for 279 yards and a touchdown, broke Ki-Jana Carter's previous record by 26 yards. With 107,000 other Nittany Lion fans forming a sea of blue and white, the experience was extra sweet.

Kobe Bryant of the Los Angeles Lakers has agreed to play for the 2004 U.S. Olympic team.

Switching to the field of dreams, baseball announced its Cy Young award, given to the most valuable pitcher in the league. Arizona Diamondback hurler Randy Johnson won the prestigious award with a clean sweep of all 32 first place votes.

The 6-foot-plus giant with a fastball almost as feared as "Wild Thing's" fastball in the movie "Major League," has won the award in all four seasons since signing with the Diamondbacks as a free agent.

Johnson was modest about his victory, commenting mostly on his golf trip planned on the Pebble Beach Golf Links.

"I've got them in my office, and they're displayed nice," Johnson said. "I'm a very simple person, and I work hard, and I push myself, and this is the reward."

Finally, I'd like to share a story that should make even the most secure professional athlete cringe in fear. Czech Republic soccer team Sigma Olomouc's is currently sporting a dismal 2-5-5 record placing them 13th in a league of 16. Apparently embarrassed by a sub par performance and fearing a huge "Decker Effect" newspaper sighting, a team official came up with the brilliant idea to encourage their players to play to their potential.

"We were wondering how best to punish players who are paid royally but play lousily," Club Chairman Jiri Kubicek told the Mlada Fronta Dnes newspaper. "Then a club official came up with this idea."

The Sigma players favored this suggestion and one said, "We hope the stadium will be packed. We want to get the fans back on our side.'" As my grandfather would say, "Well then play better!"

I was extremely privileged to join a few friends last week

On this auspicious occasion, i.e. too busy to be original, I thought it might be nice to take a step back and look at the dumber things I've said over the course of my time with this column and even, as a special treat for you, pre-"Me Like Sports" snippets. So kick your heels off, grab a glass of merlot and some cheddar Goldfish and relax as I take you back to a much simpler time, when I was more naive.

"For this inaugural column I thought it wise to share some sort of anecdotal explanation for why I approach sports the way I do. A rationale for the pissiness, the resentment, the laughter, the mayhem and the romance ... however, despite the wisdom in the aforementioned approach, I'd rather leave it up to your imagination and perhaps you'll keep reading, and <forced cough> enjoying, my articles. So without further ado:"
—Jan. 25, 2002

On Michael Jordan's return to the NBA ... for the second time: "It's funny to watch him now. It's like slow motion, but everyone else is moving at regular speed. They say the first step is the most important one, but for Jordan, the first step is the only one he can muster without getting winded ... If he has anything in his favor this year against the younger talent, it's that the noises his muscles and bones make must sound remarkably similar to the squeaking wheels of a 'Radio Flyer' wagon, deafening his opponents out of the paint ... And he'll rebound—just that chances are it will be from hip surgery."
— Nov. 2, 2001—"This wizard still has tricks up his sleeve"

On the Patriots' Super Bowl victory: "Deciphering who among the country's sports analysts actually gave the Pats a fighting chance, as opposed to the well-wishers and those who yearned to be 'that genius' who picked the victorious underdogs, is more prickly than a liberal-feminist porcupine at a pro-life banquet hosted by spiky-haired hipster Sid Vicious circa 1978."
—Feb. 8, 2002—"Analysts, Patriots and Madden, Oh my!"

On sportsmanship: "... Athletic competition does not function without the constant sportsman-whiner paradigm. Without such a system in place, games would go smoothly, athletes would enjoy themselves, my complexion would clear up, Kobe Bryant wouldn't be allowed on television, water would cease to flow, hell's smoldering fires would fizzle and Saint Valentine would not be the wretchedly abhorred meddler he has become."
—Feb. 15, 2002—"Sportsmanship is overrated"

On faux Yankee fans: "When I think about it though, I use Yankee 'fans' just as much as they use me. They use me to make them feel better about themselves because they're insecure about their parentage or the size of their sexual organs. I use them as a season marker, like leaves falling in autumn, when these 'fans' start popping up like insufferable weeds in wasteland barren of credibility, dignity and self-respect, I know it's October."
—Nov. 9, 2001—"Desti-NY? Desti-NO"

On being asked to play in a national wiffleball tournament: "With over $2,000 at stake, I began my grueling training regime that very night. A combination of 10 pushups, 10 situps, four dorm room shuttle sprints (approximately 10 feet each sprint) and a voice preparation lesson where I yell at myself in the mirror saying 'COME ON! Pick up the pace! Leave your 'B' game at home, you bring your 'A' game to work ...'
—Sept. 28, 2001—"Major League... Wiffleball?"

On Roger Clemens and Barry Bonds: "[Clemens] is a fierce competitor who gets this fiery look in his eyes whenever he plays. Remember when he threw that broken bat shard at Mike Piazza in the World Series? Man, 'The Rocket' was unstoppable. I haven't seen competitive nature so strong since Mike Tyson, and HE was a role model... [And Barry Bonds] was born under Lyndon B. Johnson's administration. He lived through disco AND techno. If we can't worship him for his slugging prowess, then at least we can bow to his ability to survive two horrible decades of music. I wonder if he ever sported an Afro or got to meet Joe Piscopo. He deserves to have met Joe Piscopo."
—Sept. 14, 2001—"When the tie that Bonds becomes the knot that kills"

On the contraction of the Expos: "And now, 30-odd years after a bunch of stoned frat guys thought it would be cool to 'expand their world' by expanding baseball, the Expos find themselves voted off the island with no cruise liner to take them back. They are the ultimate lame duck. With the Damocles sword of contraction looming over their heads all off-season, the team begins the season knowing that come next April they'll be mowing lawns or placating shut-ins at the old-folks home."
—March 1, 2002—"You're from Canada, eh?"

On paying NCAA basketball players: "This is the most absurd malarkey I've heard in the sports community since the last time John Madden opened his mouth. Why on earth would we consider paying these students? They are students, not athletes. The concept is mind-boggling. It makes about as much sense as Dennis Miller's latest 'Monday Night Football' dithyramb on fundamentalist Hittite code of laws in reference to a Michael Strahan sack ...
"I'd like a free college education. How about you? But I can't shoot a layup over an oompaloompa with chronic fatigue syndrome and amyotrophic lateral sclerosis—does that hurt my chances of a free ride? Or what if I really excelled at bocce (which I do)? Where's my big contract? Someone get me Scott Boras."
—March 29, 2002—"Athletes demand respect ... and a healthy stipend"

On Tom Brady and Drew Bledsoe: "After all [Bledsoe] did for the Patriots, he was benched behind a 24-year-old fourth string quarterback who, against all odds, single-handedly saved the world from a malevolent strain of subcutaneous parasitic microorganisms using only a small paring knife, a rusted door hinge and three cubic feet of duct tape á la MacGyver, Drew simply sat with his clipboard and cheered him on like Mr. Miagi did for Ralph Macho."
—Apr. 26, 2002—"Drew who?"

On fantasy baseball: "The best is the waiver wire. Last season, at a friend's house, inevitably the conversation drifted to fantasy baseball and we decided to go check how our teams had fared that night. I logged on first and was discussing the fact that I wanted to sign a player off the waiver wire.
"My friend's face went taut and he became agitated, trying to divert my attention to other matters. But I was undeterred. Needless to say, there was as struggle, there was biting and gnashing of teeth which ultimately resulted in him pulling the plug out of the wall.
"It being a slow Macintosh computer, I thought I stood a chance. I promptly said goodnight, ran to my car, raced home at an average of 50 miles per hour through Suburbia, N.Y., signed online and promptly signed the man (Mark Buerhle for those who care) while an agitated friend sat waiting for his computer to boot back up. It was the most glorious moment of my life."
—April 19, 2002—"Where are you going with my keyboard?"

On pushing yourself to the limit: "When I play sports now, I know that I'm buying into a gender stereotype; I understand that I have nothing to prove to anyone but myself; I know the needless sacrifices we make for glory, respect, honor and pride. But my intensity is just as strong as it was that day I broke my hip. And sometimes I can feel the remaining muscles get caught on the unnatural edge when I walk or exercise or if I'm just tossing the football around with my cousin. But I'd take another one for the team in a heartbeat, and I'd do it all again if I thought I could have gotten one more touchdown ... or one less snicker at role call."

Men's crew team finishes fall season

By Ashley Maliken
Writer

The past two weeks the Bucknell men's crew had a series of good races. On Saturday, Nov. 2 the team competed in The Head of the Occoquan Regatta in Fairfax, Va. The regatta represented the final race of the fall season for the squad. The crew did not leave the regatta disappointed.

The Novice men came out in impressive form. The Novice "A" boat medaled with a third place finish in the Collegiate Novice event behind Army and George Washington respectively. The "B" boat came in with a respectable 16th place finish in the field of 23. Meanwhile in the Varsity club event, the Men's varsity crew came in a very reputable 8th place in a field of 24.

"We passed four boats and were only a half a boat length from two more," Robert Bentinck–Smith '05 said. "We had a really strong showing, and I am very pleased with the outcome."

On Saturday, Oct. 26 the men's team traveled to Philadelphia to compete in the Head of the Schuylkill Regatta. That is one of the largest regattas in the country, and the team showed what Bucknell crew was made of by placing with strong finishes throughout the regatta. The men's varsity crew made an impressive showing by placing 7th in a field of 34.

The competition is very fierce at the Schuylkill Regatta and a 7th place finish is very respectable. The novice men pulled out an impressive performance, with the "A" boat coming in 21st and the "B" boat coming in 35th. This was the Novice teams' first race, and they were able to defeat all of their Patriot League competition.

The men's Crew now looks forward to a long winter of land training and conditioning as they prepare for the upcoming spring sprint season.

Head of the Occoquan Regatta

Bucknell Novice A boat – 3rd overall, 15:34.8
Bucknell Novice B boat – 16th overall, 17:23.9 23 total boats
Bucknell Varsity – 8th overall, 15:06.0 24 boats total

Head of the Schuylkill Regatta

Bucknell Varsity 7th overall 13:56.19 34 boats total
Bucknell Novice A Boat - 21st overall, 14:59.59
Bucknell Novice B Boat - 35th overall, 16:16.76 49 total boats

Field hockey falls 1-0

The Bison field hockey team battled Georgetown on Sunday, Nov. 3, to come out of the game with a 1-0 loss. Georgetown's Lauren Galbally scored the only goal of the game with only 8 minutes, 39 seconds remaining in the second stanza to capture the win. The goal was scored off a penalty corner with assists from Shelby Samperton and Beth Gagnon. This was the final game in the regular season for both teams.

Bucknell totaled six shots on goal, while Georgetown recorded 18. Sonja Wettergreen '03 had nine saves in her final regular season game.

On Saturday, Nov. 2, Bucknell was out-scored 4-0 against American University in the final Patriot League conference game of the season.The first goal of the game was scored by Shannon Goans at only 8:30 into the match.

The score by Goans, with assists from Maranzano and Magdalena Aguilar, put American ahead at the half.

In the second stanza, Aguilar scored three goals to hand Bucknell a 4-0 loss. Her total goals for the season sailed to 15. Wettergreen had nine saves for the match while American goalkeeper Laura Miller recorded eight. American had 15 shots on goal and Bucknell had eight.

The Bison finished their regular season with a record of 7-11 overall, and 3-3 in the Patriot League.

"It was a tough season with a lot of emotional ups and downs. Adjusting to losing eight starters was really hard, but we're a young team with an enormous amount of potential, and we can only get better," Lindsay Kroll '05 said. "Despite all the odds against us, we play so hard every game and get the results. Nobody expected us to win, but there's no doubt that we can." The leading scorer for the 2002 field hockey season was Meiko Boynton '05 with seven goals. Kirsten Nilsen '06 and Kelly O'Brien '06 both added five goals each. Amy Marvel '03 had four goals this season; while Carli Cataldo '06 and Cara Turner '05 added three and one respectively.

Wettergreen had 125 saves in the goal this season. Liz Jordan '06 had eight saves. Bucknell will now advance to the Patriot League tournament for the first time since 2000. They play Lafayette on Friday, Nov. 8 at noon. Lafayette is the top seed in the league, and Bucknell is the No. 4 seed.

The Patriot League championship game will be held on Saturday, Nov. 9 at 1 p.m. at Rappolt Field in Forks Township, Pa.

Womens soccer completes their season with a 2-0 loss

By Dave Cohen
Senior Writer

The Bucknell women's soccer team completed its 2002 campaign on a losing note on Nov. 2, dropping its third consecutive game to Navy by the count of 2-0.

Like the predominance of the Orange and Blue's games this year, this one was a defensive dogfight. The ball was moved around the field at a fierce pace and the Midshipmen scored their first goal of the game in the fourth minute. Bucknell was unable to respond with a goal of its own, and Navy struck again in the 39th minute. Lauren Schwarz '03 believes that the team's inability to counter with a goal occurred continually throughout the season and does not indicate failure to fight and compete.

"This season has had its ups and downs. I think, this year, the fact that we were a young team caught up to us. A lot of times this season we lost games based on inexperience and simple errors that a team can't afford to make at the college level," Schwartz said.

"Despite that, the team never gave up during the season and that is the No. 1 quality of this team that will carry them to the top again. It has been disappointing not getting back to the tournament, but when it came down to it, we couldn't put the ball in the back of the net."

Schwartz also spoke about the Navy loss specifically, and how badly the team wanted to complete the year on a winning note.

"Although we had hoped to finish the season with a victory, it was also important for us to finish the season strong and leave everything on the field," Schwartz said. "When we play Navy it's always a battle, and I don't think the score reflects how many chances we actually had to tie the game and even get ahead, which is very frustrating. Although we didn't win the game, the entire team played hard for 90 minutes."

The Orange and Blue outshot Navy 10-7, with senior Emily Keber's two shots a team-high for the afternoon. As one of the team's leaders, Keber said that the team battled until the end against the Midshipmen and that the season's ending did not sink in immediately.

"I thought we had moments of greatness on the field, but we just couldn't put one away," Keber said. "It seems to be a pattern for us. It hasn't really hit me yet that [the season] is over. It just feels like a day off today. Once the week gets going without practice is when I will probably realize it is over for good. That will be sad."

Unlike Keber, Tara Uchel '03 felt the effects of a college season and career ending instantly.

"Emotionally, this season was difficult to handle especially coming off of last year's championship. I'm frustrated with the outcome, but I am nowhere near disheartened with the team," Utchel said. "We worked day in and day out with passion. We put our heart and soul into each game regardless of the outcome. We never gave up. That collective conviction and commitment of the team is what makes college sports so special. It has only been a few days since my soccer days at Bucknell have ended, but I already miss it."

"Although we had hoped to finish the season with a victory, it was also important for us to finish the season strong and leave everything on the field."
—Lauren Schwartz '03

Laurie Purse '03 had three saves for the squad, which fell to 6-9-2 overall and 1-5-1 in the Patriot League following the loss.

Schwartz believes that the Bison can return to success. She provided words of wisdom for next year's team.

"My advice for the team next year is to continue to believe in each other and believe in themselves. A great strength of this team is the bonds and friendships between players. They must use that to their advantage because other teams may have talent but they don't have the heart," Schwartz said. "Additionally, you have to love the game. Whether it's in practice or a game, you have to be willing to give it your all day, in and day out. The team has a lot of paybacks to make next year, so I think they will be fired up to get back on top."

NFL PREDICTIONS

Atlanta (5-3) at Pittsburgh (5-3)
The Steelers, at 5-3, have the largest division lead in the AFC, and are one of the hotter teams in this season of streaks. The Steelers have won four in a row, but so have their opponents from Atlanta. Atlanta has the 3rd-ranked rushing attack in the NFC, led by quarterback Michael Vick. But Vick may be forced to go to the air against a Steelers' defense that is ranked 2nd in the NFL against the run, allowing less than 82 yards a game. The Steelers may have rushing issues of their own if Zereoue has to fill in for Bettis, who has missed the last two games with a sprained knee. With Zereoue getting his first 100-yard rushing game and recording 173 total yards last week, he has proven himself. The Falcons have only beaten the Steelers once in history, and that stat will remain the same.

Kansas City (4-4) at San Francisco (6-2)
The Chiefs enter San Fran leading the NFL in scoring 32.4 points a game. They also bring with them the league's worst scoring defense, which is allowing 30 points a game. The Chiefs have major defensive concerns, which will only be exploited by the Garcia-to-Owens connection that is backed up by a very solid running game. The Chiefs definitely have offensive power comparable to Niners, especially in their rushing game led by Holmes, the league's leading rusher. As in their previous four losses, defense will lead to the fall of the Chiefs.

Miami (5-3) at New York Jets (3-5)
I think there can be no doubt that Fiedler is Miami's MVP, after leading them to a 5-1 record the Dolphins are winless without him. Now with backup quarterback Lucas suffering from an injured shoulder, third-string quarterback Sage Rosenfels (who?!?) may have to start. The Dolphins need to just run the ball with Ricky Williams, and use that premier running back in their backfield. The Jets lost in week 3 to the Dolphins 30-3; that was a Fiedler-led Miami team and these Jets have improved in recent weeks. I'm going to say the only way the Jets lose is if Williams beats them, which is of course very possible. My pick goes to the Jets.

Houston (2-6) at Tennessee (4-4)
The current Houston team versus the former Houston team. The Titans have won three in a row and finally their defense is playing up to its potential. After allowing 114 points in a three-game span of losses, they have allowed only 53 in their past three games. That stat doesn't help the chances of the Texans pulling off a third win considering they are the lowest scoring team in the NFL. The Texans offense will also have trouble considering they have allowed a league leading 45 sacks, and will be facing a Titan defense that ranks 4th in the AFC in that category and is looking to get a boost from the possible return of Jevon Kearse. In this matchup the old beats the new.

Oakland (4-4) at Denver (6-2)
After starting 4-0 the Raiders looked like the team to beat in the league. After dropping to 4-4 you have to ask the question, "Is this team maybe just too old?" After averaging over 40 points a game in their first four contests, the Raiders haven't scored more than 21 and are averaging a meager 16 points in their past four games. At the halfway mark of the season many people have called the Broncos the best team in the AFC, some even say the NFL, and this Monday night will be a perfect venue for Griese to prove them right against the Raiders who are better than 4-4 and will be playing to keep pace in the division. Denver is playing better football now, and that's all the matters when they get the win.

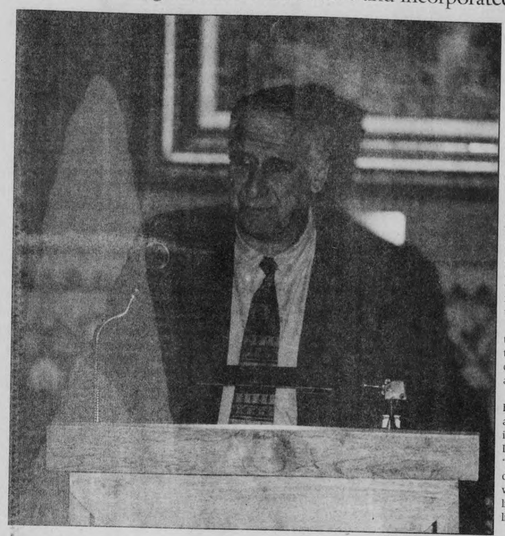
Nationally renowned poet reads

Hirsch's reading addressed erotic love and incorporated historical elements



Eric Graham—The Bucknellian

Edward Hirsch reads his poetry in Bucknell Hall. During his reading, Hirsch used two different speaking voices. One voice he was comical and casual, while the other was serious and paced.

By David Allen
Staff Writer

Last Sunday evening, nationally renowned poet and critic Edward Hirsch gave a poetry reading in Bucknell Hall in an event sponsored by Professor of Biology Gary Sojka and his wife Sandy in recognition of the Stadler Center for Poetry and the University Press.

Associate Professor of English and Director of the Stadler Poetry Center Cynthia Hogue gave a brief introduction in which she mentioned a few of Hirsch's many accolades. He is the recipient of a MacArthur "genius" grant for his work, and was recently appointed head of the John Simon Guggenheim Memorial Foundation. Hirsch is the first poet ever named to that position.

Hogue also praised Hirsch's work, stating that she is most struck by "his erudition, which he wears lightly" and the "depth of wit" in his works of poetry and prose.

Hirsch gave a short prose reading taken from his work, "How to Read a Poem and Fall in Love With Poetry." He described his first encounter with a poem at the age of eight—stumbling upon one of his grandfather's books in the basement, discovering an unattributed poem that struck him very deeply and assuming his grandfather was the author.

Years later, after this poem "opened an unembarrassed space ... that would never be closed," he found that the poem he attributed to his grandfather was actually written by Emily Brontë.

The pairing of Hirsch's reaction to the poem as a youth and the unpleasant realization of a misguided assumption provided a humorous effect. This lighthearted approach characterized many of his direct addresses to the audience throughout the evening.

Hirsch read poems from several of his published books, including 1994's "Earthly Measures" and 1999's "On Love." His poems were both intellectual and accessible, with many allusions to other famous writers, classical myths and scriptural elements of the Bible and the Torah. The subject material varied greatly, but every work had a similar mood—containing very intense and rich with images and descriptions, but not heavy.

What seemed most striking about Hirsch's reading was the difference between his two speaking voices. The one with which he prefaced his poems and bantered with the audience was joking and casual, almost like that of a stand-up comedian. The voice with which he delivered his poems was much more serious. He seemed to labor at a steady pace as he placed careful stress on certain words.

Though each of the 15 poems he read was very well-crafted and effective, several stood out as incredibly unique and innovative works of poetry. Two love poems near the end of the reading were constructed as one lover addressing another in the setting of a classical text.

"The Sentence," based on Canto Five of Dante's "Inferno," depicted two lovers tossed by circling winds in the second circle of the Inferno, forever kept separate. "In the Mourning Fields" was set in Book Six of the "Aeneid."

One lover states, addressing the fate they share in the underworld, "it is written we were consumed by love on Earth/ a pitiless world above." These two poems were part of a larger section of poems constructed around allusions to classical mythology, all of which involved symbolic journeys into the underworld.

Tommy Vance '06 commented after the reading that allusions of this magnitude "might seem very difficult to pull off, but he [Hirsch] made them seem like a breeze."

References to other writers within Hirsch's poems were also very striking and effective. "In Memoriam Paul Celan" is a poignant elegy dedicated to the poet. It is filled with funeral images, such as "beheaded roses" and "flowering blood drops," as well as references to the writer's dead body, particularly the eyelids and lips. It closes powerfully with the line, "Let God pray to us for this man."

"Simone Weil: A Year of Factory Work 1934-1935" is bracketed with images of food going cold on the table as the great 20th century philosopher, after whom the poem is named, sits exhausted by her work, unable to eat.

Hirsch addresses the topic of erotic love in guise of a famous French novelist in the poem "Colette." This last poem comes from his book "On Love" and is part of a series of imagined lectures on love by a wide variety of famous writers and philosophers.

Hirsch also incorporates broad historical elements into his poems. In "My Father's Childhood," he weaves tales of Jewish life in post-World War I Europe into a pensive, lamenting narrative. "The Poet at Seven" also includes imagery of war-torn Europe and the Holocaust, distorting the image of his younger self on the baseball field into one of "an exile ... a refugee ... a victim." "Ocean of Grass" tells the story of American pioneer women and their deep feelings of loneliness on the journey west.

Hirsch closed his reading by emphasizing the critical role that poetry has played in every great society throughout history and the importance of paying "attention to the language ... to the one-on-one encounters between poem and reader." He praised the efforts of the Stadler Poetry Center and the University Press to keep poetry present in the University community. The near-capacity audience's copious and appreciative applause and the long lines to purchase books and have them signed were indicative of poetry's strong presence and Hirsch's inspiring presentation.

Movie Review 2.5/5

Do you ever think about what happens to your pictures when you drop them off at a photo finishing shop? Or do you mindlessly hand over the canister of memories, returning an hour later believing that the negatives have magically turned into 24 perfectly developed pictures? It is easy to forget that in order to get those pictures, someone has to study and cut the negatives, prepare them to be developed, set the length of exposure and finish the prints in the lab. Good developers give each roll plenty of personal attention, because they know just how important those glossy pieces of paper can be to a person.

Seymore "Sy" Parrish (Robin Williams) makes sure to give all of his customers a lot of attention when he's working on their photos in the dark flick "One Hour Photo." After working at the one-hour photo finishing stand at the same SaveMart for over nine years, he starts to enjoy the photos of some customers more than others.

Sy's favorite customer is the Yorkin family. Nina Yorkin (Connie Nielsen) has brought in pictures documenting her relationship with Will (Michael Vartan) since before their son Jake (Dylan Smith) was born. Jake calls Sy "Sy the Photo Guy" and the family treats the elderly man kindly as he makes comments about its personal family moments. It all seems a little weird, but not nearly as weird as seeing Sy make triple copies of the Yorkins' photos in order to keep a set for himself. "Sy the Photo Guy" may seem harmless, but seeing his walls plastered with another family's photos and his daydreams of being "Uncle Sy" turn this happy family's life upside down.

The characters are all a bit underdeveloped in this first film by Mark Romaneck. Nina's loving mother act appears to be, well, an act, although there is nothing in the script to warrant that. Will is a hard working but absent father, but that doesn't mean he should lack a personality. Jake shows the most complexity of character as he deals with feeling bad for Sy and feeling as if he should not trust a stranger.

As Sy falls deeper into his delusions, the script continues to depict him as a harmless, lonely, abused old man who genuinely cares about the Yorkins. The progression is needlessly dragged out, and the ending is somewhat anticlimactic, although undeniably creepy.

Williams seems to be on a dark, sinister movie kick after roles in "Insomnia" (2002) and "Death to Smoochy" (2002), which is an exciting and broadening opportunity for him. Maybe next time he should make sure the movie has a good dark, sinister plot before signing on.

Lutz is dedicated to music

By Stephanie Nickse
Senior Writer

Neal Lutz is a senior who stands out from his classmates for his dedication to the University's music programs. His primary instrument is the saxophone, but he is by no means limited to it. He is skilled in playing the oboe and can teach most instruments.

Tyler Kidder—The Bucknellian

Neal Lutz '03 is a music education major. A very active student, Lutz co-directed the football/baseball pep band and volunteers at the Harrisburg Symphony.

Lutz came to the University determined to become a music education major. Not only has he focused on obtaining a degree in music, but he has also proven his interest in enhancing various music groups on campus.

Lutz has performed with a number of performing ensembles on campus. He is a member of the symphonic and jazz bands. He also plays in the wind ensemble and is a member of the University orchestra.

Lutz joined the football/basketball pep band during his first year here. By his sophomore year, he was appointed co-director of the band. He took responsibility for selecting music for each performance, leading band rehearsals and directing the band at various school events. He said that co-directing the pep band "has been a fun, enjoyable and educational experience."

Lutz has met his position's requirements with success. Since he and another student became directors of the band, the number of members has more than doubled.

Lutz has also found individual success in the world of music. During his first and second years, he played the baritone saxophone in the Opus Saxophone Quartet.

"Membership in this group was my first significant experience playing chamber music, and I loved every minute of it," he said.

The quartet performed at two recitals and two receptions on campus.

"[Chamber music is] a dichotomy of dependence and independence," Lutz said. "On the one hand, each performer must be secure in his part. He must understand when to be in the background and when to move to the foreground. On the other hand, he must work closely with his fellow performers. He must listen acutely for intonation and blend."

After this group dissolved, Lutz formed a new group—the Saxophone Quartet. The group performs various musical pieces, ranging from those of the French masters to ragtime to string quartet transcriptions. Lutz plays the alto and soprano saxophones for the group and is also responsible for administrative work and directing rehearsals.

Lutz has been invited to perform as a member of the Pennsylvania Intercollegiate Band for the past two years. The band is comprised of approximately 120 students from colleges and universities across the state.

Lutz also finds time to volunteer in the community, sharing his ability and expertise with others. He is a volunteer at the Harrisburg Symphony, visiting schools to prepare students for the symphony's concerts by teaching them about the music they will hear and about proper concert etiquette.

"Most recently, I taught two movements of Shostakovich's 'First Symphony' to six classes of middle school [students] at a small Catholic school in Mechanicsburg, Pa.," Lutz said.

As if this wasn't enough work, Lutz still finds time to assist in the direction of the Mifflinburg Area Marching Wildcats, act as the orchestra librarian—a position he has held for the past three years—and assist in teaching music theory at the University.

Last summer, Lutz found that working for a summer day camp geared towards teaching elementary students about visual art, music, dance and theater was very satisfying.

"I realized that teaching music was something I still wanted to do," he said.

He enjoyed the opportunity to work with other music teachers and to design school lessons to the ages, abilities and interests of students.

Lutz currently is preparing for his senior recital, and he knows that he ultimately wants to make a career out of music.

"Music started out as a hobby, but has now grown into a future career," he said.

He will graduate from the University in May with certification to teach general, choral and instrumental music to grades K-12. Lutz is certain that he wants to teach after graduation but his long-term goals are still up in the air.

"The ideal job would be a high school band director," he said. "Eventually, I would like to pursue a master's degree."

Lutz's senior recital will be held in the Natalie Davis Rooke Recital Hall of the Sigfried Weis Music Building on Sunday, Nov. 17, at 2:30 p.m. He will perform four alto saxophone pieces with piano accompaniment, one piece by the University Saxophone Quartet and a solo alto saxophone piece.

"The perfectionist in me worries about every single note and rhythm, and the musician in me worries about effectively communicating a musical thought to the audience," Lutz said.

The dedication that he has shown in his pursuit of music at the University will surely pay off for him in his performance.

Hoyle a unique individual

By Melinda Kummer
Senior Writer

The man who breathes fire, eats glass, jams nails in his nose and sometimes juggles says he is "very careful." Jonathan Hoyle '04 doesn't at first come across as being careful.

"I like to think that there's something different about me than everybody else," he said.

Long hair pulled back, whiskered face and clothes without J. Crew labels, he gives off vibes of artistic rebelliousness.

A complicated paradox, Hoyle is a double major in geology and theater. Most interested in lighting design, geology occupies the time he does not spend in the theater.

His geology roots partially stem from his hometown of Willow Grove, Pa., where he works during the summers at the Pennypack Trust nature reserve. He said he works particularly in the land management department, which roughly translates to mowing the grass.

Performing the role of president of Bucknellians for Peace consumes the rest of his waking hours. Free time is a commodity he does not remember.

Progressing from lighting design for two showcases in his first year, Hoyle co-designed the lighting for "Fefu and Her Friends" this semester. Other projects for the year include lighting design for two pieces in the fall dance performance and lighting design for the theatrical showcase "Oleanna."

Preferring lighting design for dance pieces as opposed to theatrical shows, Hoyle says it gives him "a lot more freedom ... I can design with less restrictions and really utilize the light by sculpting it as a medium."

"Jon has a well-developed artistic sense backed with strong technical skills that allow him to bring his design ideas to fruition on the stage," Lighting Designer and Technical Director Heath Hansum said. "He is excellent at problem-solving and likes challenges involving design and technology. He's the type of student I really enjoy having in my program."

Hoyle worked with Hansum over the summer at the Bread Loaf School of English in Vermont. He worked under Hansum as a Master Electrician.

Looking forward, Hoyle is unsure of what the future holds. Whether he goes on to graduate school, internships or freelance work, Hoyle's goal is to enjoy his time at the University.

"This is the last time I've got where I don't have any worries," he said

Body piercing: the hole story

By Leah Cunningham
Staff Writer

Many value the art of body piercing as a form of self-expression, an approach to creatively garnishing the body with a work of art. Others simply associate piercings with pain. Though older generations view body piercings as rebellious and impulsive, students think differently and encourage their peers to get a piercing if it suits their bodies.

"There seems to be this dark circle around the idea of body piercing, and people still think it is an unsanitary thing performed in 'dirty basements' with 'dirty needles,'" said Christina Sullivan, owner and piercing manager of Timeless Image Tattoo Studio and Body Piercing in Williamsport, Pa.

Timeless Image is a popular piercing and tattoo parlor where University students frequently go for their piercing needs.

According to Sullivan, Timeless Image "does anything from top to bottom," including navel, tongue, lip, eyebrow, labret, nose, ear, inner ear, genitals, nipple and various cartilage piercings. Prices vary from the most expensive piercings at $60 to regular ear piercings at $20.

Sullivan explained that the concern of students and adults alike is always the pain factor—"How much is this going to hurt?"

"I tell everybody to liken it to a shot, giving blood—it's all the same needle stick. Sometimes people make things worse by stressing out. Everyone has a different tolerance," Sullivan said. "A piercing is nothing someone cannot work through. I've had sunburns more painful than piercings!"

Sarah Saunders '06 contends that out of all her piercings—including ear and cartilage—getting her nipples pierced was the most painful.

"It wasn't unbearable and I would do it again," she said.

Saunders explained that she waited until she was 18, but her initial interest sprung when she was 16.

"I would say to just do it and not worry about it. They're cool and they're fun … I even convinced someone on my rugby team to go do it!"

Lauren Lombardo '05 has a total of eight piercings, five in her left ear and three in her right.

"I had virtually no pain from cartilage piercing, and I was able to sleep on it two days after," Lombardo said.

Lombardo explained that one of her more painful piercing experiences involved her bellybutton, which she decided to take out.

"My belly button took a lot longer to heal," she said. "It probably took a month for me to be able to put pressure on it without feeling pain."

Searching for a unique look as well, Ryan Ford '06 has a lip ring he got done in Ocean City, Md.

"I don't have anything to compare it to, but it hurt really bad," Ford said. "When I first got it, I used Bactine and mouthwash. I'm sure there are worse things to get pierced, and it was only temporary pain. I could still eat, and it didn't swell up or get sore."

Students should remember to not overlook researching a piercing. Sterilization of needles and other health precautions are important to keep in mind when researching a piercing.

"We do our own sterilizing on-site because we decided that trying to trust someone else sending pre-sterilized needles would not be reliable. We have two sterilizers on-site and brand new needles," Sullivan said.

She said that every patient is given the necessary information about the needles.

"I give every new patient a little speech, show them the needles, explain how the package works, which involves a really easy sting sterilizer arrow on the back of the needle, which changes color when the process is completed. I give everyone the opportunity to inspect the package and dispose of the needle in front of the person."

Sullivan's best advice for anyone contemplating a piercing is to research.

"If you walk in somewhere and you don't feel comfortable, it's not a good idea. If you don't get help the way you want, don't do it. It's not a bad experience if you have a friendly atmosphere where you can feel at ease and not add to an already nerve-racking experience."

It is also important to know that most piercing parlors use 316 LVM surgical steel and that different people respond differently and may need titanium, nickel-negative or other various metals, depending on their body.

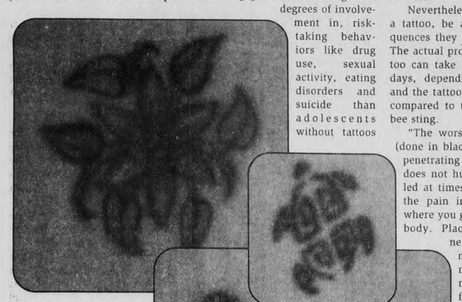
Body piercings are becoming more and more popular among younger generations, and students are investing more time into taking the right safety precautions to feel comfortable with their decisions. From tongues to lips, bellybuttons to eyebrows and nipples to noses, piercings are not solely the ear lobe decorations they used to be. If a body piercing is for you, then do the research, brave the pain, pick a place, know the price and pierce away.

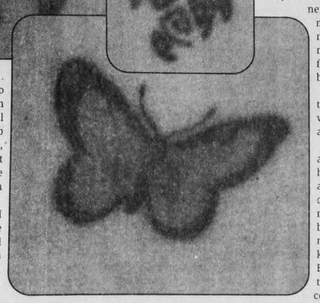
The art of tattoos: more than meets the eye

By Josie Cetta
Features Editor

In the past 10-20 years, tattoos have become more socially accepted. Although they are still not yet mainstream, tattoos are now looked upon as a form self-expression, with a deeper meaning than just what the eye can see.

When choosing a tattoo, it makes sense to look for unique symbols that will have some personal meaning for you. The pain of having a tattoo removed is far greater than getting one and a scar will also remain. According to www.Howstuffworks.com, tattoo removal can cost between $400-$1,000. The tattoos alone only cost from $50-$100, for smaller ones.





"I love both of mine. I picked designs that have meaning behind them,therefore; I know it is something that I will always like," Jenica Asadorian '03 said.

Other University students agree.

"Thinking back on the tattoos I have, I'll never regret getting them or having them displayed on my skin. They are something I wanted, and they sort of reflect upon my personality and beliefs. I'll also always be young at heart, so when I'm 60 years old, I won't mind telling my grandchildren stories of the good old days!" Brandon Jackson '03 said.

Not everyone in today's society is quite as enthusiastic. Some are skeptical of tattoos being "just a phase" or a form of rebellion. In a Brown University survey done this summer on adolescents with tattoos and/or piercings, it was shown that they are more likely to have engaged in, and have greater degrees of involvement in, risk-taking behaviors like drug use, sexual activity, eating disorders and suicide than adolescents without tattoos and/or piercings. The survey involved 484 adolescents ranging in age from 12-22 years old.

"Some people tell me I won't want the design when i'm older and that it will make people look down on me," Asadorian said.

Greg Fitzgerald '03 said, "I frequently get the question, 'You know those are permanent, right?' People just don't understand how you could want to get one done."

For some, criticism is not even an issue.

"No one has ever told me that I shouldn't have gotten a tattoo, but even if someone did, it would not detract me from getting another one. A tattoo is something you get for yourself, and part of the fun in it is the shock factor," Sara Roth '05 said.

Nevertheless, when considering a tattoo, be aware of the consequences they bring—such as pain. The actual process of getting a tattoo can take hours, or sometimes days, depending upon the artist and the tattoo. The pain has been compared to that of a continuous bee sting.

"The worst part is the outline (done in black and with a deeper penetrating needle). The color does not hurt and actually tickled at times. Keep in mind that the pain involved depends on where you get the tattoo on your body. Places where bone or nerves are concentrated more are likely to be more painful than mostly muscular or fatty areas of the body," Jackson said.

Perhaps it is a tedious chore, but worth it in the end, according to Roth.

"My tattoo took about an hour to an hour and a half, so although the pricks didn't hurt that much, having your body pricked with a needle for an hour kind of wears on you. But I kind of figured that any pain was completely worth it; it was only an hour of moderate pain for something that would last a lifetime," Roth said.

What about issues of disease transmission? Non-sterile practices can, after all, lead to serious bacterial and viral disease transmission, such as hepatitis B, syphilis, tuberculosis and HIV.

An additional consequence to consider is that the American Red Cross will not accept blood donations within the year of your tattoo date.

Besides all of that, tattoos are addicting.

"I would definitely get another tattoo, but I want it to be meaningful, so I'm waiting until I find something that is. My friends who have tattoos say that it's addictive. Once you get one you have to get another and I totally agree," Roth said.

Others are more hesitant. "If you don't run out of places to put tattoos you definitely run out of cool or meaningful ideas. Case in point, my friend's second tattoo is a cowboy hat on her foot because she likes country music—at least last year she did," said Julie Anthony '03.

As for those against tattoos, Roth has a plan. "I can always cover it up if I want to," Roth said.

"Thinking back on the tattoos I have, I'll never regret getting them or having them displayed on my skin. They are something I wanted, and they sort of reflect upon my personality and beliefs. I'll also always be young at heart, so when I'm 60 years old, I won't mind telling my grandchildren stories of the good old days!"

A closer look at the tattoo process

By Josie Cetta
Features Editor

1. Usually, the tattoo process begins with filling out paperwork and showing valid proof of age. According to www.tattoo.about.com, most studios require payment before service is rendered.

2. The location of your future tattoo is then cleaned, usually using rubbing alcohol, and the hair in the area is shaved. Once again the tattoo area is cleaned to ensure a smooth transfer.

3. The next step is creating a stencil. Many studios use a machine called a thermal-fax, which transfers the tattoo design onto a special thermal paper. Soap, water or sometimes deodorant is then applied to moisten the skin and make for a clearer transfer of the design to the skin. The thermal paper is then pulled off leaving a blue-colored outline of the future tattoo. An autoclave (a heat, steam and pressure unit also used in hospitals) is used to sterilize the needle bars and the tubes.

4. The artist adds ink, placed in tiny "ink caps," to the tattoo machine and sets the needles and tubes in their place. Water is used to clean the needles from one color to the next. Ointment is added to ensure that the transfer design will not rub off and to allow the needle to move with ease.

5. The line work is then placed, followed by the shading and coloring. The needle goes about one millimeter into the skin, shooting ink into the second layer of skin called the dermis (seen through the transparency of the first layer, or the epidermis).

The movement of a tattoo machine is compared to that of a sewing machine. After the artist's work is completed, a hot towel is usually applied to the area. The tattoo needs to be treated as a wound, covered with ointment and a bandage for at least three hours.

Eating right

By Alyson Walker
Features Editor

With winter rapidly approaching, doctors and nutritionists are warning people to watch their diets, according to CNN.com. Getting recommended amounts of vitamin C will help people fight off the winter sniffles.

It is especially important for students who live in communal housing where the flu runs rampant. In order to stay healthy, it is also recommended to wash hands regularly throughout the winter months.

"That's one of the most common ways for spreading germs from one individual to another—skin-to-skin contact," Paul Lyons, a family physician with Temple University School of Medicine said, according to CNN.com.

To help keep away the colds, maintain a healthy diet that will boost the immune system. Lyons stressed getting daily amounts of vitamins through foods like citrus fruit rather than taking dietary supplements.

According to American Dietetic Association spokeswoman Heidi Reichenberger, breakfast is mandatory for good nutrition.

"Skipping breakfast gives you the munchies later on and slows your metabolism down," Reichenberger said, according to MSN.com.

"I always eat breakfast because otherwise I'm hungry 20 minutes into class. My metabolism is high, and if I don't eat breakfast, I would need to eat more at lunch and dinner, and that's not healthy," Adam Turbett '04 said.

For other college students, breakfast is a grab-and-go—or more often, a skipped-meal.

"I don't like to have to get up any earlier than necessary to eat breakfast. Also, most days my classes are later in the day, so I don't feel like getting up to just go get food," Tamara Lapman '05 said.

Sometimes students feel that the grab-and-go meal is better for their time management, but it can be devastating to their health. Grabbing pizza and a soda every so often isn't bad, but it would be helped by adding salad or vegetables to the meal.

The USDA recommends following its Dietary Guidelines for Americans as well as the Food Pyramid, which was created after much research.

It isn't always easy to follow the guidelines, and for students it can be even more difficult either because of lack of transportation to a grocery store, not knowing what is used to prepare the food they consume in a cafeteria or trying to find the most convenient meal rather than the healthiest. Often, students gain the "Freshman 15" through their fast food selections.

Luckily for University students, there are several options that will help them balance their meals more. The a la carte options at the Bison currently include pre-made salads, fruit and vegetables in easily-carried containers for the student on the go, as well as a salad bar and fruit stand similar to that offered in the cafeteria.

"The Bison's recent decision to serve strawberries on occasion was awesome. It's better than just apples and bananas, that's for sure," Lauren Scott '04 said.

Even if you are in a rush, there is always a healthy option available. Combining good diet and exercise can help you stay fit all winter long.

THE DIETARY GUIDELINES FOR AMERICANS

Eat a variety of foods to get the energy, protein, vitamins, minerals and fiber you need for good health.

Balance the food you eat with physical activity—maintain or improve your weight to reduce your chances of having high blood pressure, heart disease, a stroke, certain cancers and the most common kind of diabetes.

Choose a diet with plenty of grain products, vegetables and fruits which provide needed vitamins, minerals, fiber and complex carbohydrates, and can help you lower your intake of fat.

Choose a diet low in fat, saturated fat and cholesterol to reduce your risk of heart attack and certain types of cancer and to help you maintain a healthy weight.

Choose a diet moderate in sugars. A diet with lots of sugars has too many calories and too few nutrients for most people and can contribute to tooth decay.

Choose a diet moderate in salt and sodium to help reduce your risk of high blood pressure.

If you drink alcoholic beverages, do so in moderation. Alcoholic beverages supply calories, but little or no nutrients. Drinking alcohol is also the cause of many health problems and accidents and can lead to addiction.

Staying fit

By Alyson Walker
Features Editor

Maybe the mention of the gym brings back old junior high memories of smelly uniforms and the shuttle-run, but recent trends in exercise have brought variety and technology together for efficient and fun workouts.

Recent research by Harvard University School of Public Health showed that the more intense the workout, the more benefits the person receives. The study also demonstrated that combining aerobic exercise with weight training can reduce a person's risk of heart disease.

"We found that the amount, intensity and type of exercise are all important when it comes to reducing the risk of heart disease," researcher Frank Hu, MD, Ph.D, said, according to MSN.com.

The study focused on how different exercise practices affected risks of heart disease for approximately 45,000 men. It is one of the first to demonstrate the effects of combining weight training and aerobic exercise to lower risk of heart problems. The study's more specific findings can be found in the Oct. 23-30 issue of The Journal of the American Medical Association.

Exercise can also help keep away winter weather blues, according to CNN.com. Continuing a regular routine will keep a person's immune system active and help to fight off colds and flus. It is not recommended to work out with a chest cold for personal safety reasons.

Technology has also increased safety at gyms. ProSpot, a new line of exercise equipment, uses special touch sensor technology, according to CNN.com. The sensors send a signal to the cables of weight equipment to catch the weight if the person drops the weight, taking the place of the spotter.

"It's the best breakthrough in technology we've seen in ages," said General Manager of G&G Fitness Equipment Mike Grant, according to CNN.com. "I've never seen anything like it. The second you let go of the bar, it locks up in midair."

ProSpot was invented by Michael Slawinski, a former semipro football player and now company chief. His purpose was fitness safety.

"An average of six people [are] killed every year from dropping weights on themselves," Slawinski said, according to CNN.com. "With [ProSpot's] many safety features, weight lifters will not have to be worried about being benched for life."

Other safety devices of ProSpot include an automatic lock, which locks the bar in place in case of either the cord being unplugged suddenly or a power outage occurring.

While this technology is primarily for safety purposes, others supposedly produce a better workout by informing the person of heart rate and calories burned. Some speculate that soon people will only purchase equipment offering these features in addition to distance and time measurements.

"In terms of cardio equipment, the interactive console is the most innovative technology to come out," Grant said, according to CNN.com. "The computers take your biofeedback, and if you had a stressed day, it'll react on the biofeedback. Most people don't understand the biomechanics and physiology of exercising, but you can just tell the machine what to do and it'll figure out the rest for you. If you want to know how much fat you're burning, or your target heart rate, just press a button and the machine will tell you."

This technology can be informative, but can also be an overload for the average person, who spends most of the day dealing with some form of technology, especially computers.

For those people, an aerobics class might be the perfect option. The new trend is for these classes to be thematic and different from the average workout class. One offered at Mission Viejo Crunch Fitness in California is Cardio Striptease—a class where the students work in stripper style, using sexy dance moves to keep the heart rate pumping for a full hour.

"The women have so much fun. The want to come out and be more sexy," Rob Glick, group fitness director at Mission Viejo Crunch Fitness said, according to MSN.com.

Other alternative classes include police and fireman fitness workouts based on training routines, boxing and a circus workout that includes a trapeze.

Although the University does not offer a flying trapeze, there are many options for students to choose from to vary their fitness routines. From lifting weights to the many types of cardiovascular machines, students can use the Recreation and Athletic Center individually, or join a class. The classes include step aerobics, cardio-kickboxing, pilates and aerobic dance.

"I teach a dance aerobics class because it is a nontraditional form of aerobics," Julie Schmidt '05 said. "People that enjoy dancing, but do not have the time commitment that other dance functions require, now have the option to involve themselves in not only something they enjoy, but also an activity that gets them moving!"

Finding an exercise that is enjoyable is the first key step in keeping a fitness routine said Daniel Lavan, MD, spokesperson for the American Heart Association, according to MSN.com.

"It probably won't surprise many people that regular exercise is good for your heart," Lavan said. "The problem is that few people are doing it. I would like to have a nickel for every piece of exercise equipment that is gathering dust in someone's bedroom."

With the different options available at the University, students should be able to find a way to keep in shape while having a good time.

"In a culture that thrives on youth and well-being, fitness is critical both physically and mentally. Fitness is not about having the biggest muscles, but rather control that one has over his or her own body," Schmidt said.

Abroad perspective: Zanzibar, Tanzania

By Gina Conenello
Contributing Writer

Imagine yourself in a market on a tropical island off the coast of East Africa. It is your first day on the island and you have major jet lag. You have just been dropped off with a girl who you met this morning. The two of you have a list of things to buy and places to go. No problem, right? Wrong! The things on the list you have to buy are in Swahili, a language you can't speak, let alone read and pronounce. You have money to buy what you need, but you have no idea how much things cost and how much your money is worth. The second set of problems you have relates to your total lack of knowledge of where you are. Now you have four hours to navigate around a town and complete your list of tasks and somehow make it back to the guesthouse where you are staying, the name of which you don't really remember. My official tasks were as follows:

Find the following locations: the academic adviser's house, the post office, the Zanzibar Medical Group and the Old Fort

1) Buy an ndizi. How many different kinds are there?
2) Where is the Anglican Church? What's its history?
3) Where would you go to get a boat to Pemba or Dares-Salaam? How much would it cost?
4) Where is the fish market? Find out the Swahili names of two types of fish.
5) Where is the Ngome Kongwe? What activities take place there?
6) Buy two different kinds of matunda.
7) What is a daladala and what are they used for? Where are they found and how much do they cost?

Welcome to my first day abroad in Zanzibar, Tanzania. It was a tad stressful and a bit scary, but mostly just exciting. My experience abroad was definitely not a trip for the faint of heart. That first assignment was tough, but we got almost everything on our list accomplished and learned that ndizi are bananas and a daladala is the Zanzibar equivalent of a public transportation system. I will never forget the feeling of total ignorance when we were first dropped off. I didn't know the language, and knew that most people in the market didn't know English. I had no idea where I was and I was afraid to ask.

Over the next few days the seven other girls on my program and I learned a lot about Zanzibari/Swahili culture. We learned the basic Swahili greetings, how to dress, how to act, how to carry our money and what we needed to do to stay healthy. It was a lot. Some of the first very important lessons I learned were: how to properly tuck a mosquito net into my bed; how to properly eat with my right hand (left hands are used for bathroom duties); how to take a shower from a bucket and most importantly; how to stay safely hydrated when it is 100 degrees out and you have to keep your knees and shoulders covered (Zanzibar is a Muslim island).

The next hurdle we had to overcome was learning a new language in three weeks. Our intensive Swahili course started about a week after arriving on Zanzibar. We met in one of our rooms in the guesthouse for four hours a day (two in the morning and two in the late afternoon) with our Zanzibari Swahili teachers. Luckily, we all looked forward to our classes because we all felt a great urgency to learn to communicate with people on the street and eventually with our home stay (host) families.

My only drawback in communication was the pronunciation of my name, which sounds like the Swahili word for "name." Every time I introduced myself it was like an Abbot and Costello act. Example of a typical introduction: "Hi, my name is 'name.'" Reply: "Yes, your name, what is it?" Me: "Name." This could go on for quite some time until I eventually gave up and told the person that my name was Aisha (the Swahili name given to me by the academic director to help us acclimate ourselves to the culture).

Living with my home stay family was one of the best experiences on my trip. At first I was a little let down because I didn't have any little brothers or sisters. All I had was a 21-year-old sister, Halem. In the end, it turned out to be the best thing for me because I became very close friends with Halem's friend Ashuu. As for the little kids part, there were plenty of those. I was like a local circus attraction, the weird, new, white, American girl who couldn't even speak Swahili. I was an oddity; that and my home stay family thought that I was a complete idiot. That was probably a reasonable assumption though considering I could only make basic sentences like, "I went to the market today" and "I have to go to school tomorrow at 8 a.m." I even had to be walked to school for a week and a half because I got so lost walking around town, even with a map.

My family instructed me on how to do everything. They taught me how to eat. They told me when I needed to shower, how to dress, how to greet people properly, and translated the best they could when the two 5-year-olds across the street, Dule and Yoo, came to talk to me. Luckily, I had an open mind and I was willing to learn all that I could. I found their instruction extremely useful and only slightly demeaning (but what can you expect when your vocabulary is less than a 5-year-old's). All in all, I made a lifelong friend during my homestay in Ashuu, to whom I still write.

Now I would like to share a few favorite stories that sum up many of my experiences in Zanzibar.

Pemba: the island of marriage proposals

In Zanzibar culture it is apparently quite common for men to approach young women on the street and ask their hand in marriage. We were warned about this by our academic director, but were really in disbelief about this phenomenon. I was the first person to experience this uniquely flattering situation. My first proposal happened as I was walking by myself on the outskirts of Chake Chake (a main town on Pemba Island).

Conenello being taught how to cook Swahili food from Ashuu's mom. Ashuu (sitting) is with her sisters and other girls that live on the same street. Conenello and the seven other girls in the program learned about the various aspects of Zanzibari/Swahili culture.

While walking, I stopped to talk to an old man pushing his bike full of firewood. This man had to be at least 65 and had about three teeth. I was chatting with him in Swhahili and, while I didn't understand everything he said, I thought that we were talking about school and why I was visiting Pemba. Boy was I wrong! I came to the realization that we were not on the same page when he asked me in English, "You husband?" At which point I tried to explain to the old man that I wasn't going to get married until after I graduated college. The hitch to that was that I didn't know the words for until, after, graduate and college. To make matters worse, I used the male form of the verb "to marry." I have a feeling I just left the old man quite confused.

After that little experience, I decided to come up with a standard reply to any future marriage proposals. My reply would be, "Hapana, asante lakini ninahitaji kumeliza kusoma na bado nitaolewa." In English, "No, thank you. I need to finish my studies first and then I will get married."

It was a good thing I practiced this phrase because just a few days later I got more marriage proposals while waiting for a daladala in a rural down called Mchangamdogo. I visited the town to try and get a casual interview with the clinician of the "hospitali," or clinic. After talking to the "doctor," as everyone called him, I went back to the road to wait for transportation back to my "hotel room" (and I use that term very loosely). I created a slight spectacle waiting by the side of the road (because I was probably the first white woman to ever show any interest in the small Mchangamdogo clinic). It seemed that almost all of the men in the town were now gathered around sipping Arabic coffee wanting to know what I was doing there and whether I was married because they had plenty of young men in the village that would love to marry me. I was talking to the one man who knew English, even though I was speaking in Swahili, and then the question came. "These boys (what looked like nine 16-year-old boys who just came from a soccer game) would like to ask you to marry them."

I must say I was a little confused. Did they all want to marry me at the same time, or was each one asking, hoping that he would be the one I would pick? Whatever the case was I recited my practiced marriage proposal rejection and laughed it off. Luckily a daladala came very shortly and I quickly got out of what was a mildly awkward situation. Never in my life could I have imagined that I would go abroad and get proposed to on a regular basis, but it definitely made the trip a lot more interesting.

Fish and Snorkeling: the education of a biochemistry major

So now you are probably wondering if I actually did any real studying while studying abroad, and I am happy to report that I did, although it might not have been the most relevant course work for a biochemistry major. One thing that my friends have noted since my return from abroad is that I have a strange and extensive knowledge of fish. This is because I took a coral reef ecology course, and studied fish and coral. I must say that this is a topic that I would never really pick to study, but it came with the program so I had no choice.

Our "class" involved a three-hour interactive lecture on coral and fish biology and behavior and then a two-hour snorkeling session on some of the most well-preserved reefs in East Africa. The class took place in the Mafia Island Marine Park. In our first snorkeling session we learned how to surface dive to approximately 30 feet, this was essential seeing as the program forbids scuba diving, and the reefs are at least 15 feet down at high tide. For the rest of the week, the other seven girls (plus or minus a few who had malaria) and I snorkeled our brains out. We learned how to identify fish, find fish cleaning stations (think fish car wash), identify different kinds of swimming methods found in fish and a slew of other amazing things that fish do.

After every dive we were all amazed by the color and complexity of the reef system. Through discussion with locals, we also learned its importance for human subsistence. Everything we learned from snorkeling was used to better understand how people and the marine park could better interact in a non-destructive way. This was all because our program was focused on ecology, and when you think of ecology you have to consider the people who live in the ecosystem as well as all the plants and animals.

We conducted interviews with local fishermen, fisherwomen and old men who liked to reminisce about better fishing days. None of this went flawlessly.

Here is an example to show how clueless we were: While talking to the older men and questioning them about fishing methods, we practiced some new Swahili words that we had picked up for fishing line, fishing boat, spear fishing, etc. Unfortunately, we found out afterwards that instead of saying fishing line (mshipa), we were saying "mshipe," which means testicles. Yes, that's right while talking to important older men of the local village, we asked them if they used to fish with their testicles. We were not as slick as we thought.

Luckily, I think the men just laughed it off as one of the silly mistakes the peculiar white girls made. By the time we left the marine park we really had a good understanding of how ecology, people and the government interact in Tanzania (and many other Third World nations) to try and preserve and live off marine ecosystems.

Malaria Drug Resistance

The last month and a half of my stay in Zanzibar, I worked on my independent study project. My topic was local understanding of malaria and malaria drug resistance. This is an especially important issue since malaria is endemic to Zanzibar and is a major health and economic issue. Without knowledge, prevention and treatment of malaria is difficult.

My study aimed to find out what mothers of children under 5 knew about malaria and malaria drug resistance. I chose to question mothers of children under 5 because those children are the most at risk for getting malaria, and do so many times a year. They are also the majority of the patients at the clinics in Zanzibar.

In order to do my study, I had to get permission from the ministry of health to conduct my survey. This turned out to be one of the most difficult and frustrating jobs of my life. Not only did I get the runaround from almost everyone in the department of health, but my project was delayed two and a half weeks, giving me seven days to conduct my study and about four days to write my 30-page paper.

After two weeks of waiting around offices (and getting more mosquito bites than I care to remember), I finally tracked down Mrs. Mwanapenda, who gave me a letter of permission to visit all of the clinics I wanted. My study was then underway, and I traveled around on the back of my translator's scooter to seven different clinics all around Zanzibar. It was then that I realized I didn't even need the letter to do my survey; just having my translator (who was an employee of the malaria prevention department) was enough to get me into any clinic.

I conducted my surveys inside very crowded clinics and hospitals with screaming and vomiting babies. The experience of being in the clinics has really changed how I view medicine. The clinics were cement buildings with practically no medical equipment except for needles, chloroquine (a malaria drug that is ineffective for 60 percent of the population) and a sterilization pot. The nurses who staffed the clinics worked hard and truly did their best to help their patients. On my visits I saw one boy die, a 12-year-old girl carry her 5-year-old sister outside to vomit, a 4-year-old girl get an IV of quinine (another, more effective, malaria drug) and a slew of screaming crying children, as well as a bunch of calm, bleary-eyed, tired children.

Every mother I talked to was doing her absolute best to care for her children, and they surprised me with their sometimes extensive knowledge of malaria and malaria drug resistance. The experience of relating to these mothers and understanding what they needed from the department of health really moved me; because of it, I have changed my career goals. In the future, I hope to become an international public health specialist. As for now, I just want to share my experience with anyone who is willing to listen. Encourage everyone to go abroad some time in their life and visit a Third World country: It might not be the most relaxing vacation you will ever have, but it will definitely be the most moving.

Trustees to vote on faculty merit system

By Michelle Dombeck
Arts and Entertainment Editor

The trustees will vote on the faculty's proposal for merit salary determinations next week. Although this proposed system is nearly identical to the old merit system, it includes a different rating scale and the addition of an annual teaching review.

Assistant Professor of Chemistry Alison Draper is a member of the task force that has examined this issue. According to Draper, tenured faculty were formerly reviewed triennially.

"The merit system in place from 1998-2001 reviewed all tenured faculty every three years in the areas of teaching, scholarship and service on a scale from 0-4. That sum was used to determine how much merit pay a faculty member got," Draper said.

This old scale was quota-based.

"There were quotas applied to each of the scores in teaching, scholarship and service. Two was said to be the common score, 1 and 3 were uncommon and 0 and 4 were rare. Faculty had to be compared to one another in order to decide which category to put them in," Draper said.

Some faculty members were unhappy with this quota-based scale.

"A score of 2 out of 4, even though it was determined to be the common score, may indicate to some faculty members that they have failed. There was some psychological impact that hadn't been anticipated," Draper said.

"This approach is much less competitive and much more focused on recognizing and rewarding the very high quality of work that is done by the faculty of Bucknell," —Stephen Bowen, provost and vice president for academic affairs

The new proposal would have faculty evaluated on a non quota-based scale of 1-5. Without the quota, faculty members would focus less on competition and more on their individual work.

"In this proposal, faculty would not be compared to each other. Instead, their work would be compared to objective standards of accomplishment," said Stephen Bowen, provost and vice-president for academic affairs. "This approach is much less competitive and much more focused on recognizing and rewarding the very high quality of work that is done by the faculty of Bucknell."

According to Michael Payne, professor of English and chair of the faculty, this new system would, like the old one, examine teaching scholarship and service triennially.

"The three-year cycle is intended to recognize and affirm long-term projects, such as the perfecting of a new course or the completion of a book-length manuscript," Payne said.

One change to the old system is the addition of an annual teaching evaluation, which is not tied to salary.

"Each year every faculty member will submit to the department chair the record of teaching evaluations for the year immediately past," Payne said. "The purpose of these annual submissions is to enable the chair to advise colleagues who are having difficulty with a particular course of the availability of developmental support (such as course-development grants or summer teaching institutes) or other forms of assistance. This annual part of the process, in other words, is intended to emphasize development rather than evaluation."

Although this annual review could catch potential problems more quickly than the old system's triennial review would, Draper feels that there are few problems that go unnoticed.

"We, the members of the task force (which included the two deans and the provost) suspect that there are very few cases that we will

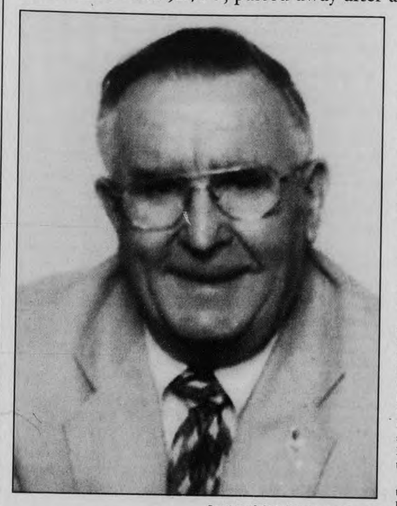
Longtime mayor Hendricks dies

Lewis Hendricks Jr., 75, passed away after acting as Lewisburg mayor for over 30 years



Courtesy of The Milton Standard Journal

Lewis Hendricks Jr. will be remembered fondly by residents of Lewisburg for always having a big smile on his face and for serving the town as mayor for over 30 years. He died last Thursday at Evangelical Community Hospital after falling ill at his home.

By Rachel Laskow
Editor-in-Chief

Lewis Hendricks Jr. passed away on Nov. 7, after serving as mayor of Lewisburg for over 30 years. According to The Daily Item, Hendricks, 75, fell ill at his home and died at Evangelical Community Hospital.

Borough Council President John Baker met Hendricks in the 1960s, when Hendricks was Borough Council president and Baker was mayor. Hendricks became mayor after Baker.

According to Baker, Hendricks was very effective and well-liked.

"He always had a big smile on his face and was always willing to help," Baker said.

One venue in which Hendricks devoted a lot of time was the police department. Police Chief William Neitz Jr. met Hendricks in 1973, and Hendricks was on the hiring board when Neitz began working with the police department. In 1999, when Neitz took over as head of the department, Hendricks became his direct supervisor. According to Neitz, Hendricks helped to improve the technology of the police department.

"He was the biggest advocate of the police department and he was our best friend. He was upbeat on every thing he did," Neitz said.

University General Council Wayne Bromfield also saw Hendricks' contributions to the police department. While Bromfield was judge, Hendricks was mayor and in charge of the Lewisburg Police Department.

"In that capacity, he demanded and supported a proud, honest and thoroughly professional department. To achieve that, he encouraged training, technology and modernization of the force. I am sure his leadership will be missed by all those who worked with him," Bromfield said.

Borough Manager David Clouser also worked closely with Hendricks while developing the Purple Heart Monument, creating Sept. 11 remembrances and planning other community events. Clouser worked closely with Hendricks at Borough Council meetings and will remember Hendricks gentle and warm spirit.

"He was always eager to communicate with everyone on a friendly note," Clouser said.

According to Peter Bergonia, University utilities supervisor and Ward 3 Representative of the Borough Council, Hendricks always had Lewisburg as his main goal and helped out whenever he could. Bergonia also believes Hendricks looked to improve the relationship between the University and the town.

"He was looking at communication to be better between the town and students. Students are here and we have to work with them," Bergonia said.

Before last year's election, Hendricks told The Bucknellian that

Lewisburg residents protest proposed supermarket

Suspected GIANT food market provokes safety and light pollution concerns

By Sandi-Jo Galati

Concerned Lewisburg residents recently formed the Rural Route Neighbors, a steering committee established to express community safety concerns over the reported development of a 54,500 square foot commercial food retailer, suspected to be a GIANT food store, and two other unspecified commercial buildings by the RVG Management and Development Company.

According to steering committee member Violet Gallagher, RVG Management and Development Company submitted a sketch plan to East Buffalo Township, but this plan was withdrawn once townspeople were informed of the plan and began protesting.

"We first learned about the plan from the Lewisburg Journal and also from a realtor, who was telling clients that a GIANT was coming to the area," Gallagher said.

The sketch plan was initially submitted as a Conditional Use Plan, a requirement when more than one building is proposed, to the East Buffalo Township zoning officer, who reviewed the plan and submitted it to the township planning commission. The planning commission then makes a recommendation to the township supervisor and a hearing is held.

The planning commission recommended that the township supervisor accept the plan, but the plan was withdrawn before a public hearing could be held once the townspeople learned of the proposal.

Residents were immediately concerned with the safety issues surrounding the construction of the store, particularly the increase in traffic volume.

"Currently, the University's main concern is the adverse impact of lighting on the observatory. We will be interested in seeing the results of any environmental impact studies that are conducted."
—Jo-Anne Lema, vice president for finance and administration

The sketch plan submitted by RVG Management and Development Company also anticipated an increase in traffic volume, including a proposal for the addition of a traffic light on Route 15 by the Pennsylvania Department of Transportation (PennDot).

One year ago, the proposed building site, at the junction of Route 15 and Beagle Club Road, was partially zoned as residential and highway/commercial land.

The developer has since submitted the application for highway/commercial use, the only document currently under review.

In a letter to the East Buffalo Township supervisors, PennDot District Engineer James L.A. Kendter said, "there are numerous engineering, traffic operation and safety concerns that need to be considered

University's position remains strong in U.S. News

Despite slight drop in U.S. News & World Report rankings, University still at top

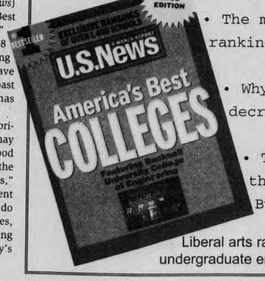
By Jason Rubinstein
Associate Editor

The University's position fell slightly in the rankings published by U.S. News & World Report (U.S. News) in September. The ranking for "Best Liberal Arts Colleges—Bachelor's" fell from 28 to 29, and from 4 to 8 for "Best Undergraduate Engineering Programs." While the rankings have somewhat fluctuated over the past few years, the University has remained fairly stable in its rating.

The University identified two primary areas as to why the ranking may have decreased, despite "all the good things that have happened to the University over the last ten years," according to University President Steffen Rogers. The first had to do with a clerical error in SAT averages, and the second are low annual giving figures relative to the University's peer institutions.

The story behind Bucknell's ranking among best colleges



- The meaning of the rankings
- Why the rankings decreased
- The future of the rankings at Bucknell

Liberal arts ranked at 29 and undergraduate engineering at 8.

The meaning of the rankings

Richard Folkers, director of media relations for U.S. News, said that while the rankings are an important tool for prospective college students, they are not the only tool.

"It's important to note that you'll not hear U.S. News talking about schools that are up or down in a given year. Because we believe there is no such thing as a perfect methodology, we have—and will continue to—make adjustments to our methodology," Folkers said. "Consequently, we don't make year-to-year comparisons, simply because doing so would be meaningless."

Kurt Thiede, University vice president for enrollment management, has a similar reaction to Folkers.

"Because the staff at U.S. News regularly changes the methodology by which schools are measured and ranked, the longitudinal analysis of these rankings can lose meaning," Thiede said. "The schools within Bucknell's classification are all striving on a continual basis to enhance their market positions. These 'moving targets' and the changing methodology make it difficult to make strong data-based comparisons."

There are also some fundamental differences between the liberal arts and engineering rankings. The liberal arts rankings are quantitative (that is, the ranking is determined from a formula using several numerical inputs) and the engineering rankings are based on an opinion poll compiled by academic administrators.

Dean of Engineering James Orbison '75 feels that the College of Engineering's rankings are solid, and the accuracy of the rankings are not guaranteed because they are based on an opinion poll. Two of the college's primary competitor institutions, Lafayette and Villanova, are ranked at 16 and 10, respectively.

"It's fair to say that our ranking has remained very stable over the past several years. We trail, in these rankings, four schools with financial scholarship programs well beyond anything we're able to offer [the three

Public Safety Log

Wednesday, Nov. 6

UNDERAGE CONSUMPTION—Public Safety responded to Vedder Hall for the report of an intoxicated male attempting to gain entry to the building. Upon arrival, Public Safety located the individual and determined he was a student and had consumed alcohol, although under the age of 21. A citation was issued for underage consumption.

MISSING PROPERTY—An employee reported to Public Safety that food and personal items were missing from the custodial break room in Freas Hall. No witnesses or suspects were located. The incident is under investigation.

INFORMATION / EQUIPMENT MALFUNCTION—Public Safety responded to Dana Engineering for a fire alarm activation caused by a piece of equipment that overheated. No damage to the structure occurred. Physical Plant responded to repair the equipment.

VEHICLE STOP / POSSESSION OF FALSE IDENTIFICATION—Public Safety stopped a vehicle on Fraternity Road for failure to stop at a stop sign. Upon investigation, Public Safety identified the driver as a student who had a false identification in his possession. Citations were issued for failure to stop at a stop sign and false identification. The false ID was confiscated.

Thursday, Nov. 7

TAMPERING WITH FIRE EQUIPMENT—Public Safety responded to a fire alarm activation at Sigma Alpha Epsilon Fraternity and discovered that unknown person(s) activated a pull station for no reason. The incident is under investigation.

MEDICAL TRANSPORT—Public Safety responded to Smith Hall for the report of a student with a possible broken wrist. A Student Health Services driver responded and transported the individual to Evangelical Community Hospital Emergency Room for treatment. The student later returned to campus.

Friday, Nov. 8

TAMPERING WITH FIRE EQUIPMENT—Public Safety responded to Roberts Hall for a fire alarm activation. Upon arrival, Public Safety determined that a fire alarm pull station had been activated by unknown person(s) for no reason. The incident is under investigation.

Saturday, Nov. 9

HARASSMENT BY COMMUNICATION—A student reported to Public Safety that she received an e-mail that may violate the University Acceptable Use Policy in her Swartz Hall room. The incident is under investigation.

INFORMATION / FIGHT—Public Safety responded to the Upper Stadium parking lot for the report of a fight in progress. Upon investigation, Public Safety determined the altercation involved a group of alumni that threw a can of beer on a visitor's car. All parties involved agreed to leave the area without further incident.

TAMPERING WITH FIRE EQUIPMENT—Public Safety responded to Kappa Delta Rho Fraternity for a fire alarm activation. Upon arrival, Public Safety determined that a fire extinguisher had been discharged by unknown person(s) for no reason. The incident is under investigation.

INFORMATION / POSSIBLE INTRUDER—Public Safety responded to Kress Hall for the report of an individual climbing into a window. The individual was identified as a visitor with personal belongings in an employee's room. A warning was issued reference entering a University room through a window.

CARRYING FALSE IDENTIFICATION—Public Safety conducted a party check at the Chi Phi Fraternity House and were provided with a false Maine driver's license by a visitor. East Buffalo Township Police were contacted and issued the visitor a citation for a false ID.

PUBLIC DRUNKENNESS / UNDERAGE DRINKING / MEDICAL TRANSPORT—Public Safety responded to Lambda Chi Alpha Fraternity for the report of an ill person. Upon arrival, Public Safety found a highly intoxicated visitor in need of medical attention. The individual was transported to Evangelical Community Hospital Emergency Room for treatment. East Buffalo Township Police cited the individual for public drunkenness and underage drinking.

Sunday, Nov. 10

ASSIST POLICE / PUBLIC DRUNKENNESS—While on routine patrol, Public Safety observed an intoxicated alumnus lying on the road at the Seventh Street House. Lewisburg Police responded and the male was transported to Evangelical Community Hospital Emergency Room for treatment. A citation was issued for public drunkenness.

PUBLIC DRUNKENNESS / UNDERAGE CONSUMPTION—While on routine patrol, Public Safety observed a student with a can of beer, who urinated on a tree and fell against the tree. While Public Safety transported the student to his Phi Gamma Delta Fraternity room, the male spoke to the Public Safety using obscene language. Citations were issued for public urination, public intoxication, underage consumption, open container violation and obscene language.

UNDERAGE DRINKING—During a routine party check, Public Safety observed a student consuming alcohol at Sigma Chi Fraternity. Upon investigation, it was determined that the individual was under the age of 21. A citation was issued for underage drinking.

THEFT—A student reported to Public Safety that unknown person(s) removed $250 in cash from her wallet in her unlocked, empty Vedder Hall room. Lewisburg Police were contacted. The incident is under investigation.

MEDICAL TRANSPORT—A student requested transportation to Evangelical Community Hospital Emergency Room for treatment of an eye injury. A Student Health Services driver responded and transported the individual, who later returned to campus.

MEDICAL TRANSPORT—An employee reported to Public Safety that a student was transported by a friend to Evangelical Community Hospital Emergency Room for treatment from a fall, in which she struck her head. The individual later returned to campus.

Monday, Nov. 11

CRIMINAL MISCHIEF—An employee reported to Public Safety that unknown person(s) poured beer and placed toilet paper and beer cans on the floor of a Library restroom. The incident is under investigation.

THEFT—A student reported to Public Safety that unknown person(s) entered his unsecured room at Lambda Chi Alpha Fraternity and removed his hockey jersey. East Buffalo Township Police were notified. The incident is under investigation.

CRIMINAL MISCHIEF—An employee reported to Public Safety that unknown person(s) smashed the sign light located at the front of Newman House. The incident is under investigation.

MEDICAL TRANSPORT—A student requested transportation to Evangelical Community Hospital Emergency Room for treatment of flu-like symptoms. The student had been treated the previous day for the same symptoms and her condition had not changed. A Student Heath Services driver responded and transported the student, who later returned to campus.

Tuesday, Nov. 12

MEDICAL TRANSPORT—A student contacted Public Safety and requested transportation to Student Health Services for a hand injury that occurred at the Art Barn. Public Safety transported the student and she later returned to the Art Barn.

THEFT—A student reported to Public Safety that unknown person(s) removed two silver rings from an empty private carrel in the library. East Buffalo Township Police were notified. The incident is under investigation.

he would encourage residents, business and University and Borough officials to have quarterly meetings to discuss problems and issues for the betterment of all concerned.

"Meetings with Bucknell Student Council members, the chief of police and the mayor would be exceptionally productive for all parties concerned," Hendricks said.

In last year's election, Hendricks defeated Democrat Mike Molesevich and Nathan Sorber '02.

"It was the most exciting race in my 30 years as a public official. It was the best one I've ever had. It was a good win," Hendricks told The Bucknellian after last year's election.

Baker, who knew Hendricks for about 32 years, is currently acting as mayor and Borough Council president until the Council fills the vacancy. According to Baker, elected candidates for mayor will possibly be presented to the Council at its Nov. 19 meeting and the council members will then vote on the new mayor.

Hendricks served on the Lewisburg Borough Council from 1970-77, acting as president from 1972-76. He was mayor of Lewisburg from 1978-1993 and from 1996 until his death last week. Hendricks was also a Council member from 1996-97.

Hendricks also worked as a Wal-Mart greeter and worked at Pennsylvania Power and Light until his retirement in 1990.

According to many of his co-workers, Hendricks's energy and dedication will be missed.

"As a mayor and citizen, he personified his vision of the spirit of Lewisburg—welcoming, helpful, good-humored and dedicated to the betterment of the borough," Bromfield said.

Police arrest two in robbery case

Two men were arrested Wednesday evening on Moore Avenue in connection with an armed-robbery that occurred at Bison Beverage earlier that night. Though the men were taken into custody by police on University property, they are not suspected to be University students.

Risk of meningitis increases on college campuses nationwide

Law requires that Pa. college students be given choice to receive vaccination

By Chris Styers
Senior Writer

All Pennsylvania colleges and universities are now required to "provide to students and parents detailed information on the risks associated with meningococcal disease and the availability and the effectiveness of any vaccine ... prior to the student residing in a college owned dormitory or housing unit." These institutions must also provide a wavier to students, verifying which students have received a vaccination, which students intend to do so and which ones have made an educated decision not to be vaccinated.

Shortly after the law was passed, Bucknell sent out information packets to incoming first-year students, as well as upperclassmen. The packets included a copy of the state's requirements, information on the meningitis disease and information on how to receive a meningitis vaccine.

According to WNEP-TV, a fifth grader attending Valley View Intermediate School in Lackawanna County, Pa., died last weekend from a rare form of meningitis.

Absenteeism increased five-fold on Tuesday in the Valley View School District, as parents of the almost 700 students were concerned enough about the risk their children had of contracting meningitis to keep them home.

The concern displayed by parents is the same concern facing many first-year college students and their families. For the first time, many students enter an environment with potentially elevated risks for contracting meningitis.

Many state legislatures have been responding to the increase in meningitis concerns. Over the summer, the Pennsylvania state legislature took steps to disseminate information on the dangers of meningitis and promote the meningitis vaccine. First-year college students in particular were targeted, in accordance with recommendations made by the Center for Disease Control and Prevention (CDC) and the American College Health Association (ACHA).

"I feel that raising student awareness about diseases is good, though these notices should not be limited to just meningitis. It is important that the University allow the student to make the decision to be vaccinated for any disease. I think that informing students and allowing them to decide is the key to developing informed, responsible citizens who understand personal freedom," Steve Connor '04 said.

There has been such a surge for the meningitis vaccine that some pharmacies are hard-pressed to meet the demand.

During the fall semester, Student Health Services has encouraged receiving the immunization, which is good for four years, and set up four weeks in which students could get the immunization for $85.

Assistant Director for Student Health Services Nancy Shuck said that the majority of student have had, or want to have, the immunization. She also said graduate students have not expressed as much interest in the vaccination because most of them no longer live on campus, therefore lowering their risk of contracting the disease.

According to the CDC's Web site, meningitis can be caused by either a virus or a bacterium, an important difference in determining the type of illness and the appropriate treatment. Viral meningitis is often less severe, while bacterial meningitis poses a number of risks, including death. Neisseria meningitidis is the main cause of bacterial meningitis in children and young adults in the United States. This form of meningitis causes inflammation of the meninges, the membranous layers surrounding the brain and spinal cord.

According to the ACHA, about 3,000 Americans contract the meningococcal disease annually, and about 10-15 percent of the cases are fatal. Of the 3,000 Americans that contract the disease, approximately 100-125 of these cases are found on college campuses, with 5-15 of those cases proving fatal. For those that survive, the disease has a number of adverse effects, such as permanent brain damage, hearing loss, learning disabilities, limb amputation, kidney failure or death.

Meningitis Facts

—First-year college students living in dormitories run a risk six times as great as other college students to contract the disease

—Meningitis can be viral (generally less severe) or bacterial (sometimes fatal)

—Meningitis is airborne and can be spread through coughing or sneezing, or through close contact with an infected person

Symptoms

—High fever, headaches, neck stiffing, confusion, nausea, vomiting, lethargy and rashes

The people at the highest risk are those with upper respiratory infections, those with compromised immune systems and people traveling to parts of the world where meningitis is a major problem. College students are also at a higher risk, especially those living on campus in dormitories. Further research made by the CDC suggests that first-year students in dormitories have six times the chance of contracting the disease than other college students.

According to ABC News, what puts students in dormitories at a greater risk is not completely known. Some reports suggest that the crowded living arrangements, stress and indulging in behavior such as smoking and drinking increase risks of contracting the virus. The most recent CDC study suggests that first-year student risk factors are higher because students are exposed to the disease more often.

The bacteria responsible for meningitis are transmitted through the air by respiratory secretions (coughing or kissing, for example) or through prolonged contact with an infected person. According to the CDC, meningitis is not as contagious as the common cold or the flu. Anybody who comes in close contact with an infected person is encouraged to be examined and treated with antibiotics to prevent the spread of the disease.

Sometimes meningitis can be difficult to diagnose because its symptoms closely resemble symptoms of the flu. Symptoms can include high fever, headaches, neck stiffing, confusion, nausea, vomiting, lethargy and rashes. A physician should be immediately contacted at the onset of these symptoms, because the disease can work rapidly and result in death within hours.

A meningitis vaccine is readily available and has been proven to vastly improve chances of avoiding infection. Over the last several years, educating the public about the problems associated with meningitis and publicizing the availability of a vaccine has been a national prerogative.

FCC approves AT&T-Comcast merger

WASHINGTON—The $29.2 billion merger of Comcast and AT&T Broadband was approved by federal regulators Wednesday, clearing the way for creation of the nation's largest cable television company.

U.S. bishops give OK to revised sex-abuse policy

WASHINGTON—Rejecting criticism that the proposal was watered down by the Vatican, U.S. Roman Catholic bishops on Wednesday endorsed a revised sex-abuse policy that aims to rid the clergy of molesters. The bishops voted 246-7 with six abstentions to approve the new plan, which stipulates that priests should be removed from public ministry—celebrating Mass, teaching in Catholic schools, wearing a Roman collar—after "even one act of sexual abuse of a minor."

Iraq accepts U.S. weapons resolution

UNITED NATIONS— Iraq, facing a Friday deadline and the threat of war, accepted a tough new U.N. resolution that will return weapons inspectors to the country after nearly four years, the country's U.N. ambassador said Wednesday. Baghdad's approval of the resolution means inspectors should be on the ground in Iraq within a matter of days, although testing Saddam Hussein's compliance could take months.

Experts believe bin Laden tape is authentic

U.S. intelligence officials have determined that the voice on an audiotape broadcast on an Arabic television network is that of Osama bin Laden. The disclosure, during the runup to a possible U.S. military campaign in Iraq, highlighted one of the most significant loose ends from Afghanistan, the first stop in the war on terrorism and the last known location of bin Laden. On Wednesday, President George W. Bush bristled when asked if the leader of al-Qaida should have been captured sooner. "We're making great progress on the war on terrorism," he said. "Slowly but surely, we're dismantling the terrorist network."

Democrats choose Boston as next convention city

WASHINGTON—A political center since Colonial times, Boston won its first presidential convention Wednesday after rigorous lobbying by state Democrats and the promise of millions in corporate cash.

American businesses flock to China

SHANGHAI, China— For the first time ever, China has surpassed the United States as the most attractive destination for foreign direct investment. Those investments are expected to top $50 billion by the end of the year. U.S. firms alone invested $35 billion in the middle kingdom last year. These days you'll find many American corporations represented in China. But while U.S. companies have been eager to capitalize on China's economic growth, some have been more successful than others.

Palace probe being called a coverup

LONDON—British royalty was accused of orchestrating a coverup Wednesday as critics scorned a new inquiry into claims of rape, fraud and impropriety by palace staff as a whitewash. Royal secretary Sir Michael Peat is to head the internal investigation into alleged irregularities by Prince Charles's retinue in the worst scandal to hit the House of Windsor since the family's marriage bust-ups in the 1990s.

West Nile virus found in Florida alligators

MIAMI—Epidemiologists found the West Nile virus in three farm-raised Florida alligators, marking the first time the potentially deadly virus has been found in a U.S. reptile species, health officials said on Wednesday.

U.S. to protect Florida reefs from ships

WASHINGTON—Marking the first such protection in U.S. waters, the Bush administration on Wednesday created an internationally recognized protective zone around 2,600 square miles of coral reefs, sea grass meadows and mangrove forests off the Florida Keys. The zone aims to shield the area from large ships, which can do considerable damage via collisions, groundings and even the simple act of anchoring.

Holocaust survivor speaks about forgiveness

Kor addresses campus about experiences at Auschwitz, lessons she learned

By Elisabeth Salemme
Staff Writer

Holocaust survivor Eva Mozes Kor spoke to the University community last Wednesday about her experiences in the Auschwitz death camp. Kor and her twin sister, Miriam Mozes Zeiger, were deported to Auschwitz when they were 9 years old, and Dr. Joseph Mengele, a Nazi doctor, experimented on them.

"In 1944, my sister and I became human guinea pigs," Kor said. "I am going to tell you about my journey from tragedy to triumph, from hell to healing."

In 1944, Kor and her family were living in Transylvania before the family was taken by the Nazis to different concentration camps. Eva and her sister were immediately separated from their family and taken to Auschwitz because they were twins. During the Holocaust, twins were experimented on for scientific and medical purposes. The Kor twins joined a group with eight other sets of twins.

"We were only kept alive because Dr. Mengele wanted to use us as experiments," Kor said. "I did whatever was in my power to ensure Miriam and I didn't die ... I focused all my power on survival, but it took up every ounce of energy to survive one more day and one more experiment. In this situation we were totally at the mercy of the Nazi doctors."

At one point during her imprisonment in Auschwitz, Kor became ill after an experiment and was sent to a hospital. According to Kor, if patients in the hospital did not recover within two weeks, they would be killed.

"I refused to die," she said. "I made a silent pledge that I would survive. I was not given food, water or medication. I kept telling myself, 'I must survive.'"

Kor describes most of the experiments performed on her and her twin as "not very dangerous, but they were unbelievably demeaning. The experiments made me feel like a piece of meat."

According to Kor, one type of experiment that did pose a threat was a blood lab, when blood was taken out of the twins' bodies and they were injected with germs and chemicals.

Despite the horrors Kor endured, she said she learned three important life lessons.

"The first lesson I learned is to never, ever give up. No matter how difficult your circumstances are, they could never be as difficult as ours. I know growing up is very difficult, but if you keep hammering away at your problems, you will triumph," Kor said.

The second lesson Kor said she learned is to treat all human beings with respect and to judge humans only by their actions and by the content of their characters.

"Hatred and prejudice were the reasons the Holocaust was possible," Kor said.

Finally, Kor has forgiven the Nazis for what they had done. Justice, Kor said, is never possible, and forgiveness is the only realistic form of healing.

"I now realize that I have the power to forgive, and no one can take that away from me," Kor said.

> "I now realize that I have the power to forgive, and no one can take that away from me. I say to everyone, forgive your worst enemies. You will save yourself."
> —Eva Mozes Kor

"I say to everyone, forgive your worst enemies. You will save yourself. My latest thoughts on how to heal pain from the past is to try and keep the world at peace. Facilitating people to forgive their enemies is an act of self-healing. I hope in some small way you find a message of forgiveness, peace, hope and healing."

Her message of forgiveness was one of the deciding factors in inviting Kor to the University.

"Hillel decided to invite Kor first because she is a Holocaust survivor with an unusual story—that of being part of the twins experiments by Joseph Mengele, and secondly because she has an unusual message for survivor forgiveness," Rabbi Serena Fujita said.

"Her story was important so that we do not forget the terrible things that were done to the Jewish people as well as to other marginalized people in the Third Reich. I think what was even more interesting to our students was her second part—the part about forgiveness. She recounted how she came to forgive her tormentors—a long and difficult process and something she came to after many years."

Kor said many of the other twins who have been located, and with whom she has spoken, are angry at her for her decision to forgive the Nazis. Kor said it is difficult for any of the Holocaust survivors to forgive, but she believes they will benefit from trying to do so.

"This is not an easy message for many to hear, since it is so very different from what most of the survivors feel. Even someone as well-known and well-published as Elie Wiesel in his writings and speaking engagements, says he cannot forgive the Nazis for what they did to him, his family and the Jewish people. She shared that her message is not one that is welcomed among other survivors," Fujita said.

The primary reason Kor chose to begin a process of forgiving is because she met a Nazi doctor who expressed extreme remorse for what happened.

"I respect that Ms. Kor can look at her tormentors and forgive them. I do not think she would have been able to do this without the kindness of the particular doctor whom she contacted who was very tortured by what he had done during the war. Had she encountered a doctor who was not troubled by what he had done, I think her story would be quite different," Fujita said.

Kor said her decision to forgive was in part a way of coping with some of her pain.

"Now I don't feel as a victim—I feel as an equal. I am a lot stronger. People who are seeking revenge are the ones with anger and hatred. If you do or don't do something, you still have pain. The ultimate question is: How do you get rid of that pain?"

Kor founded the group "C.A.N.D.L.E.S.," which stands for "Children of Auschwitz Nazi Lab Experiment Survivors," in 1984. Kor and her sister, who is now deceased, attempted to find and reunite the twins of Auschwitz. It was from that hope that C.A.N.D.L.E.S. was formed and through the organization, 125 of the Mengele twin survivors were reunited in Israel.

Also through C.A.N.D.L.E.S., a museum was set up in Terre Haute, Ind., with the purpose of telling the story of the Holocaust and the stories of Auschwitz and the Mengele twins. The C.A.N.D.L.E.S. museum is supported through donations and through the sale of Kor's biography, "Echoes from Auschwitz," and her children's book, "Little Eva and Miriam in the First Grade."

Kor's speech at the University will be part of a PBS documentary about herself and the other Mengele twins.

"They have already filmed Kor at Auschwitz, where she told her story among the buildings that were her prison for the time she was there. There is also footage of the German government apologizing to the victims of the twins' experiments," Fujita said. "There are also testimonies from other surviving twins about how they have been shocked at Eva's document of forgiveness. It should be quite an amazing story."

Greening

mation of the Bucknell University Greening Task Force. The committee was established to serve as a clearinghouse for ecological issues on the campus to make recommendations to the president for the short-term and long-term changes regarding the environment.

After relatively easy initial changes were made, the committee was faced with more difficult challenges, and in the past five years little progress has been made.

The task force, renewed by the support of Rogers and several faculty, staff and students, has recently been coming together to initiate plans to make the University a "greener" campus.

"When I first arrived, we had a false start," Rogers said. "But now I see that 10 years from now this could become a very comprehensive program."

The committee already has made some important adjustments to the campus that save money and have ecological benefits. They provided input and perspective for the University's $5 million cogeneration plant, a power plant that circulates the heat made as a byproduct of the production of electricity back into the University's heating system instead of dissipating it back into the atmosphere.

Under the committee, the campus also has purchased wind power and hybrid gas-electric cars, reduced the amount of chemicals in the pesticides the campus uses, increased green space around the campus and started the recycling program.

The task force still has many goals it wishes to see fulfilled, such as a marked increase in recycling, more walkways and less roads on campus, a reduction of paper use at lab printers, more ecologically aware buildings and less overall electricity used.

"All these actions will economically and environmentally benefit the University," said Ben Marsh, professor of geography and environmental studies and member of the greening task force. "And if we could reduce waste to begin with, we wouldn't need to invest the time and money that recycling requires."

In moving forward for the future, the task force is also looking into acquiring a composter for the University to save money on fertilizer and landfill waste expenses.

"I think investing money in short-term projects will pay off more in the long run," Warren Abrahamson, professor of biology and member of the greening task force said.

Most of the work done by the committee has been done largely on a volunteer basis. Unless a more structured approach is organized, the environmental welfare of the campus will not improve.

"The committee needs a formal connection to the institution where someone has the responsibility to answer to the committee's needs," Marsh said. "What we do with our campus says who we are, and treating the Earth correctly makes a statement about the responsibility of our University."

Evaluations

catch through this yearly review of teaching that we didn't already know about," Draper said. "Students are very good about reporting to department chairs and deans, and word gets around. If a faculty member is having a bad semester, generally people know about it. I don't know how much is going unnoticed at this point, but I guess it will take a couple years of the system to find out."

Bowen is fairly confident that the trustees will approve this proposal.

"I'm hopeful that the trustees will approve the proposal. It is very nearly identical to the program we had before, except that the criteria for evaluation are more appropriate to the expectations and aspirations that we have for Bucknell faculty," Bowen said.

University not ranked as high as last year service academies and Cooper Union], two technical institutes and a California school (Harvey Mudd)," Orbison said.

Why the rankings decreased

The University claims that there was a clerical error in filling out the survey that contains the inputs for the rankings. U.S. News evaluates SAT scores differently based on whether or not international students' scores are included. The University did not check the box that said its scores included international students' scores when completing the survey, which skewed the results so that the University's mean SAT score appeared lower than usual because it actually did include international students' scores. The end result was a 10 percent reduction in one of the "competition" indicators.

"The clerical error was an honest one that cost us a penalty of selectivity," Thiede said. "Follow-up conversations with the magazine's editor confirmed that because of the number of schools at the No. 29 position, it was unlikely that our overall rank among the Top 50 would have improved if this error had not occurred."

The University's selectivity rating was 35, a drop from 26 in the 2001 rankings. Selectivity includes SAT averages and acceptance rate, among other criteria.

While U.S. News Director of Data Research Bob Morse admits that the University would not have improved overall had the error not occurred, he said that it would have improved relative to other schools in the top 50.

"Technically, Bucknell would still have been 29, but the schools that it's tied with would now be 30," Morse said. "Bucknell would then be alone at 29, or possibly improved enough to be tied at 28."

Thiede claims that the "situation has been remedied for the future."

According to Rogers, annual giving is a category that could boost up the University's rankings because it is below what it should be and below its peer schools.

Last year, gifts from alumni, parents and friends totaled $24.6 million, nearly $6.3 million of which was raised through the annual giving program. Annual gifts offset tuition increases and are used for current operations at the University.

"It's very important for our alumni, parents and friends to know that all gifts, at all sizes, are essential to the University," said Ann DiStefano, director of annual giving and parents giving programs. "Last year a little over 38 percent of our alumni made a gift to Bucknell."

DiStefano believes that the University can do better with annual giving, and will need to continue educating alumni of the importance of giving back each year.

Annual giving is one of the only "output," or satisfaction, variables used in the rankings, which makes the assumption that satisfied alumni will donate more.

Washington Monthly has criticized alumni donations as an unreliable measure of satisfaction because it "depends in large part on alumni wealth and how many pesky sophomores man phone banks in exchange for pizza and T-shirts" and less on the true satisfaction of alumni.

The future of the rankings

Senior members of the administration, including Rogers and Thiede, believe that only 20 percent of prospective students actually read the rankings. According to the Chronicle of Higher Education, "only 20 percent of students who planned to enroll at four-year colleges looked at any college rankings, and only a small fraction of those considered those rankings in choosing an institution."

"Even the U.S. News staff in public presentations have cited research that indicates the magazine's limited impact on college choice," Thiede said.

Although there is no plan to "chase rankings," the administration will continue to do its best to market the University to its full potential.

"I believe that Bucknell must be diligent in reporting its information to U.S. News and make certain that all our marketing communications enhance and strengthen the University's reputation among its various constituencies," Thiede said.

Otherwise, the administration is very confident with the University in general.

"Personally, I'm convinced that our engineering programs provide an engineering education that is as good as the very best in the country," Orbison said. In fact, the College, in its own assessment process, surveys the "end users," or employers, of its graduates, which have yielded encouraging results.

"I do believe the rankings are important, but we don't want to chase them," Rogers said. "However, we have a wonderful story to tell and we need to do a better job of telling it."

"The clerical error was an honest one that cost us a penalty of selectivity."

Proposal for new stores draws concern from University and town

prior to the issuance of a Highway Occupancy Permit for any development at this location."

According to Gallagher, Frank Lewis, the owner of the land, previously assured residents that should a commercial building be constructed on the site there would be no access points to the site from Beagle Club Road.

The sketch plan submitted by RVG Management and Developing Company depicted two entrances to the store from Beagle Club Road.

Residents are concerned that tractor-trailers servicing the store from Beagle Club Road to these entrances will be a hazard to area residents due to the narrow, curvy nature of the road.

Illumination of the 24-hour store is an additional concern, both by residents living in Fox Hollow, a development only 200 feet from the site, and the University.

The proximity of the development to the University is a potential problem due to the light pollution that the store would generate, affecting the observatory.

According to Vice President for Finance and Administration Jo-Anne Lema, the University has not taken an official position on the store, but is concerned about the impact on the observatory.

"Currently, the University's main concern is the adverse impact of lighting on the observatory," Lema said. "We will be interested in seeing the results of any environmental impact studies that are conducted."

The physics department wrote a letter to the East Buffalo Township supervisors expressing concern about the limitations they may result from the store.

"Poorly designed lighting may reduce our ability to observe in the direction of the development (southwest, from the observatory,) and may limit some of the labs we conduct as part of the curricular program in astronomy," Associate Professor of Physics Ned Ladd said.

According to Ladd, the problem could be alleviated with cooperation between the University and the builder in installing special lighting.

"Responsible lighting installations are only marginally more expensive than traditional lighting, and much if not all of the cost of such installations is made up in reduced energy use over subsequent years," Ladd said.

Due to the location of the site at peak of a hill, water runoff is another potential problem. According to Gallagher, residents are concerned that the ground will not be able to support the increased water runoff from the hill due to the amount of land that will be covered with asphalt.

According to Gallagher, residents expect that their initial protest was not enough to deter the project and suspect that the RVG Management and Development Company soon will submit the second plan.

Gallagher anticipates that this plan, unlike the first, will be a Development Plan, which does not require a public hearing for approval.

In preparation, the members of Rural Route Neighbors are waiting for the results of ground-water and traffic-impact studies and organizing a course of action for once the second plan is submitted.

"We are staying alert and doing what we can," Gallagher said. "We would be much more amenable to a project that does not draw as much traffic."

According to East Buffalo Township Supervisor Henry Baylor there has yet to be an application for a GIANT supermarket. Although rumored to be a GIANT, there has been no official confirmation of the retailer, only that it is a grocery store.

"This is a concept," Baylor said. "The developer is only requesting approval to put something on the land."

The Rural Route Neighbors believe differently based on the sketch plan.

"GIANT keeps saying they are not coming in, but our reason for believing that they are is that GIANT is written on the sketch plan," Gallagher said.

Baylor explained that although the supposition is logical that plan is for a GIANT, but he stressed that the plan is in its "infancy" and suggested that the developer was simply using a sketch from a previous plan.

"The only thing I can say is that there was a sign on the plan that could have been anything," Baylor said.

According to Gallagher, both GIANT and RVG have firmly denied that the plan is for a GIANT supermarket.

Public Relations Representative Denny Hopkins admitted that a GIANT food store in Lewisburg has been a topic of research by the administrative office.

"We have been interested in the Lewisburg market or several years," Hopkins said. "There is a gap that we fill between the Shamokin Dam and Selinsgrove store and the store in Williamsport."

Hopkins denied that any final plans had been made for a location or building plan in Lewisburg.

Commercial development could have negative impact on University

Recent reports of a supermarket, suspected to be a GIANT food store, and two other unspecified commercial buildings by the RVG Management and Development Company has created concern among Lewisburg residents, as well as the University community. Although another grocery store would provide more options, it is not necessary for the development or success of the area.

One of the biggest concerns that residents have is safety. The stores would potentially be built at the junction of Route 15 and Beagle Club Road. The addition of these buildings would be likely to increase the amount of traffic, and therefore the addition of traffic lights.

The safety issue extends to the University. The potential store would not be too far from McDonnell Hall and Swartz Hall. These dorms house primarily first-year students, and because first-year students are not permitted to have cars on campus, they might be tempted to cross Route 15 to go grocery shopping. This could be very dangerous because of the amount of traffic and because cars traveling on Route 15 will not be able to see students due to of the dramatic incline in the road. Also, if the store were open 24 hours, students might attempt to cross Route 15 during the night, when cars would have difficulty seeing pedestrians.

The University has witnessed tragedy in the past because of the dangers of Route 15, resulting in the construction of the underpass leading to Bucknell West. Students who might be traveling to the proposed construction site are not likely to use the tunnel though.

Currently, most residents of Lewisburg and University students use Weis to complete their grocery shopping. Although an additional grocery store would provide another option so that savvy shoppers could compare prices and have more variety, it is not essential. The community is already self-sufficient and does need another grocery store to survive. Perhaps the land could serve a more beneficial purpose.

A 24-hour store may potentially interrupt use of the observatory as well. The physics department has expressed concern because the light from the store could hinder people's ability to clearly see the night sky in that direction. This could also impact the physics department's curriculum because it would not be able to hold the same night labs as it currently does. We encourage the new development to use responsible lighting to minimize the negative effects it could have on the observatory.

Besides interfering with the night sky, a grocery store would put a damper the area's beauty. The area close to the construction site is currently residential. The new buildings will detract from the small town atmosphere of Lewisburg. Also, the University prides itself on its beauty. By creating these stores, people coming to the University would see the commercial development rather than the current quaintness of the area.

Although commercial development has promise for the area because it will provide more options for residents and students, RVG Management and Development Company should really consider what should go in the allotted space.

The proposed construction will impact academics and, most importantly, the welfare of students at the University. It is imperative that the University takes a proactive role in opposing the development plans to preserve the function of the observatory, the safety of the students and the aesthetic character of the University.

Muppet helps children to learn about reality of AIDS

To the Editor:

Elisabeth Salemme's opinion piece entitled "World's First HIV Positive Muppet Makes Appearance" greatly disturbed me. It is ironic that it was printed in the same edition that carried a front-page story on "The Real World." Please allow me to share with fellow Bucknellians a bit of the real world live from South Africa.

South African pre-school children are surrounded by HIV/AIDS. They cannot hide from it. Kami, the world' first HIV positive Muppet on "Sesame Street," is not prematurely exposing children to anything they don't know.

Pre-school children in South Africa may not know what to call it, but they know something is taking their parents and friends away from them. They are scared. Nobody will talk about it, except for Kami.

For many children, Kami is the probably the only person who tells the truth. Kami tells children that it's OK to play with a friend who is living with HIV.

It's OK to be sad when you lose your mom. You don't have to hide anything. You can talk about it.

Congratulations to "Sesame Street" for bringing Kami into the lives of South Africa's children. The more we are honest with ourselves, and our children, the better we will be able to cope with this devastating situation.

Facts (1):

Over 3.5 million people in South Africa are infected with HIV (equal to the population of Connecticut). This number is expected to double in the next decade.

By 2005 there will be more than 800,000 orphans (equal to 225 times the University's student body). The number of orphans will be more than 1.95 million in 2010 (equal to 550 times the Bucknell student body).

Some more facts from a survey of 700 families affected by HIV/AIDS (2):

More than half the affected families do not have enough food and are forced to watch their children go hungry.

Almost a quarter of all children under 15 in the survey had already lost at least one parent.

In 12 percent of households, children were sent away to live elsewhere; in 8 percent, children under 18 were the primary caregivers; and 25 percent of the caregivers were over 60.

Only about 50 percent of the respondents acknowledged publicly that the sick person they were caring for had HIV/AIDS; one in 10 reported hostility and rejection.

Sincerely,
Jeanne Hoerter (Platt, '92)

Management 101 much more than a 'group of solicitors'

To the Editor:

The LC mall has been overwhelmed these past two weeks with Management 101 companies urging students and faculty to buy their products. Whether it is BU scarves, T-shirts, playing cards or Nalgene bottles, many people look at these companies as nothing more than a group of solicitors trying to make a profit. Behind each business product, however, lies a service project that is in need of community service. This year's MG 101 Company "A Bottle for Ronald" has decided upon a mission to help the families of Ronald McDonald House (RMH) in Danville through the sale of BU Nalgene bottles. Due to massive renovations occurring at the house during the months of October and November, families currently living in the house will be without a functioning cooking facility for this time period. To meet the needs of these families, our company prepared and served a series of six meals for RMH during the first two weeks of November. Providing a warm-felt home-cooked meal, not only took away the additional expense and time commitment needed to prepare a meal, but allowed families to spend as much time with their loved ones as possible.

The Ronald McDonald House in Danville provides a "home away from home" for the parents and families of children hospitalized or undergoing treatment of cancer and other serious illnesses. While their children are receiving treatment at Geisinger Medical Center in Danville, families are provided with not only the opportunity for affordable lodging and warm meals, but also a nourishing environment where families in similar situations can receive additional support and strength from one another. It is amazing to see families walk in the door, drained after a long day at the hospital, and have their faces light up when they see a warm dinner already prepared for them. On behalf of our entire company, I would like to give a special thanks to Dining Services, Wal-Mart and Weis for their generous donations as well as Bucknell students and faculty for their support. Dining Services, especially the help of General Manager of Dining Services Timothy Tenon, Mark Wirtz and Rick Slear, has been a tremendous help in donating food and cooking facilities for our use. Beyond the wonderful donation of food for two meals to Ronald McDonald house, Mr. Tim Tenon and the rest of the Dining Service team has been absolutely amazing in their cooperation with our company.

Sincerely,
Christine Hebling '05

Bill Kenny a hidden gem at University

To the Editor:

If you missed last Friday night's concert—"Music of America, Pennsylvania and Bucknell" you missed one of the finest concerts that my wife, Elizabeth '59 and I have ever attended at the University.

We have been coming back to University for every Homecoming for the past 12 or more years and attended almost every Parents Weekend, when our son, John '94 was on campus and we just can't ever remember a more stirring performance by any group. And to top it off, it was free.

University has a real hidden gem in Director of Bands and Associate Music Professor Bill Kenny. The program that was a part of the performance gave an outstanding explanation of the music. The presentation of our "Star Spangled Banner" was outstanding. The students performed with energy and zest; you can see how Bill brings out the absolute best in each and every performer.

Great concert Bill—let's have more of the same.

Sincerely,
Steve and Betsy '59 Foster

BUCC just wants freedom

To the Editor:

Jacksy Jiang's article, "Conservatives Club's attention-getting mechanisms similar to Eminem" hits one of the key points the Bucknell Conservative Club (BUCC) has been arguing for: freedom. Whether it be freedom of choice or freedom of speech this club stands for all the freedoms that the United States' foundation for existence. Towards the end of his article, Jiang states, "If the BUCC irritates you, why not just ignore it?" This small, yet extremely powerful sentence defines our freedom of choice. If you don't like something, don't give it any attention, and especially don't run to the dean of students to fix the situation. In the real world, a "dean of students" figure does not exist to solve your problems, so you should simply ignore it. In the real world, people can say whatever they want, so you must learn how to deal with racist idiots without administrative help.

Thank you for showing the University they have the freedom of choice. As for your reasoning behind your argument, that is, the BUCC makes arguments "not for the sake of arguing, but purely for the sake of drawing attention," you couldn't be more wrong. If you knew, or even talked to, cause it is apparent by your article you haven't, BUCC President Denise Chaykun '04 or "Counterweight" Editor Charles Mitchell '05, you would learn all they want to do is create a political dialogue on this campus including conservative thought. As for "drawing reactions," you must be referring to the Swastika drawn on a BUCC member's door last year, or the other numerous character defaming acts against the individuals of the BUCC that have happened over the last few months. My guess is they do not like this, nor do they act to encourage more of it.

Finally, as for what you claim is "strange, somewhat illogical, radical and offensive arguments," you should realize the conservative viewpoint is none of these, as America's voters turned out in mass to give the Senate back to the Republicans, and maintain the Republican advantage in the House and in the governorship. The American public must be strongly embracing conservativism if they GAVE power to the president in the midterm election. Granted, you may laugh at conservativism if you want, you may call it a "source of comic relief"; it is your choice to do so, but do realize it is for real.

Sincerely,
Andy Findlay '03

Democratic Party needs to improve political agenda

By Michael Niebauer
Senior Writer

This last election was not the end of the world for those of the Democratic Party or those aligned with the many causes closely connected to political left in this country. Before Democrats begin to assess the nature of their post-election blues and replenish themselves for the next challenge in two years Democrats and liberals must admit a few things about President George W. Bush.

Bush has succeeded in this off-year election in loosening himself from any doubts that his presidency is not legitimate and has the added aspect of historic popularity among the voting public. November must have become Bush's favorite month in recent years.

The simple facts that the Republicans have added to majorities in the House and won the Senate are proof enough. A troubled economy complete with corporate scandals amid trillions in losses in the stock market is proof that Bush also knows how to take advantage of adversity, which came with the 9/11 attacks. Knowing that the American people rally around the president during national crises the Republicans have pushed many measures through Congress that would not have made it otherwise.

The seeds of the Democratic losses this fall were in the bi-partisan nature of the too swift passage of tax cut legislation and other measures that passed congress with too little consideration in the nervous weeks after the attacks.

The table was set and the Republicans ate their fill as the president received the credit and public approval for effectiveness in the war on terror. The recent election success began in this time, with fear that still has not worn off. The bill we will all have to pay has yet to arrive from that expensive banquet of defense spending increases and tax cuts targeted for the well off top 5 percent of the population.

The president had an approval rating of 49-50 percent before Sept. 11. Democrats should accept their temporary fate as the minority and embrace the opportunity by remembering the pre-Sept. 11 approval rating. Now, in victory, the president and Republicans will have to produce measurable results. In this new political environment, Democrats should respond by taking political advantage of new strategies and opportunities in the face of the new Republican preeminence.

The economy and the disappearing budget surplus linked together will be a drag in the second two years of the Bush presidency. The embarrassment of the Harvey Pitt resignation from the Securities and Exchange Commission and the general ineffectiveness of the Bush administration's economic team are targets to be exploited by any opponent that was ever awake in an economics class. If economic stimulus was a prescribed drug for the economy the needle must be firmly attached to an entire fleet of oil tankers and it is still missing the needy vein.

The Federal Reserve is running low on the interest rate reduction drug and must soon be ready to send interest rates rising once again, which will be another economic drag to our anemic economy. The president still wants to look into partially privatizing social security and making permanent last year's badly targeted tax cut. These are all problems or opportunities depending on how you look at them. The advantage for Democrats is that they all are possible net losers for the White House if all does not go well politically for the Bush administration.

Politics is a game of tough societal hardball and this president has been very lucky for two years and has learned to win at the game. Democrats are due to win in this game and will win their share if they are ready with imaginative alternatives and properly propose them.

Democrats must remember that they must not be seen as against the president or Republicans personally, only on a general political basis. Democrats must be for "something" politically as well, and not slip into conspiracy rhetoric on issues. Smart and heeded Democratic leadership should control views, keeping people on message and maintain party discipline. Whether the new Democratic leadership is tilted toward the left or the middle of the political spectrum they should get out of Washington and seek answers from the public and them address their concerns. The Republicans have an easier time of this because the well-connected, religious fundamentalists and business interests they represent are vocal about what they want, need and demand of their.

Democrats must re-establish their political roots, values and desires from those millions disgruntled, displaced and generally appalled after the recent election. Only by embracing their inputs and viewpoints should Democrats strive to become once again their clear advocate. Social and economic equality should be the goal of the Democrats' period and they should be as clear in their agenda as the Republicans are in theirs. Getting large contributor money out of the electoral process should be a priority as well. Republican Sen. John McCain, R-Ariz., would be a willing ally in this work so essential for replenishing trust in the political system among the voting public that has lost much faith in politics and politicians.

It is a small "d" democratic imperative for the Democrats to clearly define themselves within the political process. Our democracy, with all its flaws, needs balance through a focused oppositional force of at least two vibrant political parties. The forceful views of third parties should be consulted as well. Ralph Nader has many views that deserve listening to and serious consideration within the Democratic Party apparatus.

The wrong, loud and useless blaming of Nader for the loss in 2000 should stop. This only gives cheer to the Republicans and Democrats alienate a fine intellectually honest ally in Nader. The imbalance currently endangering our national political process is not a healthy one. Any honest Republican operative would agree since political imbalance only breeds eventual political instability where both sides lose. So, Democrats lost this time ... so what! The Iowa presidential caucus is only 13 months away and Democrats have work to do. It is time to make the Democratic voice of the loyal opposition heard once more ... just a bit louder this time. It really is necessary for the good of the political process because political balance demands it.

Negative political ads may educate voters on issues

By Aaron Hanlon
Staff Writer

Bill Mahr, the laughably unfunny host of the show formerly known as "Politically Incorrect" (and now known as "canceled") who suggested that Americans are cowards for defending themselves with cruise missiles, seems to have pried himself away from praising the reckless, self-destructive "bravery" of the Sept. 11 terrorists and discovered a new pet cause.

Naturally, Mahr has redirected his criticism from such trivial issues as self-defense against al-Qaida sociopaths flying planes into sky-scrapers to the more pressing and pertinent issue of negative campaigning, sounding off about it on major networks during election night. Conveniently, this is one of the few issues on which Hollywood-types like Mahr are actually in synch with a sizeable portion of Americans.

Even the invalid negative ads are compelling, humorous and entertaining. And they just might help draw someone out of his apathy and toward the voting booths.

The mere mention of negative campaigning causes people to recoil with indignation similar to that which results from calling someone out on wearing the horizontal-striped J. Crew sweater with last year's color scheme. Negative campaign ads are certainly not in vogue. But are they really as deplorable as everyone thinks they are?

Critics of negative campaigning have argued that negative ads should be banned because they often reference candidates' private lives. "Congressman A is a bad person because she cheated on her husband. Don't vote for her." Granted, half of the country has been brainwashed into thinking that Clinton's shortcomings were "just about sex" and any inquiry into the private lives of politicians is roughly the equivalent to stalking outside of Brittany Spears' bathroom window.

But we must bear in mind the fact that politicians are public servants who voluntarily place themselves in the public eye, often at the expense of some privacy. Campaign ads that investigate the personal lives of politicians can tell voters a great deal about their characters. Such ads may be deemed "negative" because they expose opponents' shady dealings and moral disasters, but they provide voters with important information. How many modestly responsible Clinton fans would have still voted for him had they known about his propensity to somehow (who knows?) get himself implicated in a handful of unrelated rape charges?

Is anyone surprised that he made a mockery of the presidency when he sodomized an intern and then lied about it in court? Maybe the GOP should have implemented more negative ads. This is not to say that irresponsible ads and libelous/slanderous statements are in any way beneficial to the campaigning and voting processes. Rather, valid negative ads can act as whistle-blowers that give voters a heads up about the negative things that some candidates have actually done in the past. Because politics is largely dependent upon ethical standards and accountability (and perhaps the lack thereof is the reason for our frighteningly low voter turnout), negative ads are helpful in that they can expose things about candidates that cannot be exposed by simply looking at a candidate's voting record or bragging about accolades. Pointing out the opposition's mistakes is just as important as lauding one's own accomplishments. Just ask the Democrats after our most recent midterm elections; they might have a bit more to criticize than they do to laud—but that's an instrumental part of our democratic republic.

The best thing about negative campaign ads is that they have their own built-in method of weeding out distasteful, ad hominem attacks and irresponsible messages (I would say "foolproof," but then again some people in Florida had difficulty deciphering complicated ballots that maliciously included more than two candidates).

When we see good negative ads, we recognize something about the attacked candidate that we find unfavorable. When we see bad ones, we laugh or sneer at the guy with the husky voice talking about how Congressman B most certainly hates children and goes out of his way to step on puppies and cut down trees. Anyone with enough brainpower to vote responsibly could recognize when a campaign is going too far with a negative ad and consequently take that ad as a strike against the campaign that paid for it. For this reason, we need not argue over the effectiveness of negative ads in general because it is clear which ones are valid and which ones are shameful.

It has been suggested that negative ads themselves are the reason for low voter turnout. In my experiences, however, comical or attention-grabbing negative ads have sparked political interest in some deadbeat citizens who care more about smoking weed in the here-and-now than electing the people who will hopefully allow them to do so legally and without putting towels under their doors. Even the invalid negative ads are compelling, humorous and entertaining. And they just might help draw someone out of his apathy and toward the voting booths.

There is a multitude of campaigning and voting issues of far greater importance than negative campaigning. We should address morality, accountability and civil responsibility instead of putting negative ads to the grindstone. And of equal importance: we must not overlook their entertainment value.

U.S. Democracy will die under the two party system

By Tim Hinkle
Staff Writer

I just voted in my first election. Looking at my absentee ballot, I was extremely disappointed. In every one of the races besides two, I had to decide between either a Republican and Democratic candidate. You may think there is nothing wrong with this. But I do.

Is this not America? Surely we have a wealth of opinions enough to justify having more than two candidates on the ballot. In one of the races, the Democratic position was listed even though there was no Democrat running. Knowing how extremely hard it is for third parties to get themselves on the ballot, let alone succeed over the propaganda machines that our two main parties run flawlessly, I find this absolutely deplorable. In America, we should not have to settle for merely two candidates in any race.

The only way the system will change is if we, the people, want it to.

I see too many issues that are not being addressed by either the Republican or Democratic parties: the rampant destruction of our environment, corporate domination of the political system, a never-ending and futile drug war and a foreign policy that directly contributes to terrorism, poverty and slave labor to name a few. As Americans, we constantly proclaim our superiority because of our fantastic democratic system.

Well, I think it is time to wake up and smell the toxic sludge that is our heinously corrupted democracy. The Democratic and Republicans parties both control the vast majority of our political offices in this country, not to mention the outlets of opinion. I believe that we need more breadth and diversity of thought in America if we are to have a true democracy.

If you look at America's last election, you will begin to see that America's commitment to democracy has seriously faltered. We had two candidates, neither of which most people were that exited about. This is America. We should have the best presidential candidates in the world, hands down.

Look how President George W. Bush and former Vice President Al Gore barred Ralph Nader from joining the televised debates, simply because he would have questioned them on their increasingly similar views.

Both the Democratic and Republican parties are awash with campaign contributions from corporate special interests whose desires dominate government policy. We vote with numbers, they vote with dollars. Whose opinions do you think our politicians care about? And look at the serious problems with the actual voting process. Voting machines all over the country proved to be inaccurate and faulty, especially in Florida. Here we are, two years later, and still many of those deficiencies have not been corrected. What does it say about our commitment to democracy if we do not care even enough to make sure that our voting machines work reliably and accurately?

So I say, wake up, America. The only way we can begin to affect change is through forcing our leaders to shake their corporate chains and begin listening to the people. Since our leaders have shown repeatedly this is not a priority, especially when they have the monopoly on public opinion with our outdated two party system, we must lead the way to change ourselves.

So get out there. Join a protest. Voice your opinions. Vote, and convince others to vote for parties like the Greens or Libertarians. Break the trance of political and social apathy. The only way the system will change is if we, the people, want it to. America could be a great place, or it could be a place where the power is increasingly consolidated into the hands of a few.

I challenge you to help America reach its potential. As Ralph Nader said in his acceptance speech as the Green Party's Presidential candidate in 2000, "I hear you say often that you're not turned on to politics. Well, let me bring to bear the lessons of history. If you're not turned on to politics, the lesson of history is that politics will turn on you. So, let's start the countdown."

What is so great about Sweden?

By Tom Elliott

Professors like to mask their radical political beliefs under euphemistic labels that avoid unpopular terms like "communist" or "socialist." For some reason they don't mind as much calling themselves Marxists or "neo-Marxists"; although they often avoid citing the title to his most celebrated work, "The Communist Manifesto."

A natural by-product of this tendency is to invent terms like "social capitalism" to label the political-economies to which they favor most. Pressed with the unfortunate circumstance of having no historical examples of leftist economies that actually work in practice, their rhetoric is robbed of due substance. Inevitably, they will sermonize on their most celebrated socialist institution: Sweden. Indeed, Sweden is every American professor's dream come true.

Sweden has a centrally-controlled economy with a large system of social handouts, such as health care and education. It has traditionally had centralized control over the workplace as a means to facilitate whatever the politicos are seeking to achieve. Sweden is in fact known for a high quality of life. But as of late, Swedes have experienced intense recession since 1991, which has made them reform some aspects of this welfare state.

"If Sweden left the European Union and joined the United States we would be the poorest state of America" writes Swede Jonah Norberg, and author of the book, 'In Defense of Global Capitalism.' "The median household income in Sweden in the late 1990s was the equivalent of $26,800 compared with a median of $39,400 for U.S. households—before taxes. And then we should remember that Sweden has the world's highest taxes."

Some may be surprised to learn that the average income for an African-American family in the United States (which earns the least) is higher than the average for all families in Sweden. This alone should drive any Marxist crazy; black families in America—which are supposedly oppressed—earn more than the average family in socialist Sweden. This goes against all their most basic intuitions.

In an article for "Tech Central Station," Norberg explains that free enterprise was the key to Sweden's previous high quality of life. Throughout the 20th century, their economy grew while the politicians let it be. While most of Europe's economies were ravaged by the effects of both world wars, Sweden profited by not getting involved, instead selling goods and industries to both sides. Before World War I, government spending on the public sector was a measly 5 percent. By 1950 it was around 25 percent, which was on par with the United States. The Social Democrats, who controlled the government, did not unnecessarily intrude in business because of the great economic rewards business was producing through trade. In 1970 Sweden was the fourth richest among the OECD-members, after the United States, Luxembourg and Switzerland.

These great financial bounties soon became plagued once the public sector began to grow like an undefeatable cancer. From 1950 to 1990—the year before the big depression hit—the private sector had not created a single net job, yet the public sector grew by more than a million workers.

"The Swedish public sector grew bigger, and more unproductive in the 1970s, and the labor market was regulated. From 1976-1982 public spending rose from 50 to 65 percent. At the same time we had to devalue the currency five times, by a total of 45 percent. The average growth rate was halved to 2 percent in the 1970s, and declined further in the 1980s, and that was before the big crisis in the 1990s," according to Norberg.

After 30 years of high tax rates, Sweden is now the 17th richest nation in the OECD. Those bearing the brunt of this downturn are Sweden's poorest.

"Between 1980 and 1999, the gross income of Sweden's poorest households increased by just over 6 percent while the poorest in the United States enjoyed a three times bigger increase," Norberg said.

Sweden, luckily, is learning its lesson. Since 1991, they have begun to enact a host of economic reforms. This includes a 10 percent reduction in civil service employment, cuts in social welfare spending, partial privatization of the state-owned sector and, most importantly, lower marginal tax rates for the people. Essentially, they are departing from their socialist welfare state in favor of what actually produces the best outcome for its people.

"In 1934 the two Swedish social democratic ideologues Gunnar and Alva Myrdal explained that there were extremely beneficial conditions for a welfare state in Sweden—considering our wealth, the homogenous population, the Protestant work ethic and the good education. If the welfare state didn't work here, it couldn't work anywhere in the world, they thought. The rest of the world should seriously ponder the fact that the Myrdals were right in that prediction," Norberg said.

U.N. Security Council condemns Iraq

Following Security Council resolution criticizing Iraq for failure to comply with U.N. weapons inspections, Hussein agrees to allow inspectors to enter country

By David LaRoss
Staff Writer

Yielding to pressure from both the international community and from the U.S. government, the United Nations Security Council passed Security Council Resolution 1441 on Nov. 8, which condemns Iraq for failing to "provide an accurate, full, final and complete disclosure ... of all aspects of its programs to develop weapons of mass destruction ... and of all holdings of such weapons." It also criticizes the Iraqi government for its restriction of access to suspected sites of weapons development by U.N. inspectors.

The resolution requires that Iraq grant U.N. inspectors full access to any site they choose to visit and the right to "remove, destroy or render harmless all prohibited weapons" or related systems.

It states that the "Council has repeatedly warned Iraq that it will face serious consequences as a result of its continued violations of its obligations."

The administration was encouraged by the resolution.

"Our message is simple: non-compliance no longer is an option," said John Negroponte, U.S. representative to the U.N. Security Council, according to The New York Times.

Negroponte emphasized that the resolution contains no explicit provision for an attack on Iraq.

If Iraq refuses inspections, it will only force another meeting of the Security Council, during which the Council will decide on a course of action.

"If the Security Council fails to act decisively in the event of a further Iraqi violation, this resolution does not constrain any member state from acting to defend itself against the threat posed by Iraq," Negroponte said. His statement follows the United States' recent perception of Iraq as an active military threat.

Iraqi President Saddam Hussein waited until Wednesday to announce that he would comply with the resolution, although he stated, in a letter to U.N. Secretary-General Kofi Annan, "Iraq will not have any mass destruction weapons. So we are not worried about the inspectors when they will be back in the country."

According to CNN, the U.S. response to this statement was not positive.

"When Iraq must produce a list of its weapons of mass destruction, if Iraq produces no list and say it has no weapons of mass destruction, then what appears at this moment to be a diplomatic breakthrough could quickly turn into a military confrontation," Senior White House Correspondent John King said.

A White House representative said that if Hussein is discovered to have lied in this letter, it will be considered a breach of the resolution.

The Iraqi parliament passed a unanimous recommendation on Nov. 12 urging Hussein to go against the U.N.

According to MSNBC, Parliament Speaker Sudan Hammadi described the recommendation as "a message to the United States that the people of Iraq are united behind their leadership, and it also shows that the people of Iraq know that in the U.N. resolution ... there are major allegations which are baseless."

The only voice at the parliament session in favor of the resolution was Hussein's son, Uday Saddam Hussein.

"What is required from us as a National Assembly is to take clear decisions. We should, as a National Assembly, accept the U.N. resolution," he said, according to CNN.

Many sources see the rejection as a prelude to an acceptance by the Iraqi president, since the Iraqi Parliament has little actual power and would not be able to override Hussein's decision.

"I would imagine him saying that the people said no, but he sees the decision from the perspective of protecting the Iraqi people, and I think he can get away with it no problem," Muhammad Kamal, assistant professor of political science at Cairo University said to The New York Times. "He will say yes to the resolution because it is not about Iraq this time, it is about his own political survival."

U.N. Secretary-General Kofi Annan said to NBC that there would be no tolerance for a failure to comply on Iraq's part, and that "last-minute diplomacy" of the sort he employed in 1998, visiting Hussein personally in an attempt to prevent U.S./British air strikes, would not be considered.

U.N. Secretary Iraqi General Kofi Annan, a primary negotiator with Iraq, said that President Saddam Hussein can no longer afford to refuse to cooperate with U.N. resolutions. The Security Council passed a resolution condemning Iraq for not cooperating with weapons inspectors.

Harvey Pitt, chairman of the Securities and Exchange Commission, speaks during a public hearing at the SEC in Washington. Under pressure from Congress, Pitt stepped down from his position.

SEC Chairman Harvey Pitt resigns

By Jim Leahy
Senior Writer

President George W. Bush's original choice as Securities and Exchange Commission (SEC) Chairman, Harvey Pitt, finally met his match last week. Following an investigation into his appointment of William Webster to head a new accounting standards board, Pitt handed in his resignation on Election Day. The resignation brings to an end the short and volatile tenure of Pitt and opens many questions as to the future of the SEC.

Almost a week after Pitt's announcement, Webster also decided that it would be best to resign as well.

According to MSNBC.com, Webster wrote in a letter to the SEC, "I now believe my continued presence on the board will only generate more distractions which will not be helpful to the important mission of the board."

Webster is a former director of the FBI and CIA and held his position for only 18 days following a controversial appointment.

Pitt's 15-month tenure at the helm of the SEC came at a time when corporate wrongdoing were at the center of debate and public consciousness.

In a letter to Bush, Pitt wrote, "Unfortunately, the turmoil surrounding my chairmanship and the agency makes it very difficult for the commissioners and dedicated SEC staffers to perform their critical assignments."

"Mr. Pitt had a rocky tenure at the SEC from the beginning, mainly because his past employment as a lawyer for big accounting firms and other stock-market players engendered deep distrust from Democrats and others favoring tough oversight," reported The Wall Street Journal.

In the week following his resignation, Pitt defended his stay at the SEC and maintained that he did a good job. CNN reported that Pitt told a meeting of the Securities Industry Association that his handling of the Sept. 11 crisis and the way he forced company heads to certify financial results were just some of the many things his tenure brought to the SEC.

Pitt also said, "I hope my successor isn't greeted with the same climate of attack and partisanship."

Pitt faced numerous battles throughout his time as the head of the main regulatory agency for the securities business, many resulting from his own actions. The Wall Street Journal included in the list of his self-induced problems his private meeting with the CEO of KPMG while he was under investigation, asking Congress for a raise and for his position to be made Cabinet level, blasting top Democratic leadership in Congress and then walking into the Webster controversy.

Pitt was responsible for finding a person to lead a new accounting oversight board formed after the outbreak of corporate scandal over the past several years. The board was empowered over the summer following the passage and signing into law of the Sarbanes-Oxley Act.

The act "gave the oversight board a crucial role in the effort to restore trust in corporate financial statements. To replace the accounting industry's widely criticized system of self-regulation, it gave the board the power to make rules for auditors, inspect accounting firms' work, investigate suspected wrongdoing and discipline auditors of public companies," The Washington Post said.

Pitt concluded his search when he settled on Webster. The nomination process was a bitter battle that saw the SEC board divided along party lines. The Democrats on the commission sought to place John Biggs on the oversight board. Biggs is the head of the pension fund TIAA-CREF. Republicans opposed Biggs due to his historically tough stance on the use of outside auditors.

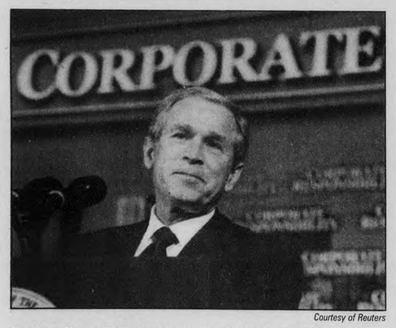
According to The Wall Street Journal, immediately following his 3-2 approval, Webster came under fire. Neither Pitt nor Robert Herdman (SEC chief accountant who also resigned last week) informed the other four SEC commissioners that Webster had disclosed that he had run the audit committee of a company, U.S. Technologies Inc., whose auditors quit. U.S. Technologies is currently under investigation for fraud.

"Two of the most important jobs in dealing with the aftermath of the corporate scandals—running the Securities and Exchange Commission and the new Public Company Accounting Oversight Board—now await filling in the wake of William H. Webster's resignation from the accounting board yesterday," Floyd Norris said in a New York Times article.

The people who will fill these positions will assume them at a time when many are out for blood.

Corporate America is presently at a low point. Bush will be looking to show that he really does care about the economy and that he does have a feeling for its pulse. Many Wall Street watchers will be paying attention to this issue until the next candidates for these jobs are tapped.

Economic concerns remain high despite Republican victory in recent elections



Courtesy of Reuters

President George W. Bush addresses business leaders on Wall Street. Many on Wall Street believe that the new Republican majority will lead to a new period of economic growth.

By Lindsey Gentel
Writer

The Republican sweep in the midterm elections did great things for President George W. Bush. It erased the blotch of the 2000 election photo finish, broke through the Democratic blockade in the Senate and solidified Bush's influence and leadership. Yet with power comes responsibility, and he now owns an unstable economy. Many from Wall Street believe that a Republican sweep is exactly what the economy needs.

Some believe the notion of an anti-business mentality that has existed in the Senate this past year, due to the corporate accounting scandals, including WorldCom, Enron and others, will subside.

According to CNN, it is difficult to create jobs if everybody is anti-business, and with this mindset on the back burner analysts reason that the country will head towards a stronger economy.

Bush's corporate-friendly nominees for regulatory agencies will move more quickly toward approval with a Republican-set Senate agenda.

Several pro-business bills will begin movement through the Senate. These bills include an energy bill that would be a boom to various power stocks; a terrorism insurance bill, benefiting insurance and construction companies and a liability lawsuit reform bill, benefiting the stocks of companies with exposure to asbestos, malpractice and other suits, according to CNN.

Moreover, many economists are thrilled by the likelihood of easier tax laws, due to the Republican sweep. For one thing, last year's $1.35 trillion tax cut has a much better chance of enduring under a Republican Congress.

Northern Trust economist Paul Kasriel said in an interview on CNN.com before the election, "If Republicans were to regain control of the Senate, the probabilities of some major tax cuts would go up quite dramatically. If those tax cuts were implemented, this would have a positive impact on both the economy and the stock market."

Despite Wall Street's outlook on a Republican Congress, the majority of Americans still believe Democrats are better at handling issues pertaining to the economy.

In a recent CNN/Time magazine poll that surveyed over 1,000 Americans, 44 percent thought Democrats were better at handling the economy, contrasted with just 39 percent who thought the Republicans were better.

Some analysts believe a Republican Congress could have a negative impact on the confidence of individual investors. Confidence lingers with a Congress that is not as assertive in keeping corporate leaders from running away with investors' 401k money.

Furthermore, fears of going back to deficit spending, which has represented recent Republican presidential administrations, could lead to a rise in interest rates because fixed-income investors might search for a greater return to coincide with their anticipation for higher inflation. Higher interest rates could put a restraint on economic growth. With the election night resignation of Securities and Exchange Commission Chairman Harvey Pitt, some of this unease may be calmed.

Democrats have been known to spend money as well. According to MSNBC.com, many economists thought Republicans might be more prone to reduce non-defense government expenditures.

Whatever the case may be, the majority in both houses of Congress is not overpowering and therefore it is improbable Republicans will be able to make excessive changes. Many economists think gridlock is a damaging occurrence during the current slowdown because tax cuts and other intensive measures are less likely to be pushed through Congress, according to MSNBC.com.

But gridlock hasn't always been unpleasant. In the late 1990s the divided government meant Democrats couldn't pass new spending programs and Republicans couldn't pass new tax cuts, therefore influencing one of the stock market's best periods.

"I don't think the economy is more likely to be better under the Republicans or the Democrats; a case can be made for each," said John Davidson, president and CEO of PartnerRe Asset Management Corp, in an interview with CNN. "The importance to the economy is really more with the Federal Reserve [interest rate] decision that takes place on Nov. 6."

An interview with X-country runner Bryan Johnston

By Evan Honeyfield
Staff Writer

As the cross country season is rapidly approaching its climax with the Mid-Atlantic Regional meet this Saturday, I caught up with the Bison's top cross country runner this fall: Bryan Johnston '03. Johnston, the No. 2 runner last year, has been stepping up big this season since Greg Costello '03 was diagnosed with a stress fracture back in early October. (Incidentally, Costello finds out this week if his leg has healed enough to race Saturday.)

Bucknellian: How would you say the season has gone so far both individually and teamwise?

Johnston: Thus far, I would say that our cross country season has been somewhat perplexing. We all seem to respond differently to the training and have great races at different times. The experience of running a great team race has been eluding us. This challenge is something we are just going to have to plow through, and in the end I feel we will be strong for it. Individually, I am very pleased with how the season has played out thus far. I feel as though both my confidence and fitness level have been steadily increasing throughout the season. I hope to carry this momentum into mid-Atlantic Regional race this weekend in West Virginia.

Bucknellian: In your mind, compared to last year, how is your fitness right now?

Johnston: Compared to last year, I would say my fitness has improved significantly. My body has been able to handle a greater amount of mileage this year and I'm seeing a lot of improvement because of it. Workouts that I recall being really tough last year seemed a little less difficult this season.

Bucknellian: What kind of mileage do you run a week? In summer? Mid-season? Right now?

Johnston: In a high volume week I'll run between 90-100 miles, a medium week is approximately 80-90 miles and a low volume week is around 65-80 miles. I was running 10 miles a day in August, and a few weeks before we came back to train I started adding a second run on a few of the days. Mid-season this year was when I was running my highest mileage. This is the time when I got in a few 100 mile weeks. Currently, we are tapering off some since we are into the championship races. I'm running about 70-80 miles a week.

Bucknellian: To the person who thinks jogging 2 miles is tough, how do you explain why you train so much?

Johnston: Well, we train so much because we want to stay competitive at this level. There are some who are just born gifted at running, but those of us who don't have this gift have to train like hell to be competitive. A lot of people think that jogging a few miles is difficult, but you would be surprised how much abuse your body can actually take if you are willing to push it. I've always thought that you have to be a little crazy to be a distance runner or you'll never make it.

Bucknellian: What are your goals for Regionals this weekend, individually and teamwise?

Johnston: This weekend, my goal as an individual is to qualify for Nationals. I feel this is within reach and I'm willing to do whatever it takes to get there. Teamwise, I just want all of us to be able to walk away knowing that we gave everything we had.

Costello, a NCAA national qualifier last season, and Head Coach Kevin Donner, also believe in Johnston.

"Bryan is a grinder. He grinds through everything he can, even if it hurts. When he sets out to achieve something, he sticks to it and won't stop until he has achieved his goal. He is mentally one of the toughest runners on our team, he just needs to stay positive. If you sit down and

Swimming and diving squad places third

Guskey and Freeman lead the Bison at the Sprint Invitational, the first meet in the new Kinney Natatorium

Bucknell has traditionally been a solid force in the Patriot League, placing fourth last year and hoping to build upon that success this year.

The Bucknell men's swimming and diving team hosted the first ever meet in the newly constructed Kinney Natatorium and seemingly enjoyed their new surroundings, placing third among five teams at this weekend's Sprint Invitational.

The Bison men were led by the first place finishes of Michael Guskey '03 and Adam Freeman '05. Guskey placed first in the 50-meter breaststroke with a time of 27.12 seconds and Freeman led the divers with two first place finishes, taking both the 1-meter and 3-meter events. Bucknell has traditionally proved to be a tough foe in the Patriot League, placing fourth last year and hoping to build upon that success in this year's competition.

Stelio Saffos '03, who also earned points in the 50 breast with a time of 27.85, was enthusiastic about upcoming meets and the abilities of his teammates.

"The men's breast-strokers are going to be a strong force in the Patriot League. We have a talented group of guys and we have been training a lot together. We want to take it to the next level this year," Saffos said.

Bucknell is coached by Jerry Foley, who enters his fifth year with the Blue and Orange. Foley has been extremely successful, as his athletes have accumulated 81 top-10 finishes in the past two years. The new Olympic size pool is much faster than in the past and the improved facilities should

Men's soccer earns school record for wins

Men end season with a win against Army, surpassing the Bucknell school record for wins at 13

By Tara Utchel
Senior Writer

The men's soccer team completed its last two games of the season this past week. The Bison battled to a 1-0 home victory over Army last Sunday, redeeming themselves after dropping a 1-0 decision to No. 11 Maryland on Wednesday.

In front of a Homecoming crowd of 512, the Orange and Blue ended their season with a 1-0 win.

The first half started out slow for both teams. Neither team penetrated the 18-yard line because most of the action occurred in the middle of the field. Scoring opportunities were nonexistent.

"The first half was not very good soccer for either team. In the second half we started to play with more fire and started to dictate the flow of the game," Head Coach Brendan Nash said.

Bucknell picked it up in the second half. They had 18 shots on net, but only converted one of those shots with eight minutes left in the game. Eric Brunton '06 received a pass outside of the box from Brian Johnson '03. Brunton shot a curving ball passed Army's diving keeper for his fourth goal of the season, the first goal of the game and the last goal of the season.

The win was encouraging after a tough loss to Maryland on Sunday. The Terps dominated most of the first half, but the Bison held their own. The game was scoreless going into halftime.

Both of the teams' play mirrored that of the first 45 minutes. The score remained 0-0, until 26 minutes into the half. A scramble in front of Bucknell's net led to a Maryland goal. That would be the game's only goal.

Despite the loss, the last week was a positive finish to a superb season.

"We had a very good season. Defensively we did a great job as a team, but our back five were outstanding every single game.

Homecoming doesn't change dismal plight

This weekend's Homecoming loss to Lafayette dropped the Bison football squad's record to 2-7

The Bison dropped to 2-7 on the season, following their lowest scoring output since the 1996 season, losing 19-3 to Lafayette last Saturday at Christy Mathewson-Memorial Stadium.

The Bison were playing catch up from the beginning. After receiving the opening kickoff the Leopards marched down the field in what seemed to be an effortless manner. After completing five of their first seven passes, the Leopards had to settle for a 22-yard field goal to cap off the 13-play, 61-yard drive, due to the stifling Bison red zone defense. Lafayette led 3-0 less than five minutes into the game.

Things did not get any better for the Bison when the offense took the field. On their second play from scrimmage, starting quarterback Cole Ciesnolevicz '05 fumbled the ball on a lateral attempt, and the Leopards regained possession on the Bucknell 10-yard line. The red zone defense of the Bison proved too much for the Lafayette offense yet again, and the Leopards settled for another field goal, this time from 26 yards out, to make the score 6-0 with 8 minutes, 15 seconds remaining in the first quarter.

On the ensuing Bucknell drive, the Bison offense showed some spark. The Bison began using wide receiver Daris Wilson '05 at quarterback, and put Ciesnolevicz out as a wide receiver on some plays. Wilson was an option quarterback in high school, and gave the Bison offense the addition they needed. Bucknell moved the ball

This year's team is also somewhat different from the past, as it is composed of a more balanced roster. Instead of being carried by one or two swimmers, there is a good distribution of talent and anyone could prove to be valuable on any given day. Jack Sheehan '04, who finished fifth in the 400 individual medley, said.

"We feel like our depth is really going to help us throughout the season, especially against teams like American that depend on just a few guys. We have the ability to consistently earn points in every event," Sheehan said.

Bison drop to 8-5 in the P.L.

By Brent Butler
Sports Editor

After a decisive 3-0 victory over Holy Cross on Friday, Bucknell fell to Patriot League foe Army last Saturday. With the loss the Bison have dropped to 8-5 in the Patriot League and have placed themselves in a precarious position for a possible playoff berth.

"We have to beat Colgate to keep our 3rd place position," Chelsea Anderson '06 said.

With the 3-0 victory over Holy Cross, the Bison have captured their 14th win of the season and their 8th Patriot League win.

This was the Bison's second 3-0 victory over Holy Cross this season. The first being on Oct. 11. The Bison defeated the Crusaders in the first game of the night 30-28. The Bison offense came out strong after the first match and beat Holy Cross 30-21 and 30-21 in the last two games.

"We played with a lot more emotion during the Holy Cross game," Anderson said. "When we come out strong and play like we can, then the win comes along too."

Melanie Ghiz '03 led the Bison on the night with 15 kills and hit .303, while Brandi Trapasso '04 added 10 kills and 12 digs to the Bison effort. Breean Trapasso '04 recorded a team high 18 digs and 35 assists, and Jennifer Wrigley '03

Athlete of the Week
Melanie Ghiz '03

Melanie Ghiz '03 has stepped up this season to lead the Bison to a superb 14-2 record.

The many outstanding achievements of Melanie Ghiz '03 so far this year have given the Bucknell women's volleyball team a fight for the Patriot League title in this 2002 season. After losing six seniors from last season, Ghiz has stepped to lead the team night in and night out with her dominance on the court.

The team, 14-2 overall and 8-5 in Patriot League play, split the Homecoming Weekend with a solid win against Holy Cross and then tough loss to Army. Ghiz's consistent contributions at middle blocker have her often leading the team with team highs in kills with 15 in the win and 19 in the loss.

Ghiz grew up in New Caanan, Conn., a small, preppy town reminiscent of the life here at Bucknell. Although field hockey was one of the most popular sports, Ghiz enjoyed playing with her teammates on the volleyball team. Ghiz also played club volleyball, and the combination of her high school team and club team demanded much of her time outside of school.

She started playing volleyball in seventh grade, when she decided to choose it over swimming. Before attending Bucknell, she had always played middle blocker, but for the last two years she moved to the right side to play opposite setter due to the plethora of other middle blockers on the team and to stop some of the big hitters that the team would face.

Ghiz was not always a dominant player for the Bucknell squad.

"Melanie has made incredible strides in her offensive production as a member of the volleyball team the last two seasons. She has gone from a tall, above average high school player with great potential to an attacker who has the ability to dominate matches," Head Coach Cindy Opalski said.

The loss of six seniors had many believing that the team would not fair well. Ghiz's strong efforts complemented by the help of several underclassmen's play this season offered the Bison a chance to win the Patriot League Tournament.

"I think losing six seniors last year made people think that we wouldn't do so well this year, but we have a great group of underclassmen who have really stepped up, proving to people that we can win the tournament," Ghiz said. "For example, one of our starters was unable to play for a few weeks and a freshman was called upon to take her place in games, and she has really improved in the past few weeks to meet the challenge well."

The team hopes to win the Patriot League Tournament in two weeks at American and then move further on to the NCAA tournament.

"Fortunately other people on our team have stepped up offensively as we've progressed through the second round of Patriot League play," Opalski said. "This has given Melanie even greater flexibility in the front line to run patterns to maximize our offensive production. She'll be the primary 'go to person' in our team's mission to capture another Patriot League Volleyball Championship."

Aside from volleyball, Ghiz enjoys horseback riding and continues to train with her own horse Derby at Bucknell. After graduating from Bucknell, Ghiz hopes to move to the West Coast or the Washington, D.C., area to pursue a job in sales/marketing for a few years. Wherever she ends up, Ghiz hopes to have the opportunity to play some volleyball in a less competitive environment.

Bucknell women's field hockey fell to the No. 1 seed Lafayette in the Patriot League tournament with an 8-1 loss last Friday. This was the first time since 2000 that the team has made it to the tournament.

"When we played Lafayette earlier in the season I thought they were one of the most explosive teams this league has fielded in my 11 years here at Bucknell. They did nothing to change my thoughts on Friday," Head Coach Heather Lewis said. "Simply put, they were the better team this year and I can applaud their execution on the field. I think their national ranking is a great thing for this league and it certainly brings credibility to Patriot League hockey. They have set the standard for the rest of the league and it's our goal to match them."

Lafayette is ranked 18th nationally with an 18-2 record for the season. Megan Monahan, the Patriot League Player of the Year, scored two goals for the team in this game, while Beth Gullota added three.

Carli Cataldo tied up the score 16 minutes, 56 seconds into the game. This was her fourth goal for the season. The Leopards came back with seven unanswered goals to win

Thrills, agony and ugly yellow blazers

"Monday Night Football" has provided a host of unforgettable moments over the course of its 32-year, 500-game history. Most football fans can recall with great ease their fondest and most lasting memories from the history of the weekly showdown.

For those with a taste for nostalgia, it might be the piercing drone of Howard Cosell's commentary cutting through the November air. For those who long to see last-minute miracles, it could be Montana's Mile High charge in 1994, or the Jets' astounding fourth-quarter effort in 2000. To those who love the spectacle of it all, it might be the ever-changing faces of celebrity guests or the timeless swinging melody of Hank Williams Jr. For those who take sadistic delight in the grotesquery of injury, it might be Lawrence Taylor reconfiguring Joe Theismann's leg in 1985.

But one thing is for sure—the mention of "Monday Night Football" won't cause a whole lot of people to well up and dote upon the smiling, freckled face of Roone P. Arledge. While the everyday football fan knows little of this gentleman, any connoisseur of sports broadcasting and the world of athletic entertainment will be more likely to give Arledge his due.

He is, after all, the greatest name in the history of modern televised sport. It takes a great man to turn a Monday into anything but the drab and tedious start to another dragging workweek for thousands of Americans. Arledge did that and a lot more.

His empire commenced quietly in 1960 when the American Broadcasting Corporation hired the 29-year-old from NBC to help produce broadcasts of NCAA football games. ABC, at the time, was limping along in the swirls of dust kicked in its face by monster networks NBC and CBS. The innovation-deficient network was on death's door. Then Arledge came along.

He didn't waste any time in revolutionizing the game of football as a small screen spectacle. Giving the game a technological makeover, Arledge planted remote microphones and hand-held cameras around the field and filled dull spots in the broadcast with prerecorded interviews and personality profiles, allowing armchair quarterbacks around the country to go where no couch potato had gone before.

In 1961, Arledge introduced the nation to "ABC's Wide World of Sports," a sports variety show that was as diverse in the spectrum of human emotion it showcased as it was in the smattering of under-published and often obscure sports it exposed to the public. The longest-running sports show in history, "Wide World" allowed fans to watch from home as stars like Wilma Rudolph, Muhammed Ali, Evil Knieval, Mark Spitz and Bobby Fischer hammered their way into the pages of sports lore.

In addition to his work on lesser-known sports, Arledge was at the helm of 10 different broadcasts of the biggest sports extravaganza in the world — the Olympics. As he had in football broadcasts and "Wide World," he gave the viewers a closer look at the personalities, the toils and the moments of ecstasy that mark the Olympic Games.

He described the appeal of sports as "the thrill of victory; the agony of defeat," a phrase that hung around "Wide World" for decades. Arledge had seen his share of thrills and more than his share of agony—he was there in 1972 to guide a shellshocked audience through the horror and disbelief of the Munich terrorist attacks.

It wasn't until 1970, though, that Arledge blessed the nation with a primetime show that would permanently change the face of ABC, Monday nights, television viewing and the entire sport of professional football.

"Monday Night Football" seemed destined to be a flop — pushing televised sports beyond the traditional boundary of the weekend was daring in itself, and the riskiness was magnified when Arledge decided to plunk the already-controversial Howard Cosell in the play-by-play booth and let him commentate on a loose rein.

With the benefit of hindsight, it isn't hard to see why the show took off like hula-hoops. It was flashy. It was a technological slap in the face. Sometimes it was even a little tasteless. What's not to like?

John Madden (left) and Al Michaels (right) carry on the 'Monday Night Football" tradition that Roone Arledge established back in 1960.

What set Arledge's spectacular show apart from any other sports program in history, however, was its ability to sensationalize the sport and, at the same time, revere and respect it. It never lost sight of football's core purpose and, as a result, has managed to maintain an enduring appeal.

Arledge changed football because he knew how to turn any broadcast into an armchair adventure for the average American, with innovative camera angles, stomach-jarring sound effects, painfully honest analysis and, of course, the invention that might have been his most earth-shaking brain-child—instant replay.

Thirty-two years after "Monday Night Football" burst into American pop culture with its plaster-haired yellow-blazered trio of Cosell, Frank Gifford and Don Meredith, it remains a staple of the United States sports diet.

When the show celebrated its 500th broadcast, there wasn't a tremendous amount of airtime afforded to the man who piloted its creation, but his impact resonated through every second of airtime. The 72-year-old Arledge couldn't be on hand for the contest because of health problems, but he can be assured that his presence was felt through every down of every series and every second in between.

Through every thrill and all the agony, Arledge's influence lingers on.

Order in my court!

Opening remarks have begun in the Barry Bonds 73rd home run ball debate. Alex Popov alleges that he officially caught the ball, before being mobbed by a "mini-riot" and losing the ball. Feeling cheated, he sued Patrick Hayashi, the fan who ended up with the record breaking ball, claiming that he had been assaulted and robbed and touched in most unpleasant spots. What I can't get is why are we having all these trial hearings? This would seem rather trivial, similar to a fumble in football. Whoever comes up with it after all the knee cracking, poking and name calling is done, is the player that gets the ball. Besides I'd like to think that our civilian possession judges have more practical disputes to tend to.

Baseball wants to remind you that it's still around with its unveiling of its American League MVP (Drum roll please). The winner is Miguel Tejada from the Oakland Athletics. Tejada easily beat out Rangers shortstop Alex Rodriguez and Yankee second-baseman Alfonzo Soriano with 21 first place votes. "Mr. T" hit a career-high .308 with 34 homers and 131 RBI, while season-long favorite Rodriguez batted .300 with 57 homers and 142 RBI. In an era of hall-of-fame caliber shortstops, most analysts placed Tejada under Rodriguez, Nomar Garciaparra and Derek Jeter, but something caught the voters' eyes on Tuesday night.

"I don't think there can be anyone on earth more happy than I am right now," Tejada said. Indeed he is happy receiving a $100,000 bonus for winning, added to his $3.5 million salary. Pricewaterhouse Coopers has already begun its auditing of this luxury as you read this article.

I don't necessary support Rodriguez, but when you look at the numbers and importance to the team even I have a hard time seeing this one. Plain and simple, Rodriguez had no supporting cast and even his mind boggling numbers couldn't dig his team out of the depths of the division cellar. Even so, the goal in any professional sport is to do what it takes to assist the team in winning, so that should take precedence in the decision process. Echoing my thoughts, Ken Macha, promoted from Oakland's bench coach to manager said, "The person who helps you win the most games should be the MVP. The idea is to win games, not just put numbers up."

An obvious scarlet letter piercing from Rodriguez was playing on a non-contending team 31 games out of first place in the West division. So has a non-contending team player ever receive this prestigious award? I did some homework and dug up that the only time a player on a last-place team won the award was 1987, when Andre Dawson of the Cubs led the NL in homers and RBIs. Oakland will start the season with the AL MVP and Cy Young winner Barry Zito making the loss of Jason Giambi a distant memory.

Barry Bonds' 73rd home run ball has garnered more than simple bickering. Alen Popov is suing Patrick Hayaski for assaulting him to obtain the ball.

The Decker Effect of the week goes to a hockey Dad from Canada. Micheal Croteau, sued the New Brunswick Amateur Hockey Association because it didn't award his 16-year-old son, Steven, the league's MVP award, despite leading the league in scoring. Instead the fourth-highest scorer took home this most coveted award. Stunned by the obvious injustice, Michael said "How do you justify that? My son is a hero."

While unwavering family love is important, don't they teach graceful losing to parents? Looks like his son is the mature one here. It's reports like this that make me want to sue my old high school basketball coach for keeping me on the bench during a state playoff game. I mean come on, my coach obviously was out of his mind.

Changing lanes to basketball, I'd like to give a shout out to the Dallas Mavericks and their franchise-best 7-0 start to the NBA season! Dallas, playing without injured Raef LeFrentz and Nick Van Axel, has not missed a beat, relying on their up-tempo, seat filling, "it's raining three's" style of play. Led by the "Flying Dutchman" Dirk Nowitzki, whose play earned him Western Conference Player of the Week for games between Nov. 4-10. Nowitzki averaged 21.8 points, 11.0 rebounds, 1.5 assists and 1.5 blocks during that span. Around the league, Gilbert Arenas, point guard for the Golden State Warriors and the revitalization of Toni Kukoc in Milwaukee have had impressive starts to the season and have made draft day signers in fantasy sports very respected. Also, have you seen Glenn Robinson with his new club The Hawks? It seems like a good fit with 22 points per game, 8 rebounds per game, and 4 assists have Atlanta fans singing Seether's "Fine Again."

NFL Predictions

Pittsburgh (5-3-1) at Tennessee (5-4)
These old AFC Central division rivals enter this game each unbeaten in their last four games. Maddox has been awesome for the Steelers. I ask, is it too early to call him the next Kurt Warner? After all, Warner was found in the arena league, Maddox in the XFL … I still don't know which I think is worse. Each team's defense is susceptible in the secondary, but with the Steelers possessing the superior passing game, look for Maddox to work his magic. Also, it will be interesting to see whether Bettis or Zereoue will be the starting running back. Zereoue has had back-to-back 100-yard games, which is one more than Bettis has had this season. Bettis did play in overtime last week and, after all, he is the starter. The XFL MVP will continue his unbeaten streak.

San Francisco (7-2) at San Diego (6-3)
It has reached the point in the season when we can actually spot potential Super Bowl matchups, and this California battle is surely one. The Niners and Chargers actually have rushed for the exact same number of yards and are tied for fifth in that category in the league. The Chargers possess the second-best rushing defense in the NFL, while the Niners defense is coming off a brilliant week. The Chargers have Tomlinson, the NFL's leading rusher, and I want to pick San Diego based on the stats, but the 49ers are more experienced and are playing better ball now.

New England (5-4) at Oakland (5-4)
There's nothing like a rematch of last season's playoff games, especially when one team loses on a really, really badly blown call. Both of these teams have had sustained winning and losing streaks this season already. Each depends upon a strong passing game; the Raiders rank first in that category while the Pats trail at fourth best. The Raiders have the better quarterback and running back and no one can stop Rice. Hopefully, the officials have gotten better and aren't from Boston. If so, Oakland wins.

Chicago (2-7) at St. Louis (4-5)
If the Rams continue to play as they have the past four weeks they will most likely become the first team ever to lose their first five games and still make the playoffs. Bulger has been so impressive that the Rams have decided to give Warner an extra week to heal his broken pinky. Bulger may be tested this week without Faulk, but it won't matter much because the Bears haven't won a game since their first loss earlier in the season. That trend won't stop this week.

The Mike Martz Manifesto

It had to be humiliating, skulking to the parking lot like a 14-year-old boy who just discovered he could tuck himself between his legs and walk around like a girl. Mike Martz, the St. Louis Rams' beleaguered head coach, offensive guru, ringmaster of the "greatest show on turf," Tsarina of disappointment and shogun of hubris, hit a low point somewhere around week four as the Kurt Warner-led Rams stumbled to a 0-4 record.

Last year's Super Bowl was hyped with the frenetic diligence of an ant colony servicing its queen as one of the biggest mismatches in recent history. Now this may not seem so grandiose, but I assure you, for Mike Martz whose offense sputtered like a Russian space expedition, the loss to the Patriots in the Super Bowl has to chafe like a wool brassiere.

The St. Louis Rams are regarded as the dynasty that ushered one millennium out and another in, yet in all that time they've held up the lofty sum of one Super Bowl trophy. Now I'm not suggesting the Rams are not a great team, but let us say that, at the very least, they have performance anxiety.

Now recently the NFL has become the ultimate bildungsroman, showing each year how long and how short the learning curve can really be. With everyone from Tom Brady to Kordell Stewart, Tommy Maddox to David Carr, football fans are given the ultimate tour of educational development in the United States.

And at the center of the current controversy lies a man, a cold, lonely and despondent man with an apple face, ruddy cheeks and a shock of gray hair. Mike Martz has been heavily criticized for depending almost entirely on his run-and-gun style offense, relying on Kurt Warner's arm to carry the team, hitting the same block that Bill Belichek and the world champion Patriots hit slightly later.

But when Kurt Warner went down with a broken pinky in week four, Marc Bulger, phenom extraordinaire stepped in and won his first four games, setting a franchise record for completions and coming in fourth in yards in a single game. Now with Kurt Warner a week away from taking the field, Mike Martz has a decision to make. Warner or Bulger? Martz seems to think there's no question. Martz isn't entertaining the notion of starting Bulger over Warner. That makes about as much sense as a xenophobic multiculturalist.

I say to you, Mike Martz … let the boy play. That's right, let the boy play. Let Warner sit for a few weeks and let's see how Bulger does. Where would the Patriots be if they sat Tom Brady? Where would the Steelers be if they sat Tommy Maddox? They'd be throwing empty beer bottles and hurling noxious epithets at the flat screen come playoff time as they run out of pretzel combos.

Let the boy play. Let him throw an interception and let him live and laugh and love. Let him grow jaundice and weary with the rigors of professional athletics. Let him grow a beard and let him watch Saturday morning cartoons with a bowl of Crispy Hexagons at the training compound. Let him weep and worry and wallow in every negative article written about his performance. Let him effuse and exalt and effervesce with the joy of every autograph he signs. Let him crash his jeep into trees and pull teammates from burning buildings. For the love of God, let the boy play.

Kurt Warner is doing about the only thing he can do, he's refusing to "get caught up" in the controversy, or lack thereof. Warner is the Green Knight to Bulger's Sir Gawain, waiting with a Damocletian sword for the bullock-befriending quarterback.

Bulger has said remarkably little on the subject, having the restraint of Plato after a Socrates brain fart makes 15 pages of dictation utterly incoherent. And what more is he supposed to do? Throw a hissy? I'd love to see Bulger send Martz a bouquet of dead roses or place Post-its with uncomfortable statements all over his office, or send him an e-mail showing one of those mapquest.com aerial photographs of Martz's home with a message saying, "I'm watching you."

I'm not saying that Warner doesn't deserve the job or that he hasn't earned it, but what's wrong with sticking with what works until it does not work anymore? Warner only got the job because Trent Green was injured. The next year, Green bolted for the Kansas City Chiefs. I say let the boy play.

And while we're on the subject of roles, what's up with referring to players by their jobs before they became athletes? Tommy Maddox, the former insurance salesman, Todd Pratt, the former pizza delivery man, Kurt Warner the former grocery bagger … Does anyone care? Does that mean if I ever become a professional writer they'll say, "Aaron DeRosa, former string instrument repairman, wrote a stunning pantoum this evening." How about we get a handle on the résumé listings and stick to the basics, OK? His name is X, his current position on the team is Q. Let's stop asking Y and leave it B. Thank U.

Let's just suffice it to say that if Warner comes back in a week and the Rams lose their playoff spot because of Martz's bituminous decision, I think it's high time they sent him packing because his hubris is getting ridiculous and Warner should understand that. It's not about who gets the start, it's about the Super Bowl ring. Biedsoe knew that well enough and he rode the pine and got his ring. Maybe the bell has tolled for Warner, at least in St. Louis.

Of course, he'd always be a welcomed addition to the editorial staff of a small Pennsylvania liberal arts college's weekly campus newspaper. Then he'd be a former grocery bagger and newspaper editor. Now who wouldn't hire a quarterback with credentials like that?

Men's soccer sets win record

Adam Wilcox—The Bucknellian

The men's soccer team broke the most-wiins-in-a-season record with their 13th win over Army.

The guys work rate in practices and games was always 100 percent and the chemistry was unbreakable," Nash said. "As for the future, we need to find a way to create more chances. Once this happens I feel we can be the top team in the Patriot League."

The Bison broke the most-wins-in-a-season record with their 13th win over Army. Bucknell set a new standard for next year's team.

"I feel it now gives us a standard to measure up to each season. I think the whole program would sacrifice the record for a spot in the Patriot League playoffs, so it really has not hit them [that they beat the school's record]," Nash said. "I think when they look back in three months or three years, they will realize they were part of a very special team."

It seems as if Elliot Maruffi-Cowley '03 has not taken his career for granted.

"Soccer has enriched my life in countless ways. Most of all it provided me with an opportunity to meet my closest friends here and the guys that will be there my whole life—maybe even my wedding. It has been a true privilege and joy to play with some amazing players and more importantly great people."

The team said goodbye to five seniors this year. They will never be forgotten because these young men helped build the program into what it has become.

"They [the seniors] mean a lot to me personally and basically changed the program around. When I recruited them we were coming off a Bucknell record for losses in a season," Nash said. "For them to win the last game of their careers and get in the record book is a perfect ending to their careers."

The 2002 season has come to a close. The next step is to look ahead and work towards next fall.

"The future of this program is looking very promising. Our team should do very well for the next couple of years," Mike Lookingland '05 said. "We have a lot of people coming back and we know we are going to attract some top recruits after this great season we had. We deserve some recognition, and it's only a matter of time before we start getting respect from everyone."

Football falls 19-3 to Lafayette

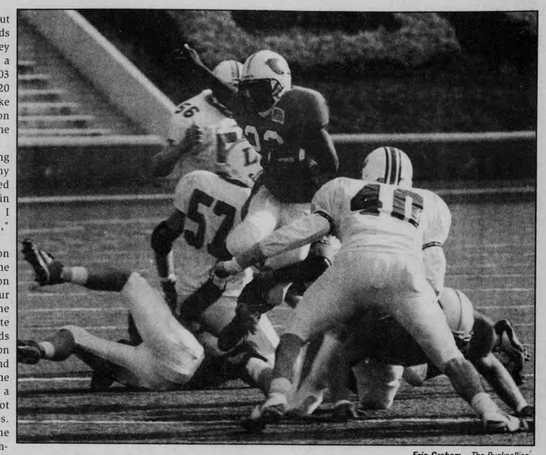
down the field, but 16 plays, 74 yards and 8:17 later, they had to settle for a Chris Lundberg '03 field goal from 20 yards out to make the score 6-3 on the first play of the second quarter.

"I like having the ball in my hands. I played quarterback in high school, but I like the slash role," Wilson said.

The Bison could not keep the momentum on their side. Four plays into the ensuing Lafayette drive, the Leopards were going for it on fourth down, and were awarded the first down on a questionable spot by the referees. Following the fourth down conversion, the Leopards marched down the field, and capped off their 12-play, 75-yard scoring drive with a 9-yard touchdown run. The extra point attempt was blocked by Billy Windle '03 to leave the score at 12-3 with 9:57 remaining in the first half.



Eric Graham—The Bucknellian

Runningback Blamah Sarnor '06 (above) had seven carries for 37 yards in the game against Lafayette. As a freshman Sarnor has really stepped up this year and has been a vital part of the team.

The Bison offense continued to struggle while the Leopard offense was moving the ball well again two possessions later. On a first and goal play from the Bucknell 1 yard line, Joe Massey '03 forced a Leopard fumble, but it was recovered by Lafayette. On the next play, the Leopards connected on a 3-yard touchdown pass to make the score 19-3.

On the next Lafayette possession Windle picked off a Leopard pass and returned it 26 yards to the Lafayette 29-yard line, but the Bison could not capitalize on the takeaway, and went into the locker room trailing 19-3.

The Bison offense came out of the half looking promising. After converting a fourth down play at the Lafayette 26-yard line, the Bison moved the ball into the red zone. But, they had to settle for a Lundberg field goal attempt from 29 yards out, which sailed wide left.

After the Bison defense forced the Leopards to go three plays and out, the Bucknell offense had good field position, starting the drive at the Lafayette 39-yard line. Ciesnolevicz was intercepted on the Lafayette 5-yard line to stop the Bison threat.

Both defenses controlled the remainder of the game with neither offense able to get anything going in the fourth quarter, and the Bison lost their fifth-straight game 19-3. Wilson earned player of the game honors after helping to give the Bison offense a different look.

"We wanted to get Daris the ball more often. We are looking for the hot hand and trying to work from there," Head Coach Dave Kotulski said.
